BRITISH SHOUT

TO THE

Most August and most Serene Majesty

OF

CHARLES II.

KING of Great Britain, France and Ireland.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

YOUR Majesties kind acceptance of this CHRONICLE when first published by Sir Richard Baker, encourages me to present it to Your gracious Protection, as it is now by me Continued to Your Majesties Coronation; containing much of the History of Your Majesties own Life; a Life, which gives to the World the most Excellent Example any Age hath produced of True and Magnanimous Fortitude and Clemency; and speaks You as much a Monarch by Nature as Inheritance. Your Majesties indulgent kindness to all Your People, makes me not despair to obtain Your Pardon for the Mistakes, which perhaps through Ignorance, I may have committed: For there never was any History filled with more various and wonderful Transactions than these Late Times have brought forth: My chiefest design both in this, and all other my endeavours, is to have the honour of being esteemed,

Most Gracious Sovereign,

Your Majesties most Dutiful, and most Obedient Subject,

Edward Phillips.

The Epiſtle to the Reader.

SIR Richard Baker who writ, and publiſhed this Hiſtory, to the beginning of the Reign of King Charles the Firſt, affirmed, That it was collected with ſo great care and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles ſhould be loſt, this only would be ſufficient to inform Poſterity of all Paſſages memorable or worthy to be known; and if ſo much might be ſaid of what he did, I preſume, nothing that hath been ſince added to it, and publiſhed, has impaired the credit and worth thereof.

The many Impreſſions that have been made and ſold of the Book both before, and after the Addition, are a ſufficient teſtimony of the kind acceptance it has had in the World; How neceſſary this preſent Continuation is (which alone might have made a Competent Hiſtory) will beſt appear by the peruſal thereof; and in that part which deſcribes the Tranſactions of the Duke of Albemarle, there is not only ſo exact an Accompt as is no where elſe to be found, but alſo many ſecret paſſages of particular remark, which could never have been known, but from his Excellencies own Papers, and ſeveral other private Collections of Perſons active with him in that Service, which I had the permiſſion to make uſe of; wherein I have been ſo faithful, that there is not any Letter, Speech, or Diſcourſe in Publick Conferences, which are not exactly ſet down as they were written, or ſpoke, ſave only, that of ſuch Letters, or Speeches, as were very long, the moſt pertinent parts are only retained.

The wonderful Reſtauration of his Majeſty, which is the Subject of that part of the Continuation; is one of the moſt extraordinary actions, that has been ever mentioned in Story, both for the Generoſity of the Attempt, and the Prudent Conduct of it: For certainly, nothing was ever enterprized with greater generoſity and courage, then with * Nine thouſand Six hundred Foot, and Fourteen hundred Horſe and Dragoons (and thoſe long train'd up in an averſion to Kingly Government) to preſerve the whole Kingdom of Scotland in Engliſh hands, and to Invade England, at a time when the Governing Power was in thoſe that were irreconcileable to his Majeſties Perſon, and Government, ſupported by Thirty Thouſand experienced and victorious Souldiers in England, of the ſame affections (beſides what were at their devotion in Ireland, and Dunkirk) and a Militia of Trained Bands in all Counties, to a greater number than thoſe in pay, all of choſen men, of the like Principles: and this at a time, when by the defeat of Sir George Booth, his Majeſties greateſt hopes were fruſtrated, and moſt of the Nobility and Gentry which were engaged with him, were diſarmed, and their Eſtates confiſcated, and ready to be divided amongſt the enemies of Royalty, to alter, with the Riches, the Intereſt of the Kingdom; and when they were about to Enact, and many of the Legiſlators themſelves taken, an Oath of abjuration of his Majeſties Perſon and Family: But then his ſecreſie in the conduct of this great Affair is very remarkable, being obliged to act very differently from his intentions, to gain the confidence of thoſe Jealous Maſters whoſe Authority he pretended to obey;* obey; for if he had but once trod awry in any of the paths he mov'd, all had miscarried; and notwithstanding his greatest subtilty, many objected (thinking thereby to weaken his credit with the Army) That the King was in the bottom of his Design.

* See pag. 685. where the numbers of his Forces are mentioned.

His most prudent contrivances were often disappointed, but by his wisdom and dexterity as often retrived; one of his greatest difficulties was to temper his own Officers and Souldiers to his purposes, to which the opinion they had of his Conduct and courage, did much contribute, and when that was effected, he the easier modelled the rest.

It is evident that he acquainted but one * person with his Design, and that he did, supposing it impossible alone without correspondence to manage so hazardous an undertaking; for he was to compass his ends by several and different means, which could not without great addres be prepared and disposed thereunto. And how necessary this Correspondence was, is apparent by many Transitions, but by none more, Then in the lucky * contrivance of getting the Army out of London, and the quartering his Souldiers in their places, and dispersing the rest; whereby the Parliament, City, and Kingdom became at his Reverence, and without which his Majesties Restauration could never have been effected in this way.

* See pag. 731. towards the end.

* See p. 701, 702, & 703.

The consideration of these things leads me unto so great a labyrinth of Admiration, that I cannot easily desist from detaining the Reader too long from the perusal of the matter, which induces me to it: I shall therefore conclude this Epistle with that commendation of this Renowned Generals undertaking, which a Reverend and pious Prelate most justly delivered in a late * Sermon, That it was A Generous, Glorious, and Heroical Design, whereby he hath at once redeemed his Country both from Slavery and Oppression, by restoring the King to his People, and the People to their King; and withal hath purchased unto himself, Honour without Envie, Greatness with Safety, and (which is the best reward of Vertue in this World) a perpetual satisfaction and complacency in himself, for having so nobly performed his duty.

* Bishop of Winchester in the Sermon he preach'd at the Coronation, when he was Bishop of Worcester, pag. 29. & 30.

E. Phillips.

12. King Cadwallo his Son, reigned 48 years.
13. King Cadwalladar his Son, the laſt of The Britiſh Kings, who died at Rome in the year 689, after he had reigned 3 years. After which, Britain was a Colony of the Saxons; who divided it into Seven Kingdoms: But the Saxons before the death of King Cadwalladar took Kent from the Britiſh Kings, and had it in their poſſeſſion: Which Kingdom of Kent began by Hengiſt the Saxon in the year 455, in the Reign of King Aurelius Ambroſius, before mentioned, and laſted 372 years, during the Reigns of Seventeen Kings of Kent: The laſt of which Kentiſh Kings was overcome by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons, who made Kent a Province to his Kingdom in the year 827. The ſecond Kingdom was of the South-Saxons, began by Ella in 488, in the Reign of the ſame Britiſh King Aurelius Ambroſius, containing Suſſex and Surrey, and continued 113 years during the Reigns of five Kings only; the laſt of which Kings was overcome by Ine King of the Weſt-Saxons, and ſo became a Province to that Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons in the year 601. The third Kingdom was of the Weſt-Saxons, which began by Cerdic in 519, in the Reign of the Britiſh King Arthur, containing Cornwal, Devonſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Hampſhire, and Barkſhire, and continued 561 years, during the Reigns of Eighteen Kings; the laſt of whom Egbert became King of the whole Nation. The fourth Kingdom was of the Eaſt-Saxons, begun by Erchenwin in the year 527, containing Eſſex and Middleſex, and continued 281 years, during the Reigns of Fourteen Kings; the laſt of which Kings, Egbert, King of the Weſt-Saxons, ſubdued, and ſo made the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons to be a Province to his own Kingdom. The fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland, began by Ella and Ida in the year 547, containing York-ſhire, Durham, Lancaſhire, Weſtmerland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370 years, during the Reigns of 23 Kings; after the laſt of which, this Kingdom yielded to the Protection of Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons. The ſixth Kingdom was of Mercia, began by Crida in the year 522, containing Huntington, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwickſhire, Leiceſter, Northampton, Derbyſhire, Oxfordſhire, Cheſhire, Shropſhire, Glouceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, and Hartfordſhire, and continued 220 years, during the Reigns of Twenty Kings; after which they were ſubdued by the Weſt-Saxons. The ſeventh Kingdom was of the Eaſt-Angles, began by Uffa in 575, containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Ely, and continued 353 years, during the Reigns of Fifteen Kings, and at laſt was ſubject to the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons: But this Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles was enjoyed by the Danes fifty years before the Weſt-Saxons had it; ſo the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles continued diſtinct from the reſt of the Nation in the whole 403 years: So it appears that after King Vortigerne the firſt of the Britain Kings in the year 455, had called in the Saxons out of Germany to aſſiſt him in defending the Kingdom againſt the Invaſions of the Picts and Scots, every Britain King who ſucceeded him, loſt ſome part or other of it to the Saxons; till at laſt in the year 689, Cadwallader the laſt Britain King loſt all at his death; and then the Saxon Kings ſtriving amongſt themſelves for Sovereignty, they ſtill gained one upon another, till at laſt in the year 818, Egbert, or ſome under him, reduced them all under his ſubjection, who then cauſed all the South of the Iſland to be called England; the Dominion whereof continued under him and his Succeſſors, till the Danes in the year 1017, made the great interruption.

A CHRONICLE OF THE KINGS OF ENGLAND:

From the time of the ROMANS Government,
Unto the Death of King
CHARLES I.

Of the first known times of this Island.

ALTHOUGH we begin the Æra of our Computation from William called the Conqueror, as though he was the first of our Kings of England: yet before him, were many other excellent Kings; and their Acts perhaps as worthy to be known, if they could be known. But seeing after-Ages can know nothing of former times, but what is recorded by writing: it hath happened, partly by the devastation of Libraries, and partly by the scarcity of Copies, before Printing came up; that of many Authors, scarce so much is left us, as their very names: and besides, it hath followed, that as the first Writers were Poets, so the first Writings have been Fictions. And nothing is delivered to Posterity of the most ancient times, but very Fables; such as the story of Albina, (of whom they say, this Island was called Albion; though others say, Ab albis rupibus, of the white Cliffs) that she should be the eldest of the two and thirty Daughters of Diocletian, King of Syria, (such as never was) who being married to two and thirty Kings, in one night killed all their Husbands: for which fact, they were put in a Ship, themselves alone without a Pilot, so to try their adventure, and by chance arrived in this Island, of whom Gyants were begotten. And if you like not of this, then have you the story of Albion, the son of Neptune, of whom the Island took its name. But when these are exploded, there follows another with great Attestation, and yet as very a fable as these; namely the story of the Trojan Brute, (of whom the Island they say, was called Britain: though many other causes are given of the name:) as likewise the story of Brutes Cousin Corinæus, of whom they say, the Countrey of Cornwal had its name, to whom it was given, for overcoming the Gyant Gogmagog: and that Brute having three Sons, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, he gave at his death to his eldest Son Locrine, all the Land on this side Humber, and called it Loegria; to his second son Albanact, all the land beyond Humber, of whom it was called Albania, (now Scotland:) and to his youngest Son Camber, all the Land beyond the River of Severne, of whom it was called Cambria (now Wales;) with other such stuff which may please children, but not riper Judgements; and were first broached by Geoffery, Arch-deacon of Monmouth: for which all the Writers of his time cried shame upon him, and yet can scarce keep many at this day from giving credit to his Fictions. This Geoffery of Monmouth (afterward made, by the favour of King Stephen, Bishop of Asaph) lights upon a Book written in Welch, and brought out of Wales by Walter Arch-deacon of Exeter of the British affairs, and translated by Geoffery, in which, though there were many notable passages, that might give much light to our History; yet so many commentitious Fables were inserted, that they rendred even what truths he writ suspected.

Albion why England called.

Brutes story fabulous.

Math. West.

Geffery of Monmouth a fabulous writer.

And when we are once gotten out of Fables, and come to some truth; yet that truth is delivered in such slender draughts, and such broken pieces, that very small benefit can be gotten by the knowing it; and was not till the time of Julius Cæsar, a thousand years after the Fable of Brute: at which time, the Island was yet but in manner of a Village, being without Walls, as having no shipping, (which are indeed the true Walls of an Island) but only certain small Vessels, made of Boards and Wicker. And as they had no Ships for defence without, so neither had they any Forts, for defence within: scarce any houses but such as were made of stakes and boughs of trees fastned together. Neither was it yet come to be a Kingdom, but was governed by a number of petty Rulers; so as Kent only had in it (as Cæsar calleth them) four Kings, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax:) which division, as it made the Britains the more easie to be conquered, so it made the Romans the longer in conquering. For if they had been one united body, one or two Battles might have made a conquest of the whole; where being thus divided, there was need to be as many battles as there were divisions: So as it was many years, before the Romans could conquer the whole Island; even from the time of Julius Cæsar, to the time of the Emperour Domitian: not much less than two hundred years. It is true, after Cæsar's first coming, the Island grew sensible of this defect of their division, and thereupon by consent of a great part made choice of Cassibelan, King of the Trinovants, who had his seat at Verulam, to be General of their Wars; which made indeed some little stop to the Romans proceedings: but after the loss of a Battle or two, they fell again into a relapse of their former defect, and thought it better to secure every one his own, by his own means, then by a general power, to hazard all at once; whereby it came afterward to be true, Dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur. Yet before the Countrey could be wholly conquered, at first by reason of the Nations valour, seeking to keep themselves free; and afterward by reason of the insolency of the Garrison Souldiers, that sought to make them slaves, many great oppositions were made, amongst which the most memorable was that of Voadicia, a certain Queen of the Countrey, who having been by the Roman Souldiers her self abused, and her daughters ravished, used means to leavy an Army of sixscore thousand men, whom she led her self into the Field, and set upon the Romans in their chief Towns, which were London, Verulam, and Camalodunum (now Malden in Essex,) of whom she slew above seventy thousand: but then in a second Battel, had fourscore thousand of her own Army slain, after which Defeat, for avoiding of slavery, she poysoned her self.

How long the Romans were in conquering England.

Julius Cæsar invading England, Cassibelan resists him.

Voadicia discomfiteth the Romans: and after is discomfited her self.

This Island for a long time was so much esteemed of the Romans, that their Emperors sometimes came hither in person; as first the Emperour Adrian in the year 124. who reedified that great Wall between England, first made by Agricola, Nero's General in Britain, and Father-in-law to Tacitus the famous Historian. Adrian having set the Countrey in order returned. The same Wall was again repaired by Severus the Emperour, in the yeer 212. who came over into Britain to repress the Incursions of the Picts and Scots, by whom in a Battel near York, he was wounded and thereof died; or as others say, he died of age and sickness. Afterward in the year 305. Constantius the Emperour came into Britain, and ended his life at York, making that City famous for the death and burial of two great Emperours; and yet more famous for the honour done to Constantine the Great, Son of Constantius, who in that City was first saluted Emperour. But notwithstanding the great estimation the Romans a long time made of this Island; yet at last, after five hundred years they had kept it in subjection, they voluntarily left it: the charge of keeping it, being greater then the benefit; for to keep it in subjection, they maintained no fewer then fourscore thousand Souldiers in pay. And when Wars grew amongst themselves at home, they could no longer spare so many abroad, but recalled them home: but then, though they left Britain, yet they left not the Britains, but carried them, at least, a great part of them away with them; of whom the most were slain in their service, and the rest planted in that part of France, which of them was afterward, and is to this day, called Britain. And now one would think, the Island should be in good case, being freed from them that kept them in subjection: but it proved to be in worse case being at liberty, then it was before in servitude; for being deprived of their ablest men, and at the same time, their King Lucius happening to die without issue, they were left as a few loose sticks, without the bond of a Governour, which the Picts and Scots observing, thought now was the time to make the Countrey their own; and thereupon made Invasions upon it with all their Forces. Whereupon the Britains having none left of their Native Kings to succeed; and knowing they could ill manage the Body of an Army without a Head, they make choice of Vortigern Earl of Cornwal, one extracted from the British Line, to be their King: and he, whether so advised by his Cabinet Counsellor, the Prophetical Merlin, or as finding his own strength too weak to make resistance, implores first aid of the Romans; and they making answer, they had business enough to do of their own, and leaving them to themselves, he then fled to the Saxons for aid, a warlike people of Germany, and who had greater swarms then their hives could well hold.

The Emperor Adrian comes into England.

The Emperor Severus comes into England.

The Emperor Constantius comes into England.

The Romans leave England, and why.

Vortigern is chosen King.

He calls in the Saxons.

And here we may plainly see how dangerous a thing it is for a Nation to call in strangers to their aid, and especially in any great number; for though they come at first but Mercenaries, yet once admitted, and finding their own strength, they soon grow Masters: as here it proved with the Saxons.

These Saxons were Infidels, and brought in with them diversity of Idols, after whose names they gave appellations to the several dayes of the week. Adoring the Sun, they named the first day Sunday, or Sunsday. The second Moonday, from an Idol which ridiculously represented the Moon. Another god they had called Tuisco, and to him they appointed the third day, naming it Tuesday. The tradition is, that this Tuisco was the son of

Ashke-

Aſhkenaz, Grandchilde to Japhet, and that he conducted their fore-fathers out of Aſia into Europe from the unfiniſhed Tower of Babel. The next Idol which they adored for a god, was Woden, repreſenting an armed man, and they named the fourth day from him Wodenſday, or Wedneſday; they honoured him as the god of Battel: He had been a famous and victorious Prince amongſt them, and of him lineally deſcended Hengiſtus and Horſa their firſt leaders into this Iſland. Not only our Saxons, but all the Septentrional Nations adored and ſacrificed to Thor, a Statue reſembling a crowned King, his head encompaſſed with twelve bright golden Stars, of whom they denominated the fifth day Thurſday. Friday took the name of Friga, an Idol repreſenting both Sexes, with a Bow in one Hand, and a Sword in the other: and though the Statue expreſt an Hermophrodite, yet ſhe was generally reputed a Goddeſs. Then they had a god called Seater, and to him they conſecrated Saterday: this Idol was like an old man, with a long beard and hair, bare headed and bare footed. Such was the Religion of the Saxons; which giveth us occaſion before we treat further of their coming in, to ſay ſomething of the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in this Iſland. Firſt then, it is recorded, that in the year 63. what time Arviragus reigned here, Joſeph of Arimathea (who buried the Body of Chriſt) came into this Iſland, and laid the foundation of the Chriſtian Faith in the Weſtern parts, at a place called then Thurdet, now Glaſtenbury; and that there came with him Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha: and more then this, that Simon Zelotes one of the Apoſtles ſuffered Martyrdom here in Britain: and more then this, that both St. Peter and St. Paul came into this Iſland and preached the Goſpel; all which, and more to this purpoſe, is recorded by Authors of good account: though it be hard in believing, That perſons, and ſpecially women of ſo great age, as theſe muſt needs be at this time, ſhould take ſo long a journey. But howſoever it was, certain it is, that the Doctrine of Chriſtianity was about this time planted in this Iſland, though it made afterward but ſmall progreſs, and that with ſome perſecution; as in which time, St. Alban ſuffered Martyrdom at Verulam, and at Lichfield ſhortly after, no fewer then a thouſand. After this in the year 180. what time Lucius was King of this Iſland, Eluthérius then Biſhop of Rome, ſent Faganus and Damianus to him: upon whoſe preaching, the Temples of the Heatheniſh Flamins and Arch-flamins (one and thirty in number) were converted to ſo many Biſhops Sees; whereof London, York, and Caerleyn, (now St. Davids) were made the Metropolitans of the Province. And there is a Table remaining at this day, in the Pariſh Church of St. Peter, on Cornhil, London, which recordeth, that the Foundation thereof was laid by this King Lucius, and that this Church was the Cathedral to that Archbiſhops See. In the year 359. a Council was holden at Ariminum in Italy, where ſix hundred Weſtern Biſhops were aſſembled, whereof three went out of Britain; and though they were Orthodoxal, and with that Synod determined to give their voices againſt the Arian Hereſie, yet by reaſon all theſe Weſtern Fathers were ignorant in the Greek Language, they were circumvented by the Arian Biſhops, and unanimouſly they would have Chriſt, but not Homoouſion. After this, about the year 420. roſe up in this Iſland, one Pelagius a Monk, brought up in the Monaſtery of Bangor in Wales, who ſpread the poyſon of his Hereſie, firſt in this his Native Countrey, and afterward all the world over. And theſe had been the chief paſſages in matters Eccleſiaſtical within this Iſland, when the Saxons were called in, about the year 450.

Joſeph of Arimathea plants the Goſpel at Glaſtenbury.

St. Alban ſuffers Martyrdom at Verulam.

The Heatheniſh Temples converted into Biſhops Sees at the preaching of Faganus and Damianus.

Pelagius the Heretick riſeth up.

And now under the conduct of two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, came over nine thouſand Saxons with their Wives and Children, to aſſiſt the Britains againſt the Scots, and were appointed the Iſle of Thanet to inhabit. With which aſſiſtance, the Britains gave their enemies Battel, and overcame them: ſo as they accounted the Saxons as Angels ſent from Heaven, and then allowed them Kent alſo for their inhabiting. Not long after Hengiſt obtained of King Vortigern the property of ſo much ground, as he could encloſe with a Bulls Hide: which cutting into thongs, he there built the Caſtle, Ficti de nomine, called Thong Caſtle. And now having built it, he invites Vortigern to a Feaſt, who there fell in love with Rowena, the Daughter, or rather the Neece of Hengiſt; for when Hengiſt firſt arrived in Britain he was but 30. years of age: howſoever Vortigern marrying this fair Lady, put Hengiſt into ſuch a height of boldneſs, that he began to aſpire, ſending for greater Forces to come over to him; as meaning to tranſplant himſelf hither, and to make this Iſland his Inheritance: which the Britiſh Lords perceiving, and not able to wean their King from his new Wife, and her Father Hengiſt, they depoſe him; and in his place ſet up his Son Vortimer, a true lover of his Countrey: who preſently in a pitcht Battel near unto Aylesford in Kent, ſet upon the Saxons; where Catigern the Brother of Vortimer, and Horſa, or Hengiſt, in ſingle fight hand to hand ſlew each other. In which place Catigern was buried, and a Monument in memory of him erected, the ſtones whereof at this day are ſtanding in a great plain in the Pariſh of Aylesford; which inſtead of Catigern, is corruptly called Kits-Cotyhouſe. Another the like Monument was erected for Horſa, though now defaced; remembred only by the Town where it ſtood, called Horſtead. Three other Battels after this were fought between the Britains and the Saxons: one upon Craford, another at Weppedſfleete, the third upon Colmore: in which laſt, the Britains got ſo great a Victory, that the Saxons were clean driven out of Kent, and Thanet alſo not ſuffered to reſt: ſo as ſhortly after, Hengiſt with his Saxons departed the Kingdom, as being now out of hope to make his fortune in this Iſland. But while Vortimer was thus intentive for his Countries liberty, Rowena the former Kings Wife, being Daughter to Hengiſt, was as intentive to bring it into ſervitude; which knowing ſhe could not do as long as

The Saxons forced to flee England.

Vortimer lived: she used means by poyson, to take away his life, after he had been King the space of four years, and then by the Witchcraft of fair words, so enchanted the British Nobility, that her Husband Vortigern was again established in the Kingdom; which was no sooner done, but Hengist (relying upon his Son Vertigern's love) with a mighty Army attempts to return again into the Island; when being resisted, he makes a shew, as if he desired nothing but to fetch away his Daughter Rowena, and to have a friendly conference for continuance of amity: which motion seeming reasonable, a place and time of conference was appointed: the time upon the first of May; the place upon the Plain of Ambrii, now called Salisbury; whither the plain-meaning Britains came unarmed, according to agreement; but the fraudulent Saxons under their long Cassocks had short skeynes hidden, with which upon a watch-word given, they set upon the Britains, and of their unarmed Nobility slew three, some say five hundred, and took the King himself Prisoner, whom they would not release, till they were put in possession of these four Countries, Kent, Sussex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Whereupon Vortigern, whether fearing a second Deposing, or whether so advised by his Cabinet-Counsellor the Prophetical Merlin, betook himself into Wales, and there built him a strong Castle for his safe-guard; while the Saxons coming daily in great swarms into the Land, had at this time over-run all, if Aurelius Ambrosius a Roman born, but affected to the British Nation, had not landed at Totnes in Devonshire, to whom resorted great Troops of Britains. His first expedition was against Vortigern, (as the first cause of the Britains misery) whose Castle he besieged; and whether by wilde-fire, or by fire from Heaven, both he and his Castle, and all that were in it, were burnt to ashes. To this Ambrosius is ascribed the admirable Monument in Wiltshire, now called Stonehenge, in the place where the Britains had been treacherously slaughtered and interred; and of whom the Town of Ambersbury bears its name. After this he set upon the Saxons, and in many Battels discomfited them; till at last falling sick in the City of Wincheſter, a Saxon, in shew a Britain, and in habit a Physician, was sent unto him, who instead of Physick, ministred Poyson, whereof he died in the year 497. after he had reigned two and thirty years.

Vortigern is again received.

After Ambrosius, succeeded Uter (some say his Brother, others a Britain) called Pendragon, of his Royal Banner born ever before him; wherein was pourtrayed a Dragon with a golden Head, as in our English Camps it is at this day born for the Imperial Standard. And he also in many Battels discomfited the Saxons, till after eighteen years Reign he came to his end by treachery; dying by Poyson put into a Well, whereof he usually drank, in the year 515.

Uter Pendragon, why so called.

Is poisoned.

After him succeeded his Son Arthur, begotten of the fair Lady Igren, Wife of the Duke of Cornwal, to whose bed the art of Merlin brought him in the likeness of her Husband; and he in twelve set Battels discomfited the Saxons; but in one most memorable, in which girding himself with his Sword called Callibourn, he flew upon his Enemies, and with his own hand slew eight hundred of them; which is but one of his wonderful deeds, whereof there are so many reported, that he might well be reckoned amongst the Fabulous, if there were not enow true to give them credit. Amongst other his Acts, he instituted the Order of Knights of the Round Table, to the end there might be no question about Precedence, and to teach Heroical mindes, not to stand upon Place, but Merit. But this great Prince, for all his great valour, was at last in Battel wounded, whereof he dyed, in the year 522. after he had reigned six and twenty years.

After King Arthur succeeded his Cousin Constantine, and after his three years Reign, Aurelius Conanus the Nephew of King Arthur; whose Reign is so uncertain, that some say, he reigned only two, some three years, some again thirty, and some three and thirty. After Conanus succeeded Vortiporus, who after many Victories against the Saxons, and four years Reign, dyed. After whom succeeded Malgo Conanus, and reigned six years. After him Careticus, who setting upon the Saxons, and beaten, fled into the Town of Chicheſter, whereupon the Saxons catching certain Sparrows, and fastening fire to their feet, let them flie into the Town, where lighting upon straw, and other matter apt to take fire, the whole City in short space was burnt; and thereupon Careticus flying, secured himself among the Mountains of Wales, where he died, after he had unprosperously reigned three years: and from that time forth, the Britains lost their whole Kingdom in the East part of the Island, and were confined in the West by the Rivers Severn and Dee. After Careticus succeeded Cadwan, who reigned two and twenty years. After him his Son Cadwallo, who reigned eight and forty years, and then died; whose body was buried in St. Martins Church near Ludgate, and his Image of Brass placed upon the same gate, for a terrour to the Saxons. In his time the Doctrine of Mahomet began to spread it self all the Eastern World over. After Cadwallo, succeeded his Son Cadwalladar; in whose time so great a Famine, and afterward Mortality happened, continuing eleven years, that the Land became in a manner desolate: insomuch, that the King and many of his Lords were driven to forsake their native Countrey, and Cadwallader himself went to his Cousin Alan, King of little Britain in France. At which time the Saxons taking advantage of his absence, came over in swarms, and dispossessed the forlorn Britains of all they had, and divided the Land amongst themselves. Whereupon Cadwalladar, obtaining assistance from his Cousin Alan, was coming over to restrain their insolencies; when making prayers to God for good success, an Angel appeared to him, or at the least to his seeming he heard a voice that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will, the Britains should rule this Land any longer; and therefore bad him hie him to Rome, and receive of Pope

And now 'tis time to ſpeak of the Heptarchy of the Saxons, ſo much ſpoken of by all Writers; and to ſhew by what degrees the Britains loſt, and the Saxons got the whole poſſeſſion of this Iſland: for this Heptarchy or diviſion of this Iſland into ſeven Kingdoms, came not in, all at once, nor yet in an equal partition, but ſome good diſtance of time, one after another, and as the Invader had ſtrength to expel the Natives.

The firſt Kingdom being of Kent.

THE firſt Kingdom of the Saxons began by Hengiſt, in the year 455. containing all Kent, and continued 372. years, during the Reigns of ſeventeen Kings, of whom as many as performed any memorable Act, ſhall be remembred; and for the reſt it will be no loſs to paſs them over in ſilence. Of theſe ſeventeen Kings, Ethelbert being the fifth, was the firſt Saxon Chriſtian King of this Iſland, converted by Auſtin the Monk, whom Pope Gregory ſent hither to that purpoſe, with forty others, in the year 596. to whom King Ethelbert gave his chief City of Canterbury, and his own Royal Palace there, made ſince the Cathedral of that See; withdrawing himſelf to Reculver in the Iſle of Thanet, where he erected a Palace for himſelf and his ſucceſſors. He gave him alſo an old Temple, ſtanding without the Eaſt Wall of the City, which he honoured with the name of St. Pancras, and then added a Monaſtery to it, and dedicated it to St. Peter and S. Paul, appointing it to be the place of the Kentiſh Kings Sepulchres. But in regard of Auſtin the procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were ſoon forgotten, and it was, and is to this day called St. Auſtins, which Abbey St. Auſtin enriched with divers Reliques, which he brought with him from Rome; amongſt which was a part of Chriſts ſeemleſs Coat, and of Aarons Rod. This King after his own converſion, converted alſo Sebert King of the Eaſt Angles, and aſſiſted him in the building of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London; as alſo the Church of St. Peter, on the Weſt of London, then called Thorny: and himſelf at Rocheſter built the Cathedral Church there, which he dedicated to the Apoſtle St. Andrew; and dying when he had reigned ſix and fifty years, was buried at Canterbury. And thus by this firſt Saxon Kingdom, was all Kent lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was the firſt impairing, and this happened in the Reign of Ambroſius before ſpoken of. The ſixth King of Kent was Ethelbald, who at firſt an Apoſtata, was afterwards converted, and built a Chappel within the Monaſtery of St. Peter and Paul at Canterbury. The ſeventh King was Ercombert, a virtuous and religious Prince, who firſt commanded the obſerving of Lent; and in his dayes, the Archbiſhop Honorius divided Kent into Pariſhes. The eigth King was Egbert, who obtained the Kingdom by murthering his Nephews: whoſe ſiſter the Lady Dopnena, founded the Abbey of Minſter in Kent. The eleventh King was Withred, who founded the the Priory of Merton at Dover. The laſt was Baldred, who overcome by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons, left Kent a Province to that Kingdom, in the year 827.

The ſecond Kingdom being of the South Saxons.

THE ſecond Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the South Saxons, and began by Ella, in the year 488. containing Suſſex and Surrey, and continued 113. years, during the Reign of five Kings only, of whom Ciſſa being the ſecond founded the City of Chicheſter, and reigned as ſome ſay, threeſcore and ſixteen years. And then Berthan being the laſt King, was overcome by Ina King of the Weſt Saxons, and his Countrey became a Province of that Kingdom, in the year 601. And thus as Kent before, ſo now Suſſex and Surrey were lopped off from the Britains Dominion: and this was a ſecond impairing, which alſo happened in the Reign of the Britiſh King Ambroſius.

Chicheſter founded.

The third Kingdom being of the Weſt Saxons.

THE third Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the Weſt Saxons, and began by Cerdic, in the year 519. containing Cornwal, Devonſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Hampſhire, and Barkshire, and continued 561. years, during the Reigns of nineteen Kings, of whom this Cerdic was the firſt; in whoſe time Porth, a Saxon, landed in the Weſt, at a place from him called afterward Portſmouth, and aided Cerdic in his conqueſt. And this happened in the Reign of King Arthur: and as Kent, Suſſex, and Surrey before, ſo now theſe ſeven other Shires were lopped off from the Britains Dominion: and this was a third impairing. The ſixth King of the Weſt Saxons was Kingils, who was the firſt Chriſtian King of this Kingdom, converted by Berinus an Italian Divine, to whom he gave the City of Dorcheſter, near to Oxford; who therein erected his Epiſcopal See. The ſeventh King was Kenwald, who at firſt an Apoſtata, was afterward converted, and founded the Cathedral of Wincheſter, and the Abbey of Malmſbury; whoſe Wife Segburg alſo built a houſe of Devotion in the Iſle of Sheppy, wherein her ſelf became a Nun, and was afterward elected Abbeſs of Ely. The eleventh King was Ina, who ordained many good Laws, which are yet extant in the Saxon tongue, and are tranſlated into Latine, by the learned Maſter William Lambert. This King built a Colledge at Wells, bearing the name of St. Andrews, which afterward King Kenulph made an Epiſcopal See. He alſo, in moſt ſtately manner ner new built the Abbey of Glaſtenbury; and out of his devotion to the See of Rome, he enjoyned every one of his Subjects, that poſſeſſed in his houſe of any one kinde of goods to the value of nineteen pence, to pay yearly upon Lammas-day, one penny to the Pope; which at firſt was contributed under the name of the K ngs Alms, but afterward was paid by the name of Peter Pence. At laſt he went to Rome, and there took upon him the habit of Religion, and therein died. His Wife alſo became a veyled Nun, and afterward was made Abbeſs of Barking, near London. The thirteenth King was Cuthred, who firſt permitted the bodies of the dead to be buried within the Walls of their Cities, which before were uſed to be buried in the fields. The fourteenth was Sigebert, who for his cruelty and exactions, was by his Subjects forced to flee into the Woods, to hide himſelf, where by a Swine-herd he was ſlain. The fifteenth was Kenwolph, who founded the Cathedral Church of S. Andrews at Wells, and was afterwards ſlain by Kynoard, whom he had baniſhed. The ſixteenth King was Birthrick, whoſe Queen Ethelburg having prepared a poyſon for another, the King chanced to taſte it, and thereof died. In fear of which chance the Queen fled into France; where Charles the then King, for her excellent beauty, offered her the choice of himſelf or his Son in Marriage: but ſhe out of her luſtful humour chooſing the Son, was thereupon debarr'd of both, and thruſt into a Monaſtery, where committing Adultery, ſhe was driven from thence, and ended her life in great miſery. For her ſake the Weſt Saxons ordained a Law, that no Kings Wife ſhould hereafter have the title or Majeſty of a Queen, which for many years after was ſeverely executed. It is memorable which is recorded of a King in theſe parts, named Wazmund, and was the Founder of Warwick Town: that he had a Son named Offa, tall of ſtature, and of a good conſtitution of body, but blinde, till he was ſeven years old, and then ſaw; and dumb till he was thirty years old, and then ſpake.

The fourth Kingdom of the East SAXONS.

THE fourth Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the East Saxons, and began by Erchenwyn, in the year 527. containing Eſſex and Middleſex, and continued 281. years, during the Reigns of fourteen Kings; of whom the third was Sebert, who firſt built the Cathedral of St. Paul, London, which had formerly been the Temple of Diana: He likewiſe founded the Church of St. Peter in the Weſt of London, at a place called Thorney, where ſometime ſtood the Temple of Apollo, which being overthrown by an Earthquake, King Lucius new built for the ſervice of God; and that again being decayed, this King reſtored to a greater beauty, and with his Queen Athelgarda was there buried. The ninth King was Sebba, who after thirty years peaceable Reign relinquiſhed the Crown, and took upon him a Religious Habit, in the Monaſtery of St. Paul, London, where dying, his Body was intombed in a Coffin of gray Marble: the cover coped, and as yet ſtandeth in the Northwal of the Chancel of the ſame Church. The twelfth was Offa, famous for the beauty of his countenance, who both enlarged with Buildings, and enriched with Lands the Church of Weſtminſter, and after eight years reign went to Rome, and was there ſhorn a Monk, and in that habit died. The fourteenth was Suthred, whom Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons ſubdued, and made his Kingdom a Province to his own. And thus beſides the former Shires, theſe two alſo were lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

The fifth Kingdom being of NORTHUMBERLAND.

THE fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland (ſo called becauſe it lay North from the River Humber) and began by Ella and Ida, in the year 547. Containing Yorkſhire, Durham, Lancaſhire, Weſtmerland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370. years, during the Reigns of three and twenty Kings; of whom nothing is recorded of the two firſt, but that they builded the Caſtle of Bamburg. The ſeventh King was Ethelfryd, who at Caerlegion (now Weſtcheſter) made a ſlaughter of twelve hundred Chriſtian Monks, and was himſelf afterward ſlain by Redwald King of the East Angles. The thirteenth King was Oſred, whoſe Wife Cutburga, out of a loathing wearineſs of Wedlock, ſued out a Divorce from her Husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburn in Dorſetſhire, where in a Religious Habit ſhe ended her life. The ſixteenth King was Cednulph, who after eight years Reign, left his Royal Robes, and put on the Habit of a Monk, in the Iſle of Lindesfarn, or Holy Iſland. Unto this King the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Prieſt in the Monaſtery of Peter and Paul, at Werimouth near to Durham, dedicated his Work of the Engliſh Hiſtory, which he continued from the firſt entrance of the Saxons in this Iſland, to the year 731. containing after his own account 285. years. The ſeventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty years Reign forſook the world alſo, and ſhore himſelf a Monk; whoſe Brother being Archbiſhop of York, erected a notable Library there, and ſtored it with an infinite number of Learned Books. The laſt King was Oſwald, after whom this Kingdom yielded to the protection of Egbert, King of the Weſt Saxons, who was now in the year 926. become abſolute Monarch of the whole Iſland. And thus by the erection of this fifth Kingdom, were the ſix Northern Shires lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fifth impairing.

Warwickshire, Leiceſter, Northampton, Derby, Oxfordſhire, Cheſhire, Shropſhire, Gloceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, and Hartfordſhire, and continued 220. years, during the Reigns of twenty Kings, eight of whom in a continued ſucceſſion kept the Imperial Crown of the Heptarchy; for though others Reigned as Kings in their own Territories: yet among them ever one was the ſupreme head of the reſt, and was called King of Engle-lond, till Egbert the Weſt Saxon brought them all into one. The fifth of theſe Kings of Mercia was Penda, who was the firſt Chriſtian King of the Mercians, and laid the foundation of the fair Church at Medeſhamſtead, now called Peterborough. The ſeventh King was Ethelred, who reigned thirty years, and then gave over the Crown, and became a Monk in the Monaſtery of Bradney in Lincolnſhire, where in the year 716. he died. The eighth King was Kenred, who after four years Reign went to Rome, where he took upon him the Habit of a Monk, and after other four years died. The tenth King was Ethelbald, who at firſt was given to much laſciviouſneſs of life; but being reprehended for it by Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, was ſo far converted, that he founded the Monaſtery of Crowland, driving in mighty piles of Oak into that Mariſh ground, where he laid a great and goodly Building of Stone; and after two and forty years Reign, was ſlain in a Battel by Cuthred King of the Weſt Saxons. The eleventh King was Offa, who greatly enlarged his Dominions, reigned nine and thirty years, and founded the Monaſtery of St. Albans. The thirteenth King was Kenwolph, who reigned two and twenty years, and founded the Monaſtery of Winchcomb, in the County of Gloceſter, where his body was interred. The eighteenth King was Withlafe, who overcome by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons, held his Countrey afterward as his ſubſtitute and Tributary, acknowledging Egbert as now the ſole Monarch of this Iſland. And by erection of this Mercian Kingdom, were ſeventeen Shires more lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and was a ſixth, and a great impairing, ſo as now they were driven into a narrow room.

The ſeventh Kingdom being of the Eaſt ANGLES.

THE ſeventh Kingdom was of the Eaſt Angles, and began by Uffa in the year 575. containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Ely, and continued 353. years during the Reign of fifteen Kings, of whom the fifth was Sigebert, who firſt brought the light of the Goſpel into his Dominions, and built a School for education of youth, whether at Oxford, or Cambridge, is left a Quære; and after three years Reign ſhore himſelf a Monk in the Abbey of Cumbreburg, which himſelf had built: but being afterward violently drawn from thence by his Subjects the Eaſt Angles, to reſiſt the Mercian King Penda, and refuſing to uſe any other weapon but only a white wand, was in a Battel by him ſlain. The ſeventh King was Anna, who after thirteen years Reign, was alſo ſlain by Penda the Mercian King. This King Anna was memorable chiefly for the holineſs of his Children, of whom his Son Erkenwald was Biſhop of London, and built the Abbey of Barking, near London. His Eldeſt Daughter Etheldred was twice married, and yet continued a Virgin ſtill, and at laſt became a Nun, and is remembred to poſterity by the name of St. Audrie. His ſecond Daughter named Sexburg, his third named Ethelburg, his fourth (a natural daughter) named Withburg, all entred into Monaſteries, and are Canonized all for Saints. The fourteenth King was Ethelbert, a Learned and Religious Prince, who being invited by Offa the Mercian King to marry Elfred his daughter, came for that purpoſe to Offa's Court, then ſeated at Sutton Walleys, in the County of Hereford, and there by him was cruelly murthered: In whoſe memorial notwithſtanding, he afterward built a fair Church at Hereford, the Cathedral of that See, as though he could expiate a murther of the living, by a Monument to the dead, and were not rather a monument of his own impiety. The fifteenth King was Edmund, who aſſaulted by the Danes for his poſſeſſions, was more aſſaulted for his profeſſion; for continuing conſtant in his Chriſtian Faith, thoſe Pagans firſt beat him with bats, then ſcourged him with whips, and laſtly bound him to a ſtake, and with their Arrows ſhot him to death: whoſe body was buried at the Town where Sigebert the Eaſt Anglian King, one of his Predeceſſors had built a Church, and where afterward (in honour of him) was built another moſt ſpacious, of a wonderful frame of Timber, and the name of the Town upon the occaſion of his burial there, called to this day St. Edmundsbury. This Church and place, Suenns the Daniſh King burnt to aſhes: but when his Son Canutus had gotten poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crown, terrified with a viſion of the ſeeming St. Edmund, in a religious devotion to expiate his Fathers Sacriledge, he built it anew moſt ſumptuouſly, and offered his own Crown upon the Martyrs Tomb. After the death of this Edmund, the Eaſt Angles Countrey was poſſeſt by the Danes, and ſo continued the ſpace of fifty years, until that Edmund ſurnamed the Elder, expelled thoſe Danes, and make that Kingdom a Province to the Weſt Saxons.

By that which hath been ſaid, it plainly appears, by what degrees the Britains loſt, and the Saxons got the whole poſſeſſion of this Iſland. For after that Vortigern, in the year 455. had called in the Saxons, every Britain King that ſucceeded him, loſt ſome part or other of it to the Saxons, till at the laſt in the year 689. Cadwallader the laſt Britain King loſt all; and then the Saxon Kings ſtriving amongſt themſelves for ſovereignty, they ſtill gained one upon another, till at laſt in the year 818. Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons reduced them all under his ſubjection, and then cauſed all the South of the Iſland to be called England, according to the Angles of whom himſelf came: after whom they were no longer properly called Saxon Kings, but Kings of England, Egbert the eighteenth King of the Weſt Saxons, is now become the firſt of the Kings of England, in whoſe time the Danes began firſt to infeſt the Land; as thinking they might do as much againſt the Saxons, as the Saxons had done againſt the Britains; but though they made divers Invaſions, and did great ſpoil, yet they were ſtill repelled. This King reigned ſix and thirty years, and died in the year 836. was buried at Wincheſter. Of his Iſſue, his Daughter Edith was made Governeſs of a Monaſtery of Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her Brother had given her, called Polleſwerth, ſituate in Arden, in the North part of the County of Warwick, where ſhe died and was buried, and the place in memory of her called St. Ediths of Polleſworth.

To Egbert ſucceeded his Son Ethelwolph, who in his youth was ſo addicted to a Religious life, that he was firſt made Deacon; and after Biſhop of Wincheſter; but his Father dying, he was intreated by his people to take upon him the Crown, and by Pope Gregory the fourth, was to that end abſolved of his Vow. His Reign was infeſted with many and great Invaſions of the Danes, to whom notwithſtanding he gave incredible overthrows. In the time of his Reign, remembring his former Religious Profeſſion, he ordained that riches and lands due to the Holy Church, ſhould be free from all Tribute or Regal Services, and in great devotion went himſelf to Rome, where he lived a year: confirmed the grant of Peter pence, and agreed beſides to pay yearly to Rome three hundred marks. Returning home through France, and being a Widower, he there married Judith, the beautiful daughter of Charles the Bald, then Emperour; in honour of whom in his own Court, he ever placed her in a chair of Eſtate, with all other Majeſtical complements of a Queen, contrary to the Law of the Weſt Saxons formerly made; which ſo much diſpleaſed his Lords, that for it they were ready to depoſe him: but howſoever he lived not long after, having reigned one and twenty years. His youngeſt Son Neote was much addicted to learning, and was one of the Divinity Readers in the Univerſity of Oxford, and founded a Monaſtery in Cornwal, which of him was called Neoteſtock; and being dead, his body was interred in the County of Huntington, at a place then called Arnulphsbury, and afterward, in regard of his interment, St. Neotes, and now St. Nedes. This King was famous for having four Sons, all of them were Kings of this Land ſucceſſively.

Firſt after him reigned his eldeſt Son Ethelbald, in the year 857. who to his eternal ſhame, took to wife Judith his Fathers Widow, reigned about two years, and dying, was buried at Shirborn in Dorſetſhire, at that time the Epiſcopal See. From this Judith, married afterward to the Earl of Flanders, after divers deſcents, came Maude the Wife of William the Conquerour, from whom are deſcended all our Kings ever ſince.

Next to the eldeſt reigned his ſecond Son Ethelbert, all whoſe reign, which was only five years, was perpetually diſquieted with Invaſions of the Danes, which yet were at laſt repelled. He died in the year 866. and was buried at Shirborn in Dorſetſhire.

The Danes invade England again.

Next to the ſecond reigned his third Son Ethelred, whoſe reign was more diſquieted with the Danes, then any other before: for they invading the Land, under the leading of Hungar, and Hubba, ſpoiled all the Countrey as they went, not ſparing Religious places; amongſt other, the goodly Monaſteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Huntington, they laid level with the ground: the Monks and Nuns they murthered or raviſhed: at which time a rare example of Chaſtity and Fortitude was ſeen in the Nuns of Coldingham: For to avoid the barbarous pollutions of theſe Pagans, they deformed themſelves by cutting off their upper lips and noſes. Nine Battels in one year, this King fought with the Danes, in moſt of them victorious; but at laſt received a wound whereof he died, and was buried in the Church at Winborn in Dorſetſhire.

Next to the third reigned his fourth Son Alfred, in whoſe time came over greater ſwarms of Danes then ever before, and had now got footing in the North, the Weſt, and South parts of this Iſland, leaving this King nothing of all his great Monarchy, but only Somerſet, Hampton, and Wiltſhire; and not theſe neither altogether free, ſo that he was forced ſometimes to flie into the Fens and Mariſh grounds to ſecure himſelf, where he lived by Fiſhing and Fowling, and hunting of wilde Beaſts, till at laſt learning policy from adverſity, and gathering courage from miſery, he ventured in the habit of a common Minſtrel, to enter the Danes Camp; where having viewed the manner of their encamping, and obſerved their ſecurity, he returned back, ſhewing his Lords in what condition he found them. Whereupon ſetting upon them at unawares, he not only made of them a great ſlaughter, but brought upon them a greater terror; for preſently upon this the Danes ſue for peace, and deliver Hoſtages for performance of theſe conditions: that their King ſhould receive Baptiſm, and their great Army depart quietly out of the Land. But though upon this agreement they departed for the preſent into France, yet the year following they returned with greater Forces, forraging all parts of the Countrey in moſt cruel manner, though ſtill encountred by this Valorous Prince, till he ended his life in the year 901. after he had reigned nine and twenty years. The Virtues of this King, if they were not incredible, they were at leaſt admirable, whereof theſe may be inſtances. The day and night containing four and twenty hours, hours, he deſigned equally to three ſpecial uſes, obſerving them by the burning of a Taper ſet in his Chappel; (there being at that time, no other way of diſtinguiſhing them.) Eight hours he ſpent in Contemplation, Reading, and Prayers: eight in proviſion for himſelf, his health and recreation, and the other eight in the affairs of the Common-wealth and State. His Kingdom likewiſe he divided into Shires, Hundreds, and Tythings: ordaining that no man might remove out of his Hundred without ſecurity: by which courſe he ſo ſuppreſſed Thieves and Robbers, which had formerly encreaſed by the long Wars, that it is ſaid a boy or girl might openly carry a bag of Gold or Silver, and carry it ſafely all the Countrey over: Beſides his great piety, he was alſo learned; and as far as it might be a commendation in a Prince, a skilful Muſician and excellent Poet. All former Laws he cauſed to be ſurveyed, and made choice of the beſt, which he tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue; as alſo the Paſtoral of St. Gregory, the Hiſtory of Bede, and Boetius his Conſolation of Philoſophy; the Pſalms of David likewiſe he began to tranſlate, but died before he could finiſh it. And ſo great a love he had to learning, that he made a Law, that all Freemen of the Kingdom, poſſeſſing two Hides of Land, ſhould bring up their Sons in Learning, till they were fifteen years of age at leaſt, that ſo they might be trained to know God, to be men of underſtanding, and to live happily. His Buildings were many, both for God's ſervice, and other publick uſe: as at Edlinſey a Monaſtery, at Wincheſter a new Minſter, and at Shaftesbury a houſe of Nuns; whereof he made his Daughter Ethelgeda the Abbeſs; but his foundation of the Univerſity of Oxford, exceeded all the reſt: which he began in the year 895. and to furniſh it with able Scholars, drew thither out of France, Grimbaldus and Scotus, and out of Wales, Aſſer, (who wrote his life) whoſe Lectures he honoured often with his own preſence: And for a ſtock of Frugality, he made a Survey of the Kingdom; and had all the particulars of his Eſtate Regiſtred in a Book, which he kept in his Treaſury at Wincheſter. He reigned ſeven and twenty years, and dying was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Peter at Wincheſter, though removed afterward into the Church of the new Monaſtery, without the North-gate of the City called Hyde. His wife Elſewith founded a Monaſtery of Nuns at Wincheſter, and was there buried. Their ſecond daughter Ethelgeda, took upon her the Vow of Virginity; and by her Fathers appointment was made a Nun of Shaftesbury, in the County of Dorſet, in the Monaſtery founded there by him, who is alſo accounted the founder of the Town it ſelf.

King Alfred being deceaſed, his Son Edward (called Edward the Elder) ſucceeded: not ſo Learned as his Father; but in Valour his equal, and ſuperior in Fortune; For firſt he overcame his Couſin Ethelwald, who aſpired to the Crown; then the Danes, whoſe chief Leader he ſlew in Battel; laſtly the Welch, but theſe laſt more by humility ſhewed to their Prince Leolyn, then by force of Arms. But yet he muſt not have all the glory of his time: ſome muſt be imparted to his Siſter Elfiede; who being married to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, had by him a Daughter, but with ſo grievous pains in her Travel, that ever after ſhe refuſed the Nuptial Bed of her Husband, ſaying, it was a fooliſh pleaſure that brought with it ſo exceſſive pains: and thereupon after her Husbands death, made choice to follow the Wars; aſſiſting her Brother both againſt the Welch, and againſt the Danes, whom ſhe brought to be at her diſpoſing. Dying ſhe was buried at Gloceſter, in the Monaſtery of St. Peter, which her Husband and her ſelf had built. King Edward himſelf, after four and twenty years Reign, deceaſed at Faringdon in Barkshire, in the year 924. and was buried in the new Monaſtery of Wincheſter, which his Father and himſelf wholly finiſhed: having had by his three Wives, ſix Sons and nine Daughters, of whom his eldeſt Son Athelſtan ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, whom his Grandfather King Alfred had with his own hands Knighted, in an extraordinary manner; putting upon him a purple Robe, and girding him with a Girdle wrought with Pearl. His ſecond Son Elfred, he ſo loved, that he cauſed him to be Crowned King with himſelf, which yet he enjoyed but a ſhort time, being taken away by death. His third Son Elſeward, preſently upon his Fathers death died himſelf alſo. His fourth Son Edwyn, was by his Brother Athelſtan, out of jealouſie of State, put into a little Pinnace, without either Tackle or Oars, accompanied only with one Page; with grief whereof, the young Prince leaped into the Sea, and drowned himſelf. His fifth and his ſixth Sons, Edmund, and Edred, came in ſucceſſion to be Kings of England. Of his Daughters, the eldeſt Editha, was marryed to Sithricke the Daniſh King of Northumberland, and he deceaſing, ſhe entred into a Monaſtery, which ſhe began at Tamworth in Warwickshire, and there died. His ſecond Daughter Elfiede, took upon her the Vow of Virginity, in the Monaſtery of Ramſey, in the County of Southampton, where ſhe died and was interred. His third Daughter Eguina, was firſt married to Charles the Simple, King of France; and after his deceaſe, to Herbert Earl of Vermandois. His fourth Daughter Ethelheld, became a Nun in the Monaſtery of Wilton, which was ſometime the head Town, giving name to the whole County of Wiltſhire, and anciently called Ellandon. That we may ſee in thoſe firſt times of Religion, when there was leaſt knowledge, there was moſt devotion. His fifth Daughter Edhold, was married to Hugh, ſurnamed the Great, Earl of Paris, and Conſtable of France. And Edgith his ſixth Daughter to Otho, the Emperour of the Weſt, ſurnamed the Great. His ſeventh Daughter Elgina, was married to a Duke of Italy. After the death of King Edward, his eldeſt Son Athelſtan ſucceeded, and was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, in the County of Surrey, by Athelmus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 924. The beginning of whoſe Reign, was moleſted with the Treaſon of one Elfrid a Nobleman; who being apprehended and ſent to Rome to purge himſelf, and there denying the act upon his Oath, fell ſuddenly down, and within three dayes died, to the eternal terror of all perjured perſons. Preſently upon this, another diſaſter befel King Athelſtan, for having cauſed his Brother Edwyn's death (as before is ſhewed) chiefly procured by his Cup-bearers ſuggeſtions; it happened not long after, that his Cup-bearer, in his Service at a Feſtival, ſtumbling with one foot, and recovering himſelf with the other, and ſaying merrily, See how one Brother helps another; his words put the King in remembrance of his Brother, whoſe death he had cauſed, and with remorſe thereof, not only cauſed his Cup-bearer to be put to death, but did alſo ſeven years penance; and built the two Monaſteries of Middleton, and Michelneſs, in the County of Dorſet, in expiation of his offence. This King ordained many good Laws, and thoſe to binde as well the Clergy as the Laity; amongſt which, one was the attachment of Felons, that ſtole above twelve pence, and were above twelve years old. Of this King there is one Act related, that may ſeem ridiculous; another that may ſeem miraculous: For what more ridiculous then that going to viſit the Tomb of St. John of Beverly, and having nothing elſe of worth to offer, he offered his Knife in devotion to the Saint? Yet the miraculous is more apparent; For going to encounter the Danes, and praying to God for good ſucceſs, he prayed withal, that God would ſhew ſome ſign of his rightful cauſe, and thereupon ſtriking with his Sword, he ſtruck it an ell deep into a hard ſtone, which ſtood ſo cloven a long time after: But whether this be true or no, this certainly is true, that he obtained many great victories againſt the Danes, againſt the Scots, againſt the Iriſh, and againſt the Welch, whoſe Princes he brought to be his tributaries, entring Covenant at Hereford, to pay him yearly twenty pound weight of Gold, three hundred of Silver, and five and twenty hundred head of Cattel; beſides a certain number of Hawks and Hounds. Laſtly, he joyned Northumberland to the reſt of his Monarchy, and enlarged his Dominions beyond any of his Predeceſſors: which made all neighbouring Princes to ſeek his friendſhip, and to gratifie him with rare preſents, as Hugh King of France ſent him the Sword of Conſtantine the Great, in the Hilt whereof was one of the Nails which faſtned Chriſt to his Croſs: he ſent him alſo the Spear of Charles the Great, reputed to be the ſame that pierced Chriſt's ſide; as alſo part of the Croſs whereon Chriſt ſuffered, and a piece of the Thorny Crown put upon his head. Likewiſe Otho the Emperour, who had marryed his Siſter, ſent him a veſſel of precious Stones, artificially made, wherein were ſeen Landskips with Vines, Corn, and Men, all of them ſeeming ſo artificially to move, as if they were growing and alive. Likewiſe the King of Norway ſent him a goodly Ship, with a gilt Stern, purple Sails, and the Deck garniſhed all with Gold. Of theſe accounted holy Relicks, King Athelſtan gave part to the Abbey of Saint Swithin in Wincheſter, and the reſt to the Monaſtery of Malmeſbury, whereof Adelm was the Founder, and his Tutelar Saint. He new built the Monaſteries of Wilton, Michelneſs, and Middleton; Founded Saint Germans in Cornwal, Saint Petrocus at Bodmyn, and the Priory of Pilton; new walled and beautified the City of Exeter, and enriched either with Jewels or Lands, every ſpecial Abbey of the Land. But the chiefeſt of his works for the ſervice of God, and good of his Subjects, was the Tranſlation of the Bible into the Saxon Tongue, which was then the Mother Tongue of the Land. He reigned fifteen years, died at Gloceſter, and was buried at Malmesbury, in the year 940. having never been marryed.

After the death of Athelſtan, his brother Edmund, the fifth Son of his Father, ſucceeded; and was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames: but no ſooner was the Crown ſet upon his head, but the Danes were upon his back; and in Northumberland made inſurrections; whom yet he not only repreſſed in that part, but took from them the Towns of Lincoln, Leiceſter, Darby, Stafford, and Nottingham; compelling them withal to receive Baptiſm, and to become his Subjects, ſo as the Countrey was wholly his as far as Humber. Cumberland alſo, which had been an entire Kingdom of it ſelf, and was now aided by Leolyn King of Southwales, he utterly waſted and gave it Malcolm King of Scots, to hold of him by Fealty. After his returning home, he ſet himſelf to ordain Laws for the good of his people, which Maſter Lambert hath ſince tranſlated into Latin. But after all his noble Acts both in War and Peace, he come at laſt to a lamentable end; for at his Mannor of Pucklekerks, in the County of Gloceſter, interpoſing himſelf to part a Fray between two of his Servants, he was thruſt through the body, and ſo wounded, that he died, and was buried at Glaſtenbury, after he had reigned five years, and ſeven months, leaving behinde him two young Sons, Edwyn, and Edgar.

His good Laws.

His unfortunate end.

King Edmund dying, his brother Edred in the minority of his Nephews, was Crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, by Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 946. Not as Protector, (it ſeems that kinde of Authority was not yet come in uſe) but as King himſelf, though with purpoſe to reſign, when the right Heir ſhould come of age; which at this time needed not, for while the right Heir was ſcarce yet fourteen years old, he reſigned to him the Kingdom, by reſigning his life to Nature, after he had twice repreſſed the rebelling Northumbrians, and twice forgiving their Rebelling, which yet was not a ſimple Rebellion; for they had ſent for Anlafe the Dane out of Ireland, and made him their King: which place for four years he held; and then weary of his Government, they thruſt him out, and take one Hericus to be their King, whom not long after they put down alſo; and then partly allured by the lenity of King Edred, and partly forced by his Arms, they ſubmit themſelves to him, and ask forgiveneſs; to whom he as a merciful Prince, grants an Act of Oblivion, and received them again into protection. This Prince was ſo devout and humble, that he ſubmitted his body to be chaſtiſed at the will of Dunſtan, Abbot of Glaſtenbury, and committed all his Treaſure and Jewels to his cuſtody. The ſtately Abbey of Mich at Abington near Oxford, built by King Inas, but deſtroyed by the Danes, he newly re-edified; endowing it with Revenues and Lands, the Charters whereof he con-confirmed with Seals of Gold. He ordained Saint Germans in Cornwal, to be a Biſhops See, which there continued, till by Canutus it was annexed to the Epiſcopal See of Kyrton in Devonſhire; both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confeſſor, tranſlated to the City of Exeter. He left behinde him two Sons, Elfred, and Bertfred, and was buried in the old Minſter, without the City of Wincheſter, whoſe bones with other Kings, are to this day preſerved in a gilt Coffer, fixed upon the Wall, in the South ſide of the Quire.

Exeter made the Epiſcopal See.

After Edred, not any of his Sons, but his Nephew Edwyn, the eldeſt Son of King Edmund ſucceeded, and was anointed and Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Otho, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 955. This Prince, though ſcarce fourteen years old, and in age but a childe, yet was able to commit ſin as a man; for upon the very day of his Coronation, and in ſight of his Lords, as they ſate in Council, he ſhamefully abuſed a Lady of great Eſtate, and his near Kinſwoman; and to mend the matter, ſhortly after ſlew her Husband; the more freely to enjoy his inceſtuous pleaſure. And whether for this infamous fact, or for thruſting the Monks out of the Monaſteries of Malmesbury, and Glaſtenbury, and placing married Prieſts in their rooms, as alſo for baniſhing Dunſtan the holy Abbot of Glaſtenbury out of the Realm, a great part of his Subjects hearts was ſo turned againſt him, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and ſwore Fealty to his younger brother Edgar; with grief, whereof, after four years reign, he ended his life, and was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hyde, at Wincheſter.

K. Edwyn's ſhameful fact at his Coronation.

After Edwyn, ſucceeded his younger Brother Edgar, at the age of ſixteen years; but his Coronation, when, and where, and by whom, ſo uncertain, that ſome ſay he was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the firſt year of his Reign; others ſay not till the twelfth, and William of Malmesbury not till the thirtieth: Another Chronicle ſaith, in his eleventh year; and that in the City of Bathe, by the hands of Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury. This King, by reaſon of the tranquility of his Reign, was ſurnamed the Peaceable; for as he was ſomething inclined to the Danes, ſo the Danes never offered to ſtir in all his time; and as for the Saxons, they acknowledged him their ſole Sovereign, without diviſion of Provinces or Titles. His Acts were ſome Virtuous, ſome Politick, ſome Juſt, ſome Pious; and yet all theſe not without ſome mixture of Vice. To repreſs drunkenneſs, which the Danes had brought in, he made a Law, ordaining a ſize, by certain pins in the pot; with penalty to any that ſhould preſume to drink deeper then the mark. It was a politick device which he uſed for the deſtruction of Wolves that in his dayes did great annoyance to the Land: For the tribute impoſed on the Princes of Wales, by King Athelſtan, he wholly remitted, appointing in lieu thereof, a certain number of Wolves yearly to be paid; whereof the Prince of North-Wales, for his part was to pay three hundred; which continued for three years ſpace: and in the fourth year, there was not a Wolf to be found; and ſo the tribute ceaſed. He had in his Navy Royal, three thouſand and ſix hundred Ships, which he divided into three parts, appointing every one of them to a ſeveral Quarter, to ſcowre the Seas, and to ſecure the Coaſts from Pirates: and leſt his Officers might be careleſs, or corrupted, he would himſelf in perſon ſail about all the Coaſts of his Kingdom every Summer. It was a notable Act of Juſtice, that in his Circuits and Progreſſes through the Countrey, he would take ſpecial account of the demeanour of his Lords; and ſpecially of his Judges; whom he ſeverely puniſhed, if he found them Delinquents. Wars he had none in all his Reign, only towards his end the Welſhmen moved ſome Rebellion; againſt whom he went with a mighty Army, and chaſtiſed the Authors: but when his Souldiers had gotten great ſpoils, and made prey upon the innocent Countrey people, he commanded them to reſtore it all back again; which, if it made ſome few Engliſh angry, it made the whole Countrey of the Welſh well pleaſed, and ſound forth his praiſes. His pious Acts were, that he built and prepared ſeven and forty Monaſteries, and meant to have made them up fifty, but was prevented by death. But now his mixture of Vice marred all; eſpecially being a Vice oppoſite to all thoſe Virtues, which was Laſciviouſneſs. For firſt, he deflowred a Sacred Nun, called Wolfchilde; on whom yet he begot a Saint, the chaſte Edyth. After her another Virgin, called Ethelflede, for her excellent beauty ſurnamed the White, on whom he begot his eldeſt Son Edward; for which Fact he did ſeven years penance enjoyned him by the Archbiſhop Dunſtan. After this he chanced to hear of a Virgin, Daughter to a Weſtern Duke, exceedingly praiſed for her beauty, and coming to Andover, commanded her to his Bed. But the Mother, tender of her Daughters honour, brought in the dark her Maid to him; who in the morning making haſte to riſe, and the King not ſuffering her to depart, ſhe told him what great work ſhe had to do, and how ſhe ſhould incur her Ladies diſpleaſure, if it were not done; by which words the King perceiving the deceit, turned it to a jeſt: but ſo well liked her company, that he kept himſelf true to her ever after, till he married. But now his marriage it ſelf happened by a greater vice then any of theſe; for hearing of the admirable beauty of Elfrida, the only Daughter of Ordganus, Duke of Devonſhire, Founder of Taveſtock Abby in that Countrey, he ſent his great Favourite Earl Ethelwold, (who could well judge of beauty) to try the truth thereof; with Commiſſion, that if he found her ſuch as Fame reported, he ſhould ſeize her for him, and he would make her his Queen. The young Earl, upon ſight of the Lady, was ſo ſurprized with her love, that he began to wooe for himſelf, and got her Fathers good will, ſo as the King would give his conſent. Hereupon the Earl poſted to the King, relating to him that the Maid was fair indeed, but nothing anſwerable to the Fame that went of her; yet deſired the King that he might marry her, as being her Fathers Heir, thereby to raiſe his Fortunes. The King conſented, and the marriage was ſolemnized. Soon after, the fame of her beauty began to ſpread more then before; ſo as the King much doubting that he had been abuſed, meant to try the truth himſelf, and thereupon taking occaſion of hunting in the Dukes Park, came to his houſe; whoſe coming Ethelwold ſuſpecting, acquainted his Wife with the wrong he had done both her, and the King; and therefore to prevent the Kings diſpleaſure, intreated her by all the perſwaſions he could uſe, to cloath her ſelf in ſuch attire, as might be leaſt fit to ſet her forth: but ſhe conſidering that now was the time to make the moſt of her beauty, and longing to be a Queen, would not be acceſſary to her own wrong, but decked her ſelf in her richeſt Ornaments, which ſo improved her beauty, that the King at the firſt ſight was ſtruck with admiration, and meant to be revenged of his perfidious Favourite; yet diſſembling his paſſion, till he could take him at advantage, he then with a Javelin ran him through; and having thereby made fair Elfrid a Widow, took her to be his Wife.

This King founded the Monaſtery of Ramſey in Hampſhire, reigned ſixteen years, lived ſeven and thirty, and with great Funeral pomp was buried in the Abby of Glaſtenbury. He had Children by his firſt Wife Ethelfleda, one Son named Edward, and by his ſecond Wife Elfrid, two Sons, one named Edmund, who died young, the other Ethelred. He had alſo one natural Daughter, named Edgyth by a Lady named Wolfchilde, the Daughter of Wolholme, the Son of Birding, the Son of Neſting; which two latter, bear in their names the memory of their Fortunes; the laſt of them being found in an Eagles neſt, by King Alfred as he was a hunting. This Edgyth built the Monaſtery and Church of Saint Dennis at Wilton, and was there buried.

After the death of King Edgar ſucceed his Son Edward, but not without ſome oppoſition, for Queen Elfrid combined with divers of the Lords, to make her Son Ethelred King, ſaying, that Prince Edward was illegitimate; on the other ſide, the Archbiſhop Dunſtan, and the Monks ſtood for Edward, abetting his Title as being lawfully born; but while the Council was aſſembled to argue their Rights, the Archbiſhop came in with his Banner and Croſs, and not ſtaying for debating de Jure, de Facto preſented Prince Edward for their lawful King, and the Aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy men, drew the approbation of the reſt; and thereupon Prince Edward was admitted, being but twelve years of age, and was Crowned King at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Archbiſhop Dunſtan, in the year 975. In the beginning of his Reign, it fell into debate whether married Prieſts were to be allowed to live in Monaſteries upon the Revenues of the Church. The Mercian Duke Alferus, favouring the cauſe of the married Prieſts, deſtroyed the Monaſteries in his Province, caſt out the Monks, and reſtored again the ancient Revenues to the Prieſts and their Wives. On the other ſide, Edelwyn Duke of the Eaſt Angles, and Brynoth Earl of Suſſex, who ſtood for the Monks, caſt married Prieſts out of their Provinces. Married Prieſts excluded from living in Monaſteries by what verdict.

cauſe was like to have the foil, till it was referred to the Rood, placed on the Refectory Wall where the Council ſate: For to this great Oracle Saint Dunſtan deſired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent ear for an anſwer, when ſuddenly a voice was heard to ſay, God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo. This was thought Authority ſufficient, to ſuppreſs the Prieſts, till they perſwading the people, that this was but a cunning practice of the Monks, in placing behinde the Wall, a man of their own, who through a Trunk uttered theſe words in the mouth of the Rood. Whereupon another Aſſembly was appointed at Cleve in Wiltſhire, whether repaired the Prelates, with moſt of all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom. The Synod being ſet, and the matter at the height of diſcuſſing, it happened that the Joyſts of the Room, where the Synod was held, ſuddenly brake, and the floor with all the people thereon, fell down, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlain; only the Archbiſhop Dunſtan, then Preſident, and mouth for the Monks, remained unhurt; which whether it were done by practice, or were miraculous, it ſerved the Monks turn for juſtifying their cauſe; and married Prieſts were thereupon diſcarded. It were infinite, and indeed ridiculous, to ſpeak of all the Miracles, reported to be done by this Saint Dunſtan, which may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.

But now a moſt lamentable diſaſter comes to be remembred: For King Edward, hunting one time in the Iſland of Purbeck, not far from Corfe Caſtle; where his Mother-in-Law, Queen Elfrid, with his Brother Prince Ethelred, were then reſiding, he out of his love to both, would needs himſelf alone go viſit them; where the cruel woman, out of ambition to bring her own Son to the Crown, cauſed one to run him into the back with a Knife, as he was drinking a Cup of Wine on Horſeback at his departing, who feeling himſelf hurt, ſet Spurs to his Horſe, thinking thereby to get to his company, but the wound being mortal, and he fainting through loſs of much blood, fell from his Horſe; but one foot being intangled in the Stirrup, he was thereby rufully dragged up and down, through Woods and Lands; and laſtly left dead at Corfes Gate; for which untimely death, he was ever after called by the name of Edward the Martyr. He reigned only three years and ſix months, and was buried firſt at Wincheſter, without all Funeral pomp, but after three years, by Duke Alferus removed, and with great ſolemnity interred in the Minſter of Shaftsbury. Queen Elfrid, to expiate this her bloody fact, built the two Monaſteries of Almeſbury, and Worwel, in the Counties of Wiltſhire, and Southampton, in which latter with great repentance, ſhe lived till her death.

K. Edwards lamentable end by the wickedneſs of his Mother-in-law: and called the Martyr.

After the death of Edward the Martyr, dying at the age of ſixteen years, his half Brother Ethelred, at the age of twelve years, in the year 979. was Crowned King at Kingſtone upon Thames by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury, though much againſt his will; which King by reaſon of his backwardneſs in Action, was commonly called the Unready. At the Coronation of this Prince St. Dunſtan in a Prophetick ſpirit ſpirit denounced on him and the Kingdom, the wrath and indignation of Almighty God in theſe words following: Becauſe (ſaith he) thou haſt aſpired to the Crown by the death of thy Brother whom thy Mother hath murthered; therefore hear the word of the Lord: The Sword ſhall not depart from thy houſe, but ſhall furiouſly rage all the dayes of thy life, killing of thy ſeed, till ſuch time as thy Kingdom ſhall be given to a people whoſe cuſtoms and language the Nation thou now governeſt, know not. Neither ſhall thy ſin, the ſin of thy Mother, and the ſin of thoſe men, who were partakers of her Counſels, and Executors of her wicked deſigns, be expiated but by a long; and moſt ſevere vengeance. Which prediction of the Holy Archbiſhop was ſeconded by Prodigies, and by the diſaſterous calamities which fell on him, his houſe, and the whole confirmed for truth. Beſides this, moſt remarkable are the propheſies of a holy man in the time of this King Ethelred. Before whoſe time, for two and twenty years paſt the Danes had lived as quiet inmates with the Engliſh: but whether weary of ſo long doing nothing, or finding now opportunity of doing ſomething, in the ſecond year of this King, they begin to ſtir, and inviting from home, Forces, who in ſeven Ships arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent; they ſpoiled all the Countrey, ſpecially the Iſle of Thanet, and continued this courſe of forraging the Kingdom, ſometimes in one part, and ſometimes in another, for eleven years together: till at laſt, in the year 991. the King by advice of his Lords, of whom Siricius the now Archbiſhop of Canterbury was chief, was contented to pay them ten thouſand pounds, upon condition they ſhould quietly depart the Realm. This ſerved the turn for the preſent, but was ſo far from ſatisfying them, that it did but give them the greater appetite: for the year following they came again, and that with a greater fleet then before, againſt whom the King prepared a competent Navy, and committed it to Elfrick, Earl of Mercia, but he proving treacherous (as indeed all other for the moſt part did, whom the King imployed againſt the Danes, as with whom they were allianced in blood) the Danes ſo prevailed, that for the next compoſition, they had ſixteen thouſand pounds given them, and a year after, twenty thouſand; and ſo every year more and more, till it came at laſt to forty thouſand: by which means, the Land was emptied of all coin, and the Engliſh were brought ſo low, that they were fain to Till, and Ear the Ground, whilſt the Danes ſate idle, and eat the fruit of their labours, abuſing the Wives and Daughters of their Hoaſts, where they lay, and yet in every place, for very fear, were called Lord Danes; (which afterward became a word of deriſion when one would ſignifie a lazy Lubber.) In this diſtreſſed ſtate, the King at laſt bethought himſelf of a courſe: he ſent forth a ſecret Commiſſion into every City within his Dominions; that at an appointed time, they ſhould maſſacre all the Danes that were amongſt them: the day was the thirteenth of November, being the Feſtival of St. Bricius, in the year 1002. His command was accordingly performed, and with ſuch rigour, that in Oxford the Danes for refuge took into the Church of St. Frideſwide, as into a Sanctuary, when the Engliſh, neither regarding place nor perſon, ſet the Church on fire, wherein many of the Danes were burnt, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. And who would not now think, but that England by this Fact had clean ſhaken off the Daniſh yoke for ever? yet it proved clean otherwiſe: For the news of this maſſacre, adding a new edge of revenge, to the old edge of ambition, made the Danes ſharper ſet againſt the Engliſh, then ever they had been before; ſo as the year following, their King Sweyne, with a mighty Navy entred the Countrey, razed and levelled with the ground the City of Exeter, all along from the Eaſt Gate to the Weſt: againſt whom the King levied an Army, and made General over it the Earl Edrick, his great Favourite, whom he had created Duke of Mercia, and given him his Daughter Edgith in marriage; yet all this great favour could not keep him from being treacherous, for being ſent Ambaſſadour to the Danes, to mediate for peace, he revealed to them the weakneſs of the Land, and treacherouſly diſſwaded them from conſenting to any Truce. Upon this King Ethelred gave order, that every three hundred and ten Hides of Land ſhould build a Ship, and every eight Hides finde a compleat Armour furniſhed; yet all this great preparation came to nothing, but only to make a ſhow. After this, the King ſeeing no end of their Invaſions; nor promiſe kept upon any compoſition; (for three Daniſh Princes, with a great Fleet were now newly arrived) he intended to adventure once for all, and to commit his cauſe to God, by the fortune of a Battel. To which end he ſecretly gathered a mighty power, and coming unlooked for, when the Enemy was unprepared, he had certainly given an end to the Quarrel, if the wicked Edrick had not diſſwaded him from fighting, and put him into a cauſleſs fear, by forged tales. After this the Danes forraged many Countries, burnt Oxford, Thetford, and Cambridge; and laſtly, entred Wiltſhire, which was the ſeventh ſhire in number, they had laid waſte like a Wilderneſs. The year after they make a new Expedition, and beſiege Canterbury; which by treaſon of a Church-man they won, took Alphegus the Archbiſhop, and ſlew nine hundred Monks, and men of Religion, beſides many Citizens, without all mercy; for they Tythed the people, ſlaying all by nines, and reſerving only the tenth to live; ſo that of all the Monks in the Town, there were but four ſaved, and of the Lay-people, four thouſand eight hundred; by which account Maſter Lambert collecteth, that there dyed in this Maſſacre three and forty thouſand, and two hundred perſons. The Archbiſhop Alphegus, for that he refuſed to charge his Tenants with three thouſand pounds to pay for his Ranſome, they moſt cruelly ſtoned to death at Greenwich. Turkillus the leader of theſe Murtherers, took into his poſſeſſion all Norfolk and Suffolk, over whom he tyrannized in moſt ſavage manner; the reſt compounding with the Engliſh for eight thouſand pounds, quietly for a while ſojourned among them. The year following came King Sweyne again, and with a great Navy arrived in the mouth of Humber, and landed at Gainsborough, to whom the Northum- thumbrians, and the people of Lindſey yielded themſelves; ſo that now over all the North from Watlingſtreet, he reigned ſole King, and exacted pledges of them for their further obedience. From the North he paſſed into the South, ſubduing all before him till he came to London, where he was ſo valiantly encountred by the Londoners, that he was glad to retire, in which retiring notwithſtanding he entred Bathe; where Ethelmore Earl of Devonſhire, with his Weſtern people, ſubmitted himſelf to him. Yet after this, between him and the Engliſh was ſtruck a fierce Battel, which had been with good ſucceſs, if the treachery of ſome in turning to the Danes, had not hindred it. After this the Danes proceeded on victoriouſly, and had gotten moſt part of the Land, and even London alſo by ſubmiſſion: whereupon the unfortunate King Ethelred, ſending his Wife Emma, with her two Sons, Edward and Alfred, to her Brother Duke of Normandy, himſelf alſo the Winter following paſſed thither, leaving the Danes Lording it in his Realm. Sweyne now as an abſolute King, extorted from the Engliſh both Victuals and Pay for his Souldiers; and demanding ſuch a Compoſition for preſerving of St. Edmunds Monaſtery in Suffolk, as the Inhabitants were not able, and therefore refuſed to pay: he thereupon threatned ſpoil, both to the Place, and to the Martyrs bones that were interred, when ſuddenly in the midſt of his jollity (ſaith Hoveden) he cried out, that he was ſtruck by Saint Edmund with a Sword, being then in the midſt of his Lords, and no man ſeeing from whoſe hand it came; and ſo with great horrour and torment, three dayes after, upon the third of February, he ended his life at Thetford, or (as others ſay) at Gainsborough. And now who would not think but this was a fair opportunity offered to the Engliſh, to free themſelves wholly from the Daniſh yoke? but when all was done, either croſſed by treachery, or fruſtrated by misfortune, nothing proſpered. It is true, upon this occaſion of Sweyne's death, King Ethelred returned out of Normandy, but at his coming Canutus the Son of Sweyne, had gotten the people of Lindſey to be at his devotion, and to finde him both Horſe and Men againſt their own King; ſo as Ethelred was now to encounter as well his own Subjects as Danes, which he did ſo valiantly, that he made Canutus glad to return into Denmark, as utterly hopeleſs of any good to be done in England. And now one would certainly think the Danes had been removed, Root and Branch, out of England, and never like to trouble the Land any more; and indeed there was all the appearance of probability for it that could be. But it is a true ſaying, That which will be, ſhall be, let all be done that can be. For now Turkil the Dane, who had beforerevolted to King Ethelred, growing ſenſible of his fault, which was this, or no way to be redeemed; and tender of his Countrey-mens caſe, which was now or never to be helpt, with nine of his Ships ſailed into Denmark; and firſt excuſing himſelf to Canutus for his former defection, as though he had done it of purpoſe, to learn all advantages againſt the Engliſh, which now he could diſcover to him: ſo he prevailed with Canutus once again to try his fortune, that with a Navy of two hundred Ships he ſet ſail for England, and landed at Sandwich, where he gave the Engliſh a great overthrow, and paſſed victoriouſly through the Counties of Dorſet, Somerſet, and Wilts. When (Ethelred lying dangerouſly ſick at Coſſam) the managing of the War was committed to Prince Edmund his Son, who preparing to give the Danes Battel, had ſuddenly notice given him, that his Brother-in-law Edrick meant to betray him into his Enemies hands, which made him ſuſpend his proceeding: and Edrick perceiving his deſign to be diſcovered, caſt off the Maſque, and with forty of the Kings Ships fled openly to the Enemy; and thereupon, all the Weſt Countries ſubmitted themſelves unto Canutus. By this time King Ethelred having recovered his ſickneſs, prepared to go on with the Battel, which his Son Edmund had intended; but his Forces being aſſembled, he likewiſe had ſuddenly notice given him, that his Subjects meant to betray him to the Danes. Hereupon he withdrew himſelf to London, as the place in which he moſt confided; where falling into a relapſe of his former ſickneſs, he ended his unfortunate dayes in the year 1016. when he had reigned 37. years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, whoſe bones as yet remain in the North Wall of the Chancel, in a Cheſt of gray Marble, adjoyning to that of Sebba, King of the Eaſt Saxons. He had by his two Wives, eight Sons, and four Daughters; of whom his youngeſt named Goda, was married to one Walter de Maigne, a Nobleman of Normandy, by whom ſhe had a Son named Rodolph, which Rodolph had a Son named Harold, created afterward by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudely in the County of Gloceſter, and Anceſtor to the Barons of that place ſucceeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudely, now being.

K. Ethelred called the Unready.

Ethelred being dead, his third Son Edmund called Ironſide (of his ability in enduring labour) but the eldeſt living at his Fathers death, ſucceeded, and was crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Levingus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1016. A great part of the Engliſh both feared and favoured, and indeed out of fear favoured Canutus; eſpecially the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, and ſware Fealty to him: but the Londoners ſtood firm to Prince Edmund, and were the principal authors of his Election. Canutus before the death of King Ethelred, had beſieged the City, and now with a large Trench encompaſſed it: but the new King Edmund coming on, raiſed the ſiege, and made Canutus fly to the Iſle of Sheppey, where having ſtaid the Winter, the Spring following, he aſſailed the Weſt of England, and at Penham in Dorſetſhire, a Battel was fought, and the Danes diſcomfited. After this, in Worceſterſhire at a place called Sheroſtan, another Battel was fought, where the Danes were like again to be diſcomfited: but the traiterous Edrick perceiving it, he cut off the head of a Souldier like unto King Edmund both in hair and countenance, and ſhaking his bloody Sword, with the gaſping head, crying to the Army of the Engliſh, Flie ye wretches, flie, and get away, for your King is ſlain; behold, behold, here is his head; but King Edward having notice of this treacherous ſtratagem, haſted to ſhew himſelf where he might beſt be ſeen; whoſe ſight ſo encouraged his men, that they had gotten that day a final victory, if night had not prevented them. Duke Edrick excuſes his Fact, as being miſtaken in the countenance of the man, and deſirous to ſave the blood of the Engliſh; upon which falſe colour he was received into favour again. After this, Canutus ſecretly in the night brake up his Camp, and marched towards London, which in a ſort was ſtill beſieged by the Daniſh Ships: but King Edmund hearing of his departure, followed him, and with ſmall adoe removed the Siege, and in triumphant manner entred the City. After this near unto Otford in Kent, was another great Battel fought, in which Canutus loſt four thouſand five hundred men, and King Edmund only ſix hundred; the reſt of the Danes ſaving themſelves by flight: whom if King Edmund had purſued, it is thought that day had ended the Wars between theſe two Nations for ever. But the ever traiterous Edrick, kept King Edmund from purſuing them, by telling him of Ambuſhes and other dangers: ſo as Canutus had leaſure to paſs over into Eſſex, but thither alſo King Edmund followed him; where at Aſhdon three miles from Saffron Walden, another Battel was fought, in which the Danes being at the point to be overthrown, the traiterous Edrick with all his Forces revolted to their ſide; by which treachery the Engliſh loſt the day. There died of King Edmund's Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwyn, Duke Athelwald, Duke Athelwyn, Earl Urchil, Codnoth Biſhop of Lincoln, Wolſey Abbot of Ramſey, with many other. The remembrance of which Battel is retained to this day, by certain ſmall hills there remaining, whence have been digged the bones of men, armour; and horſe-bridles, After this at Dereherſt, near to the River Severn, another Battel war ready to be fought; when ſuddenly, a certain Captain ſteps forth, and for ſaving of blood, uſed great perſwaſions, that either they ſhould try the Battel by ſingle Combat, or elſe divide the Kingdom betwixt them: Upon this the Combat is agreed on, and the two Princes entring into a ſmall Iſland called Alney, adjoyning to the City of Gloceſter, in compleat Armour aſſailed each other; at firſt on Horſe-back, and after on foot: when Canutus having received a dangerous wound, and finding himſelf overmatched in ſtrength, deſired a Compromiſe, and with a loud voice uſed theſe words. What neceſſity ſhould move us, moſt valiant Prince, for obtaining of a Title to endanger our lives? were it not better to lay malice aſide, and condeſcend to a loving agreement? let us therefore become ſworn Brothers, and divide the Kingdom between us. This motion was by King Edmund accepted, and thus was the Kingdom divided between theſe two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part which lies upon the Coaſt of France, and Canutus the reſt. But now Duke Edrick hath his laſt and greateſt act of treachery to play; for King Edmund being retired to a place for natures neceſſity, he thruſt from under the draught a ſharp Spear into his Body, and then cutting off his head preſented it to Canutus, with theſe fawning words, All hail, thou ſole Monarch now of England, for here behold the head of thy Co-partner, which for thy ſake I have adventured to cut off. Canutus though ambitious enough of ſovereignty, yet abaſhed at ſo diſloyal a fact, replyed and vowed, that in reward of that ſervice, his own head ſhould be advanced above all the Peers of his Kingdom: which ſoon after he performed; for by his command the falſe Edrick's head was cut off, and placed upon the higheſt Gate of London. Matthew of Weſtminſter and Huntingdon, relates this murther to have been acted by Edrick's own Son, at the commandment of his Father: William Malmesbury writes that the King was killed by two Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber, hired by the ſame diſloyal Edrick; notwithſtanding Roger Hoveden reports, that he died a natural death at London. The death of this King in this manner, ſome ſay, was acted at Oxford; others, that he died of a natural ſickneſs in London; but howſoever he came to his death, his reign was but only ſeven months, and his body was buried at Glaſtenbury, near to his Grandfather King Edgar. This King Edmund had by his Wife Algyth, two Sons; the eldeſt named Edward, ſurnamed the Out-law, becauſe he lived out of England, in Hungary, as a baniſhed man, for fear of King Canutus: but when his Uncle King Edward the Confeſſor had obtained the Crown, he was recalled, and honourably entertained till he died, He married Agatha, Siſter to Queen Sophia, Wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and Daughter to the Emperour Henry the Second; by whom he had Edgar ſurnamed Atheling, the right Heir of the Engliſh Crown, though he never enjoyed it. The ſecond Son of Ironſide was called after his Fathers name Edmund. King Edmund had alſo two Daughters, Margaret and Chriſtian, of whom the younger became a Veyled Nun at Ramſey in Hampſhire; the elder Margaret, after ſole Heir to the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third King of Scotland, from which princely bed in a lineal Deſcent, our High and Mighty Monarch King James the firſt, doth in his moſt Royal Perſon, unite the Britains, Saxons, Normans, and Scotiſh Imperial Crowns in one.

Of the firſt DANISH King in England.

Canutus poſſeſt of the whole Kingdom.

Canutus being poſſeſt of half the Kingdom by compoſition with King Edward, now after his death ſeiſed upon the whole, and to prevent all further queſtion, he called a Council of the Engliſh Nobility, wherein it was propounded, whether in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claim of Title to the Crown had been reſerved for King Edmunds Brethren or Sons; to which (not daring to ſay otherwiſe) they abſolutely anſwered no, and thereupon took all of them the Oath of Allegiance to Canutus. Being thus cleared of all oppoſites, he prepared with great ſolemnity for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Levingus ſurnamed Elſtane, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1017. being the firſt Dane that reigned Monarch of England. But Canutus not thinking himſelf ſufficiently ficiently ſafe, as long as any that might pretend, were in the peoples eye, cauſed firſt Edwyn the Son of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund, to abjure the Realm, who was yet afterward recalled; and treacherouſly murthered by his own men, and his body buried at Taveſtock in Devonſhire. Next were the two ſons of Edmund Ironſide, Edward, and Edmund, whom to the end the people might not ſee him ſhed the blood of Innocents, he ſent to his half Brother, King of Sweden, to be made away: but the King of Sweden more compaſſionate and noble, then this jealous and cruel Dane, ſent the young Princes into Hungary, to Salomon (the King thereof) in whoſe Court they were brought up and preferred, as we have before mentioned. Then remained Edward and Alfred, the Sons of King Ethelred, and them their Mother Queen Emma had ſent away before to her Brother the Duke of Normandy, there to be in ſafety: ſo as none of the Royal Blood was now left in the Land, to give Canutus any fear of competition.

He marries Queen Emma.

After this he took to Wife the virtuous Lady Emma, the Relict of King Ethelred, by which match he procured to himſelf three great benefits: one that he won the love of the people by marrying a Lady whom they ſo intirely loved; another, that he got the Alliance of the Duke of Normandy, a neighbouring Prince of great power; the third, that by marrying the Mother, he ſecured himſelf againſt the Sons: as likewiſe Queen Emma was not unwillingly perſwaded to the match, upon agreement to make her Iſſue, if he had any by her, to inherit the Crown of England. And to win the love of the people more, he cauſed great numbers of his Danes, who peſtered the Countrey, to return home, beſtowing amongſt them for their ſatisfaction, fourſcore and two thouſand pounds. And to win the love of the people yet more, he now ſet himſelf to the making of good Laws, in a Parliament at Oxford; whereof, for a pattern of thoſe times, ſome that concern Religion, may not unfitly be here related.

He makes good Laws.

First, for the celebration of Divine Service, it was ordained, that all Ceremonies tending to the encreaſe of Reverence and Devotion ſhould be uſed as need required.

The Sabbath to be ſtrictly obſerved.

Secondly, that upon the Sabbath day, all publick Fairs, Markets, Synods, Huntings, and all ſecular actions ſhould be forborn, unleſs ſome urgent neceſſity ſhould require it.

The Communion to be received thrice a year.

Thirdly, that every Chriſtian ſhould thrice in the year receive the bleſſed Sacrament of the Lords Supper.

Fourthly, that if a Miniſter of an Altar killed a man, or committed any notorious crime, he ſhould be deprived both of his Order and Dignity.

A married woman convict of adultery, to have her noſe and ears cut off.

Fifthly, that a married woman convict of Adultery, ſhould have her noſe and ears cut off.

Sixthly, That a widow marrying within a twelve month after her Husbands deceaſe ſhould loſe her Joynture.

Theſe and many other good Laws were made, whereby the Kingdom remained during all his time, in a moſt peaceable ſtate and government.

In the third year of his Reign he heard how the Vandals taking advantage of his abſence, had entred Denmark, and annoyed his Subjects; whereupon with a great Army of Engliſh he paſſed over the Seas, and gave them Battel, but with ill ſucceſs the firſt day; when preparing for the next dayes Battel, the Earl Goodwyn who was the General of the Engliſh, ſecretly in the dead of the night, ſet upon the Vandals Camp, and with a great ſlaughter of their Souldiers, made their two Princes, Ulfus and Anlave, to flie the Field. In the morning it was told Canutus that the Engliſh were fled, for that their ſtation was left, and not a man of them to be found, which did not a little trouble his patience: but he going in perſon to ſee the truth, found the great overthrow the Engliſh had given, for which ſervice ever after he held the Engliſh, and eſpecially the Earl Goodwyn, in great eſtimation. After this, returning home, he made a proſperous expedition againſt Malcolme, King of Scots; and at laſt, in the fifteenth year of his Reign, wearied with the honourable troubles of the world, and out of a devotion,

He takes a journey to Rome.

he took a Journey to Rome, to viſit the Sepulchre of St. Peter and Paul, from whence he writ to the Biſhops, and Nobility of England, that they ſhould carefully adminiſter Juſtice, and never ſeek to advance his profit by any undue wayes, or with the detriment of any man.

He builds divers Monaſteries.

At his return from Rome, he built in Eſſex the Church of Aſhdon, where he got the Victory againſt King Edmund; in Norfolk, the Abbey of St. Benets, which Saint he greatly reverenced; and in Suffolk the Monaſtery of Saint Edmund, which Saint he deadly feared.

A Jewel as much worth as the revenues of England.

To the Church of Wincheſter he gave many rich Jewels, whereof one was a Croſs, valued to be worth as much as the whole revenue of England amounted to in one year. To Coventry he gave the arm of the great St. Auſtin, which he bought at Pavia in his return from Rome, for which he paid an hundred Talents of Silver, and one of Gold.

His Act for convincing his flatterers

One ſtrange act is recorded, which he did for convincing his fawning flatterers, who uſed to tell him that his powers were more then humane; For being one time at Southampton, he commanded that his Chair of State ſhould be ſet on the ſhoar when the Sea began to flow, and then ſitting down there in the preſence of his many attendants, he ſpake thus to that Element: I charge thee that thou preſume not to enter my Land, nor wet theſe Robes of thy Lord that are about me. But the Sea giving no heed to his command, but keeping on his uſual courſe of Tyde, firſt wet his skirts, and after his thighs, whereupon ſuddenly ariſing, he thus ſpake in the hearing of them all: Let all the worlds Inhabitants know, that vain and weak is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy of the name of King, but he that keeps both Heaven and Earth and Sea in obedience. After which time he would never ſuffer the Crown to be ſet upon his head: but preſently Crowned therewith the Picture of Chriſt on the Croſs at Wincheſter; from which example aroſe perhaps the Cuſtom, to hang up the Armour of worthy men in Churches, as Offerings conſecrated to him who is the Lord of Battel.

Hanging up the armour of worthy men in Churches, from whence it began.

When he had reigned nineteen years, he deceaſed at Shaftesbury in the County of Dorſet, the twelfth of November, in the year 1035. and was buried in the Church of the old Monaſtery at Wincheſter; which being after new built, his bones with many other Engliſh Saxon Kings, were taken up, and are preſerved in in gilt Coffers, fixed upon the Walls of the Quire in that Cathedral Church. He had by his two Wives, three Sons, Sweyne and Harold by his firſt Wife Alfgive; and Hardiknute by his ſecond Wife Queen Emma, and two Daughters, of whom the eldeſt, called Guinhilda, was marryed to the Roman Emperour Henry the third, who being accuſed of Adultery, and none found to defend her cauſe, at laſt an Engliſh Page, a very boy and dwarf, who for the littleneſs of his ſtature, was generally, and jeaſtingly ſurnamed Mimecan, adventured to maintain her Innocency againſt a mighty Giant-like Combatant; who in fight, at one blow, cutting the ſinews of his adverſaries leg, with another he felled him to the ground, and then with his Sword, taking his head from his ſhoulders, redeemed both the Empereſſes life and honour. But the Empereſs after this hard uſage forſook her Husbands Bed, and took upon her the Veil of a Nun, in the Town of Burges in Flanders, where ſhe devoutly ſpent the reſt of her life.

Of the ſecond DANISH King in England.

KIng Canutus dying, left his Kingdom of Norway to his eldeſt Son Sweyne, and his Kingdom of England, to his youngeſt Son Hardiknute, whom he had by his Wife Emma; but he being at the time of his Fathers death in Denmark, Harold his elder Brother by a former Wife, taking advantage of his abſence, layes claim to the Crown. For determining of which Right, the Lords aſſembled at Oxford, where Queen Emma pleaded for her Son Hardiknute, urging the Covenant of Canutus at their Marriage, and his laſt Will at his death; as alſo Earl Godwyn of Kent did the like, being left Guardian of her Children, and keeper of his laſt Will. But Harold's preſence, together with the favour of the Londoners, Danes, and Northumbrians, ſo wrought with the Lords, that the abſent Hardiknute was neglected, and Harold was proclaimed and crowned King at Oxford, by Elnothus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1036.

Harold ſucceedeth his Father Canutus.

Harold having now attained the Crown, was not ſo jealous of his Brother Hardiknute, as of his Mother-in-law Queen Emma, and her Sons by King Ethelred, who were beyond Sea; and therefore how to ſecure himſelf againſt theſe was his firſt care: For effecting whereof, he framed a Letter, as written by Queen Emma, to her two Sons Edward and Alfred; inſtigating them to attempt the Crown uſurped by Harold, againſt their Right: to which Letter, coming firſt to the hands of Alfred, he ſuſpecting no fraud, returned anſwer, that he would ſhortly come over, and follow her counſel. And thereupon with a ſmall Fleet, and ſome few Souldiers lent him by Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, he took the Sea for England, where coming to ſhore, Earl Godwyn met him, and bound himſelf by Oath to be his guide to his Mother Queen Emma, but being wrought firm for Harold, he led him and his company a contrary way, and lodged them at Guilford, making known to King Harold what he had done, who preſently committed them all to ſlaughter, ſparing only every tenth man, for ſervice of ſale. Prince Alfred himſelf he ſent Priſoner to the Iſle of Ely, where having his eyes inhumanely put out, in grief and torment he ended his life. Some add a more horrible kinde of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawn out, and faſtned to a ſtake, his body pricked with Needles, or Poignards, and forced about till all his entrails were extracted: This done, then he ſet upon Queen Emma, confiſcating her Goods, and baniſhed her the Realm. And now further to ſecure himſelf, he kept the Seas with ſixteen Daniſh Ships, to the maintenance whereof, he charged the Engliſh with great payments; by which, if he procured the ſafety of his perſon, he certainly procured the hatred of his Subjects. This King for his ſwiftneſs in running was called Harefoot, but though by his ſwiftneſs he out-run his Brother for the Kingdom, yet could not he run ſo faſt, but that death quickly overtook him: For having reigned only four years and ſome months, he dyed at Oxford, and was buried at Weſtminſter, having never had Wife or Children.

Of the third and laſt DANISH King in England.

KIng Harold being dead, the Lords to make amends for their former neglect, ſent now for Hardiknute, and offer him their Allegiance, who accepteth their offer, and thereupon taking Sea, arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent, the ſixth day after he had ſet ſail out of Denmark; and with great pomp conveyed to London, was there crowned King by Elnothus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1040. His firſt act was to be revenged of his deceaſed Brother Harold, whoſe body he cauſed to be digged up, and thrown into the Thames, where it remained till a Fiſherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of St. Clement without Temple-Bar; commonly called St. Clement Danes, becauſe it was the burying place of the Danes, as ſome write. But towards his Mother and half Brother Prince Edward, he ſhewed true natural affection, inviting them both to return into England, where he received them with all the honour, that from a Son or Brother could be expected.

Hardiknute ſucceedeth Harold.

St. Clement Danes why ſo called.

But now, as the King Harold, for his ſwiftneſs in running, was ſurnamed Harefoot; ſo this King for his intemperance in dyet, might have been ſurnamed Swineſmouth, or Bocca di Porco; for his Tables were ſpread every day four times, and furniſhed with all kindes of curious diſhes, as delighting in nothing but gormandizing and ſwilling; and as for managing the State, he committed it wholly to his Mother Queen Emma, and to the politick Earl of Kent, Godwyn; who finding this weakneſs in the King, began to think himſelf of aſpiring; and to make the better way for it, he ſought by all means to alien the Subjects hearts from the Prince; amongſt other courſes he cauſed him to lay heavy Taxes upon them, only for Ship-money to pay his Danes, amounting to two and thirty thouſand pounds: which was ſo offenſive to the people, that the Citizens of Worceſter ſlew two of his officers, Thurſtan and Feudax, that came to collect it. But this King had ſoon the reward of his intemperance; for in a ſolemn Aſſembly and Banquet at Lambeth, revelling and carowſing, he ſuddenly fell down without ſpeech, or breath, after he had reigned only two years, and was buried at Winchester. His death was ſo welcome to his Subjects, that the day of his death is to this day commonly celebrated with open paſtimes in the ſtreet, and is called Hocks-tide, ſignifying ſcorn or contempt, which fell upon the Danes by his death; For with him ended the Reign of the Danes in England, after they had miſerably afflicted the Kingdom, for the ſpace of two hundred and forty years; though in regal Government, but only ſix and twenty.

He dies ſuddenly.

A day called Hocks-tide, and why.

Of English Kings again, and firſt of Edward the Confeſſour.

Edward the Confeſſour ſucceedeth Hardiknute.

King Hardiknute dying without Iſſue, as having never been married, and the Daniſh line clean extinguiſhed, Edward for his Piety called the Confeſſour, half Brother to the deceaſed Hardiknute, and Son to King Ethelred by his Wife Queen Emma, was by a general conſent admitted King of England, and was Crowned at Winchester by Edſyne Archbiſhop of Canterbury, on Eaſter-day, in the year 1042. being then of the age of forty years. He was born at Iſlip near to Oxford; and after his Fathers death, for ſafety ſent into France, to the Duke of Normandy, his Mothers Brother, from whence he now came to take upon him the Crown of England. His Acts for gaining the peoples love, were firſt, the remitting the yearly tribute of forty thouſand pounds, gathered by the name of Dane-gilt, which had been impoſed by his Father, and for forty years together paid out of all mens Lands, but only the Clergy; and then from the divers Laws of the Mercians, Weſt Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he ſelected the beſt, and made of them one body certain, and written in Latin, being in a ſort the Fountain of thoſe which at this day we term the Common of Laws, though the forms of pleading, and proceſs therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquerour. The Reign of this King was very peaceable, only in his ſixth year the Daniſh Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-coaſts of Eſſex they ſpoiled, and then in Flanders made merchandize of their prey. As likewiſe the Iriſh, with thirty Ships entred Severn, and with the aſſiſtance of Griffyth King of South-wales, burnt or ſlew all in their way, till at laſt Reeſe the Brother of Griffyth was ſlain at Bulenden, and his head preſented to King Edward at Gloceſter. His Domeſtical troubles were only by Earl Godwin and his Sons; who yet after many conteſtations and affronts were reconciled, and Godwin received again into as great favour as before. But although King Edward forgave his Treaſons, yet the Divine Providence did not; for ſoon after as he ſate at Table with the King on Eaſter-Monday, we was ſuddenly ſtrucken with death, and on Thurſday following dyed, and was buried at Winchester. Some make his death more exemplar, as that juſtifying himſelf for Prince Alfrid's death, he ſhould pray to God, that if he were any way guilty of it, he might never ſwallow down one morſel of bread, and thereupon by the juſt Judgement of God was choaked by the firſt morſel he offered to eat.

He remits Dane-gilt.

He ordained the common Laws.

Earl Godwin puniſhed by the Divine hand.

In this Kings time ſuch abundance of ſnow fell in January, continuing till the middle of March following, that almoſt all Cattel and Fowl periſhed, and therewith an exceſſive dearth followed.

Extremity of Snow.

Two Acts are related of this King, that ſeem nothing correſpondent to the general opinion had of his Virtue, one concerning his Mother, the other touching his Wife: That concerning his Mother Queen Emma was this, that becauſe after King Ethelred's death, ſhe marryed the Daniſh King Canutus, and ſeemed to favour her iſſue by him, more then her Iſſue by King Ethelred, therefore he diſpoſſeſt her of all her her Goods, and committed her to cuſtody, in the Abbey of Wormel; and more then this, ſo far hearkened to an aſperſion caſt upon her, of unchaſte familiarity with Alwyne Biſhop of Winchester, that for her Purgation, ſhe was fain to paſs the tryal of Fire Ordeal, which was in this in this manner; nine Plow-ſhares red hot were laid in unequal diſtance, which ſhe muſt paſs bare-foot and blinde-fold, and if ſhe paſſed them unhurt, then ſhe was judged Innocent, if otherwiſe, Guilty. And this tryal ſhe paſſed, and came off fairly, to the great aſtoniſhment of all beholders. The other touching his Wife was this; he had married Editha the beautiful, and indeed virtuous Daughter of Earl Godwin, and becauſe he had taken diſpleaſure againſt the Father, he would ſhew no kindeneſs to the daughter; he had made her his Wife, but converſed not with her as a Wife, only at board, but not at bed, or if at bed, no otherwiſe then David with Abiſhag, and yet was content to hear her accuſed of Incontinency; whereof if ſhe were guilty he could not be innocent. So as, what the virtues were, for which after his death he ſhould be reputed a Saint, doth not eaſily appear. It ſeems he was chaſte, but not without injury to his Wife: Pious, but not without ungratefulneſs to his Mother; Juſt in his preſent Government, but not without neglect of Poſterity, for through his want of Providence in that point, he left the Crown to ſo doubtful ſucceſſion, that ſoon after his deceaſe it was tranſlated out of Engliſh into French, and the Kingdom made ſervile to a fourth Forreign Nation. One ability he had which raiſed him him above the pitch of ordinary Kings, and yet at this day is ordinary with Kings, that by his only touching and laying his hand upon it, he cured a Diſeaſe, which from his curing is called, The Kings-Evil. His Mother Queen Emma, in memory of the nine Plow-ſhares ſhe had paſſed in her Tryal, gave nine Mannors to the Minſter of Winchester, and himſelf remembring the wrong he had done her, beſtowed on the ſame place, the Iſland of Portland in Dorſetſhire, being about ſeuen miles in compaſs. He made made alſo of a little Monaſtery in the Weſt of London, by the River of Thames, a moſt beautiful Church, (called of the place Weſtminſter) where he provided for his own Sepulchre; and another dedicated to St. Margaret, ſtanding without the Abbey. This of Weſtminſter he endowed with many rich Revenues, and confirmed his Charters under his Broad Seal, being the firſt of the Kings of England, who uſed that large and ſtately impreſſion in their Charters and Patents. He founded alſo the Colledge of St. Mary Ottery in Devonſhire, and gave unto it the Village of Ottery, and removed the Biſhops See from Cridington to Exeter, as a place of far more dignity: and when he had reigned the ſpace of three and twenty years and ſix months, he ended his life the fourth of January, in that room of his Palace at Weſtminſter, which is now called the Painted Chamber, in the year 1066. and was buried in the Church at Weſtminſter, which he had builded.

Of Harold the ſecond Engliſh King after the Danes.

KING Edward the Confeſſour, being himſelf without Iſſue, had in his life time ſent into Hungary for his Nephew Edward called the Out-law, the Son of Edmund Ironſide, with a purpoſe to deſign him his Succeſſor in the Crown, but he dying ſoon after his coming into England, King Edward then gave his Son Edgar the name of Atheling; as to ſay, Prince Edgar, meaning to deſign him for his Succeſſour, but being prevented by death, before the Succeſſour was fully eſtabliſhed, and Edgar Atheling, though he had right, yet being young, and not of power to make good his right, Harold the Son of Earl Godwin ſteps into the Throne, and never ſtanding upon Ceremonies, ſet himſelf the Crown upon his own head, wherein, though as a violater of Holy Rites, he offended the Clergy, yet not any either of Clergy or Laity, durſt oppoſe him, as being at that time the moſt martial man in the Kingdom; and ſuch a one, as the ſtate of the Realm ſtood at that time in need of, and beſides his own worthineſs had the aſſiſtance of Edwyn, and Marchar, the two great Earls of Yorkſhire and Cheſter, whoſe Siſter Algyth he had married. It is true withal, that King Edward had appointed the Crown after his own deceaſe, ſometime to William Duke of Normandy, ſometimes to Edgar Atheling, and ſometimes to this Harold, ſo as he was Crowned by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, as not coming in by intruſion or wrong, but by the appointment of King Edward; though that appointment of King Edward, was rather to make him Regent, during the minority of Edgar, then to make him abſolute King: but howſoever being once in the Throne, he was then able to make his own Title, and to make Prince Edgar ſome amends, he created him Earl of Oxford, which was indeed to uſe him like a Childe, take away a Jewel, and pleaſe him with an Apple. Yet Harold having once gotten into the Throne, he carried himſelf with great Valour and Juſtice, for the time he ſate in it, which was but very ſhort (only nine months) as being indeed but tottering from the very beginning, and that chiefly by means of his own Brother Tonſtayne, who by diverting his Forces to ſuppreſs a Rebellion, made him of leſs force to reſiſt an Invaſion. But now that we have ſhewed how Harold entred the Throne, we muſt forbear to ſhew how he was caſt out, till we come to him that caſt him out; who becauſe he was not only of another Family, but of another Nation, we muſt neceſſarily take the beginning from a deeper root; and indeed, ſeeing in him we ſhall joyn our Iſland to the Continent, which is a larger world, our Kings hereafter will afford a larger Extent for matter of Diſcourſe then heretofore they have done.

Harold ſucceeds Edward the Confeſſour: ſetting the Crown upon his own head.

Edgar Atheling made Earl of Oxford.

THE

The LIFE of KING WILLIAM THE FIRST, Called the CONQUEROUR.

His Parentage and Deſcent.

The race of the Dukes of Normandy.

THere were ſix Dukes of Normandy in France, in a direct line ſucceeding from Father to Son. The firſt was Rollo, who of a private man in Denmark, coming forth with the exuberancy of his Nation, wreſted by force of Arms from Charles the Simple, King of France, to be made Duke of Normandy. The ſecond was William his Son, called Long-Eſpee, or Long-Sword. The third was Richard his Son, called the Hardy, who had Richard, and a Daughter called Emma, married to Ethelred King of England, Father of Edward the Confeſſour. The fourth was Richard the ſecond, his Son, called the Good. The fifth was Richard the third, his Son, who by a firſt Wife had three Sons, Richard, Robert, and William; and by a ſecond two other Sons, William Earl of Arguos, and Mauger Archbiſhop of Roan. So as Richard his eldeſt Son by his firſt Wife, ſucceeded him by the name of Richard the fourth, and dying without Iſſue, the Dukedom deſcended to Robert his ſecond Son by his firſt Wife: which Robert was Father to our William the Conquerour, of whom it is thus recorded; that riding one time abroad, he happened to paſs by a company of Countrey Maids that were a dancing, where ſtaying a while to look upon them, he was ſo taken with the handſomneſs and graceful carriage of one of them whoſe name was Arlotte, a Skinners Daughter (from whence as ſome think our word Harlot comes) that affection commanding him, and authority her, he cauſed her that night to be brought to his Bed; where being together, what was done or ſaid between them, is no matter for Hiſtory to record, though ſome Hiſtorians have recorded both; making her not ſo modeſt as was fit for a Maid: only ten months after it appeared, that at this time our Duke William was begotten; who proving a man of extraordinary ſpirit, we may attribute it to the heat of affection in which he was begotten. Neither did there want before, and at his birth fore-running tokens which preſaged his future greatneſs; for his Mother Arlotte being great with him, had a dream like that of Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus the firſt Perſian Monarch; namely, that her bowels were extended and dilated over all Normandy and England. Alſo as ſoon as he was born, being laid on the Chamber floor, with both his hands he took up ruſhes, and ſhutting his little fiſts, held them very faſt; which gave occaſion to the Goſſiping Wives to congratulate Arlotte in the birth of ſuch a boy, and the Midwife cry'd out, the childe would prove a King.

His ſucceeding in the Dukedom, notwithſtanding his Baſtardy.

IT appears by many examples, that Baſtardy in thoſe dayes was no bar to ſucceſſion, till a law was afterward made to make it a bar. It brought ſome diſgrace, where the Mother was mean, but no impediment where the Father was Noble; and even his Baſtardy ſeemed to have ſome allay, if it be true (as ſome write) that his Father took the ſaid Arlotte afterward to be his Wife: and yet perhaps he had not the Dukedom ſo much by ſucceſſion, as by gift. For when he was about nine years old, his Father calling his Nobility together, cauſed them to ſwear Allegiance to this baſe Son of his, and to take him for their Liege Lord after his deceaſe. Neither was this in thoſe dayes unfrequent, for Princes to confer their Principalities after their own deceaſes upon whom they pleaſed, counting it as lawful to appoint Succeſſours after them, as Subſtitutes under them; even in our time and Kingdom the Duke of Northumberland prevailed with King Edward the ſixth, to exclude his two Siſters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to appoint the Lady Jane Grey, Daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, to ſucceed him.

Baſtardy no bar to ſucceſſion.

Princes to appoint their ſucceſſours.

His Education and Tuition in his Minority.

HIS Father having declared and appointed him to be his Succeſſour, went ſoon after (whether out of devotion, or to do Pennance for procuring his Brothers death, whereof he was ſuſpected) into the Holy Land, in which Journey he died, having left the tuition of his young Son to his two Brothers, and the Guardianſhip to the King of France, in whoſe Court for a time he was brought up. A ſtrange confidence, to commit the tuition of a Son that was baſe, to pretenders that were legitimate, and to a King of France, who aimed at nothing more more, then to re-annex this Dukedom to his Crown. But it seems his confidence was grounded upon the proximity of blood in his Brothers, and upon the merits of his own service formerly done to the King of France; which though it proved well enough with him, yet is not to be taken into example to follow.

His troubles in his Minority.

FIrst, Roger de Tresney, who derived his Pedegree from Rollo, and had won much Honour by his valour in the Wars, (notwithstanding the Oath of Allegiance he had formerly taken) takes exception to his Bastardy, and invites complices to assist him in recovering the Dukedom to a legitimate Race: a fair pretext, if the Fate of Duke William had not been against it; who though he were himself but young, and could not do much in his own person, yet the Divine Providence raised him up friends that supplied him with Assistance, and particularly Roger de Beaumont, by whose valour this Roger de Tresney, with his two Brothers, was defeated and slain. After Roger de Tresney, William de Arques his Uncle layes claim to the Dutchy, and assisted by the King of France comes to a Battel, but by the valour of Count Gifford, the Dukes General, was likewise defeated; and these were troubles before he arrived to seventeen years of age. After this, one Guy, Earl of Burgoigne, Grandchilde to Richard the second, Duke of Normandy, grew sensible of his right to the Dukedom, and joyning with Viscount Neele, and the Earl of Bessin, two powerful Normans, conspired Duke William's death, and had effected it, if a certain Fool about him had not stoln away in the night, to the place where the Duke was, and never left knocking and crying at the Gate, till he was admitted to his presence, willing him to flie for his life instantly, or he would be murthered. The Duke considering, that being related by a Fool, it was like to be the more palpable, and that there might be danger in staying, none in going, rode instantly away, all alone, toward Falaise, his principle Castle, but missing his way, he happened to pass, where a Gentleman was standing at his door, of whom he asked the way, and was by him, as knowing him, directed; which he had no sooner done, but the Conspirators came presently inquiring if such a one had not passed that way, which the Gentleman affirmed, and undertook to be their guide to overtake him, but leading them of purpose a contrary way, the Duke by this means came safely to Falaise, and from thence journeys to the King of France, complaining of his injuries, and imploring his aid, as one that was his homager, and committed to his care by his servant his Father. The King of France moved with his distress, and remembrance of his Fathers merits, though he wished he was less then he was: yet he so aided him, that he made him greater then he was; for himself in person, suffering much in the Battel, procured him the Victory. By which we may see, that Folly, and Fortune, and even Enemies themselves, are all assistants to the Destinies; or to say better, indeed to the Divine Providence. Many other affronts were offered him, some by meaner Princes, some afterwards by the King of France himself, who was now grown jealous of his Greatness; all which he encountred with such dexterity, that made his Bastardy, as it were, become Legitimate, and Virtue her self grow proud of his person.

A Fool saves Duke William's life.

His Carriage afterwards in Peace.

BY this time he was come to the age of two and twenty years; and whereas all this while he had shewed himself a valiant General in War, he now began to shew himself a provident Governour in Peace, composing and ordering his state: wherein he so carried himself, that as his Subjects did both fear and love him, so his neighbouring Princes did both fear and hate him; or if not hate him, at least emulate him.

His Incitements for Invading of England.

DUke William had Incitements to Invade England, and some shew of a Title. To understand this more fully, we will reflect upon some passages transacted betwixt the two former Kings, Edward the Confessour, and Harold the Son of Earl Godwin. And this recapitulation will give some light, and is very pertinent to our intended purpose.

Earl Godwin falling out with King Edward, the business was carried with such heat on both sides, that the Earl and all his Allies were in a manner banished the Realm. Godwin makes his refuge to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Harold his Son into Ireland. Emma the Kings Mother deceasing, they both return with a great Navy, and strong Army. The Nobility fearing a Civil War, labour for a Reconciliation betwixt the King and the Exiles; but Edward jealous of Godwins arts and treachery, would by no means hearken unto it. At last upon conditions they are restored to the Kings favour and their Countrey: Hostages are delivered; Walnoth the Son of Godwin, and Harun his Grandchilde, whom the King for more security sends into Normandy, there to be detained by Duke William his Kinsman. After the death of Godwin, Harold succeeds him, Earl of Kent, who craves leave of the King to go to Normandy, and bring back his Brother and Kinsman: The King in this manner answers him, Harold you may do your pleasure, and I may permit, though will not consent; for I do foresee, that if you undertake this Journey, it will prove to the ruine of the Kingdom, and your own confusion. Harold notwithstanding, obstinate in his resolution, after a tempestuous Voyage, arrives in France, where he is taken prisoner by the Lord of Pontive, and at the command and threats of Duke William dismist; and though first rob'd of his Treasures, and choicest things he transported, at last sent into Normandy; where relating the cause of his Journey, he was honourably entertained, and fairly promised, unless himself were the obstacle, all things should succeed as he wished. After some time the Duke taking his opportunity entred into private discourse with him, and told him, that King

Edward

Edward being brought up in his youth together with him, had faithfully promiſed him, that if ever he came to be King of England, he would make him his heir, and ſettle the Kingdom on him. Wherefore Harold (quoth the Duke) if you will aſſiſt me in gaining that Crown, when I come over into England, you ſhall have your Brother and Nephew; and to make our tye of friendſhip the ſtronger, you ſhall promiſe to take one of my Daughters for Wife, and ſend your Siſter hither, whom I will beſtow on one of my chief Lords: you ſhall alſo promiſe me to ſecure the Caſtle of Dover, for my ſervice: and I promiſe you that when I am King of England, I will deny you nothing, which in reaſon you ſhall demand. Harold having heard the Duke, was much perplexed: but ſeeing himſelf in ſuch ſtreights, That he muſt either venture on a promiſe, or hazard an impriſonment, condeſcends to all the Duke demanded; and for more ſecurity, with a ſolemn Oath confirms his agreement: and returning into England, acquaints Edward with all theſe paſſages, who replyed, Did not I know William's diſpoſition, and foretell thee how much miſchief this Journey would bring upon England? Duke William having the Word of Edward, and the Oath of Harold, had ſufficient obligations to expect the Kingdom: but hearing of the death of Edward, and that Harold was Crowned King, he thought himſelf not more forgotten by Edward then wronged by Harold; and therefore ſent a meſſenger to put him in minde of King Edward's Promiſe, and his own Oath. Harold returns anſwer that he could not ſend his Siſter over, becauſe ſhe was dead; but if William would have her Carkaſs he ſhould. Secondly, that he could neither promiſe, nor diſpoſe of a Kingdom, which was none of his own. Laſtly, he ſhould be injurious to his own Nobility, if he ſhould without their conſent and advice take a ſtranger for Wife. William having heard his anſwer, was as yet patient, and again ſending to Harold mildly, demands of him at laſt to take his Daughter for his Wife and Queen; otherwiſe by force of Arms he would recover that Kingdom, which was his own by the promiſe of King Edward. To this Harold peremptorily replies, that he feared not the one, ſo by no means would he do the other. Duke William thus ſlighted by Harold, endeavours to make him honeſt by force, and aſſured himſelf he ſhould finde him a weak Enemy, who had proved ſo perjured a Friend. Theſe were the incitements which cauſed William in his declining age to undertake this expedition; but who can think himſelf too old for a Kingdom, when Galba, above 73. years of age buckled on an Armour on his unwieldy limbs for the attaining of a Roman Empire?

The Reaſons that facilitated his Conqueſt of England.

DUke William incenſed with Harolds anſwers, acquaints the Nobility with his purpoſe, who with ſome ado conſented to aid him, as likewiſe many other great Lords of France, but ſpecially Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, whoſe Daughter he had married; and who being at that time Guardian of the young King of France, procured aid from him alſo; and to make the Enterpriſe the more ſucceſsful, Pope Alexander the ſecond ſent him a Banner, with an Agnus of Gold, and one of the hairs of St. Peter. So as the preparation of the Duke, both by Sea and Land, was very great, having three hundred ſail of Ships, and as ſome write, 890. and as one Norman above a thouſand, and as Gemeticenſis, three thouſand; and though Harold had likewiſe provided a Warlike Fleet to encounter him, yet it was at that time unfortunately diverted another way. For Touſtayne his Brother being then in Rebellion in the North, and Harold Harfager King of Norway, at the ſame time invading thoſe parts, and perhaps upon a bruit, that the Dukes Fleet was not yet ready to come forth, removed both his Fleet and Army thither; where though he got the Victory at Stamford, with the death both of his brother Touſtayne, and of the King of Norway: yet it made way for the Duke to land quietly, and he entred the Kingdom as eaſily as one may enter a houſe, when the doors are all left open. By this means King Harold's Shipping (the beſt wall of defence to an Iſland) was utterly fruſtrate; and as for his Land Forces, they were by his Battel at Stamford, exceedingly both weakened and impaired: yet hearing that Duke William was landed at Pemſey, not far from Haſtings in Suſſex, he repaired thither with all ſpeed, and gathering together his broken Forces, and increaſing them by all the means he could, made himſelf ready to give the Duke Battel. Duke William in the mean time, as ſoon as he had landed his men, ſent his Ships preſently away, that there might be no thinking of any thing, but either Death or Victory: And then going himſelf on Land, it is ſaid, his foot ſlipped, and he fell down; which ſome that ſtood by, taking it for an evil ſign, No (ſaith he) I have by this taken poſſeſſion of this Land. And indeed preſages are but as Animus ejus qui preſagit, as in this Dukes fall it afterwards fell out. The like confidence of ſpirit ſhewed he not long after, when the Armies were ready to joyn; for he that put on the Dukes Armour, whether out of haſte, or out of perturbation of minde, putting the forepart behinde, and the back part before, the Duke ſeeing it, merrily ſaid, I ſee now by this inverſion of my Armour, that my Dukedom will be turned into a Kingdom: taking that for a good Omen, which ſome other of weaker ſpirits would have taken for a bad. Many wayes of compoſition between Duke William and King Harold were propounded, yet Harold would hearken to none, as nothing doubting of ſucceſs, and perhaps thinking it a diſgrace to capitulate for that, which was now his own: and when one of his Brothers called Gyrth, being leſs intereſſed, and therefore clearer ſighted, intreated him to conſider what a fearful thing it was to break an Oath, which he ſo ſolemnly had ſworn, Harold ſeemed to conceive, that nothing which he did being a private man, could be of force to binde him, now being a Prince: and ſo on the fourteenth day of October, being Saturday, in the year 1066. (which day he liked the better, becauſe it was his Birth-day, hoping that the day of his Birth Birth, would not ſo much degenerate, to prove the day of his Death, though this alſo even bred no good blood to the action; for the Souldiers of Harold, thinking thereby to honour their Kings Birth-day, ſpent the night before in revelling and drinking, where the Souldiers of the Duke out of conſideration of their next dayes work, ſpent the night in quietneſs and devotion) they joyned Battel, (the Kentiſh-men being placed in the fore-front, as by an ancient cuſtom is their due, and King Harold with his Londoners, leading the main Battel) where though their Armies were not much unequal in number, (for they were each of them near about threeſcore thouſand men) yet there was great odds in the expertneſs of their Souldiers, and more in the advantage of their weapons; for, the Duke had with him all the flower of France and Flanders, where King Harold had loſt his beſt men, in his late Battel: and for advantage of Weapons, the Normans had long Bows and Arrows, which among the Engliſh at that time were not at all in uſe. What marvail that the Normans got the Victory, though King Harold loſing his life, yet loſt no reputation; and though the Engliſh Souldiers ſhewed no leſs valour, in being conquered, then the Normans did in conquering? One circumſtance may not be omitted, that King Harold as an expert General, had ordered his men in ſo firm a Body, that no force of the Normans could diſorder their Ranks, till Duke William uſed a ſtratagem, commanding his men to retire, and to counterfeit flight; by which he drew the Engliſh on, upon a hollow ground covered with earth: whereinto many of them fell and periſhed, and beſides into an ambuſh of his Horſemen, which unexpectedly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. Withal, there ſeems one great error to have been committed (at leaſt, if it were an errour, and not rather a neceſſity) that there was not a ſupplemental Army provided, (as his Brother Gryth would have had it) which might have come on if the firſt had failed; and would have been of great advantage againſt a wearied Army. But when Sic viſum eſt ſuperis, all humane force is weak and cannot withſtand, all humane Providence is unprovided, and cannot prevent. It is true, Duke William that day fought ſo valiantly, that he had three Horſes killed under him; but King Harold ſhewed no leſs valour in killing many Normans with his own hands: ſo as the fight continued doubtful along time; till at laſt, King Harold being ſtruck into the brains with an Arrow, fell down dead: upon whoſe falling, a baſe Norman Souldier, cut off one of his Thighs, while he was yet breathing: which Duke William hearing, was ſo much offended, that he cauſed the Souldier to be diſarmed, and with ſhame caſhiered. The body of King Harold, his Mother Thyra offered a great ſumme, to have it delivered to her; but the Duke out of the nobleneſs of his minde, would take no money; but delivered it freely, and then it was buried in Waltham Abbey; which himſelf had begun to build, at leaſt, to repair. But here Gyraldus Cambrenſis tells a ſtrange ſtory, that Harold was not ſlain in the Battel, but only wounded and loſt his left eye, and then eſcaped by flight to Cheſter, where he afterwards led a holy Anchorets life, in the Cell of St. James, faſt by St. John's Church.

How Duke William proceeded after his Victory at Haſtings.

AS his Valour won him the Victory, ſo his Victory won him a Crown; that now of an old Duke, he was ſuddenly became a young King: and indeed, nothing ſo much renues life, and makes the years in a manner young again, as addition of honour, eſpecially when it is the fruit of merit. Firſt therefore, having given publick thanks to God for his happy ſucceſs, he led his Army towards London, not the direct way (perhaps doubting of ſome new encounter) but coaſting about through part of Kent, through Suſſex, Surry, Hampſhire, and Barkſhire, where at Wallingford he paſſed over the Thames; and then through Oxfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, and Hartfordſhire, until he came to Barkhamſtead, where there came unto him Aldred Archbiſhop of York, Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, Wilfere Biſhop of Hereford, and many other Prelates, accompanied with Edgar Atheling, with Earl Edwyn and Marchar, Brothers, and men of the greateſt ſway in the Kingdom, and many others of the Nobility. It is true, upon the defeat at Haſtings, Earl Edwyn and Marchar, had a purpoſe to ſet up Edgar Atheling, as next Heir of the Royal blood; and Grandchilde to Edmund Ironſide, and ſo beloved of the people, that he was called their Darling: but conſidering his young years, and other inabilities, but eſpecially finding the minds of the Biſhops, (who at that time bare all the ſway) to be otherwiſe inclined, they deſiſted from that courſe; and thus the Duke without any oppoſition, coming to London, was received by Biſhops and Lords, and all, with great joy, though ſmall gladneſs: and if he had not their hearts, yet he had their knees, for in moſt humble manner they ſubmitted themſelves to him, acknowledging him for their Soveraign Lord; and upon Chriſtmas day after, he was Crowned at Weſtminſter by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, the Archbiſhop Canterbury, Stigand, not being admitted to do that office, for ſome defect in his Inveſtiture; and perhaps for ſome aſperſion in his manners.

Duke William is Crowned King of England.

How he rewarded his Followers.

THough he hath had the name of Conquerour, yet he uſed not the Kingdom as gotten by Conqueſt; for he took no mans living from him, nor diſpoſſeſſed any of their goods, but ſuch only, whoſe demerit made them unworthy to hold them; as appears by his Act to one Warren a Norman to whom he had given the Caſtle of Sherborne in Norfolk. For when Sherborne, who was owner of it, acquainted the King, that the Caſtle was his, and that he had never born Arms againſt him, he preſently commanded Warren, to deliver it quietly up unto him. Only vacancies of Offices, and filling up the places of thoſe who were ſlain or fled, were the preſent means he made uſe of, for preferring his Followers. One ſpecial preferment we cannot omit, that where one Herlowyn a Noble man in Normandy, had married married his Mother Arlotte, and had by her a Son named Hugh Lupus, he gave to the ſaid Hugh, the Earldom of Cheſter, to hold of him as freely by his Sword, as himſelf held England by his Crown, by vertue of which Grant, the ſaid Hugh ordained under him four Barons, Nigel, he made Baron of Halton, Malbank, Baron of Nantwich: Euſtace, Baron of Mawpaſe, and Vernon, Baron of Shiplrook: Such an honour, as no Subject before or ſince ever enjoyed the like. Alſo he gave to his Nephew Alane Earl of Britain, all the lands which ſometimes belonged to Earl Edwyn: and this Earl of Britain, the better to ſecure the Kings gift, built him a ſtrong Caſtle near to his Mannor of Gillingham, and named it Richmont: from which Caſtle the Earls of Richmont bear their Titles of Honour.

He uſeth his conqueſt moderately.

What means he uſed for ſecuring himſelf in the Kingdom.

BEſides the Oath of Fealty, which he took of all his Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, at his Coronation; in Lent following going into Normandy, he took along with him the greateſt part of the great men of the Kingdom, of whom Edwyn and Marchar, the two Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Edgar Atheling, Waltheoff Son to Syward formerly Earl of Northumberland, and Agelnothus Abbot of Glaſtenbury, were the chief; leaving the care of the Kingdom in his abſence to Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, his Brother by the Mother: and to William Fitz Osborne, whom he had made Earl of Hereford: and to abate the greatneſs of the Prelates, which at that time was grown in a manner unlimited, he ordained that from thenceforth they ſhould not command with any Temporal Authority whatſoever. And becauſe the common people are no leſs to be feared for their number, then the Nobility for their greatneſs, he firſt took from them all their Armour, to the end, that leaving them without ſtings, they might afterward be but Droans. And becauſe there is ſeldom any danger from ſingular numbers, but all the danger ariſeth from plurality: therefore to prevent Conſpiracies and Combinations, which are commonly contrived in the night, he commanded that in all Towns and Villages a Bell ſhould be rung at eight a clock in the evening, and that in every houſe they ſhould then put out their Fire and Lights (which was called Couure feu) and go to bed. And for more ſecurity he erected Caſtles in the moſt doubtful places of the Kingdom, one at York, another at Lincoln, a third at Notingham, (at that time called Snottingham) and a fourth at Haſtings, where he firſt landed. By theſe means the Kingdom was quiet all the time of his being away at Normandy, ſaving only that Edrick the Foreſter in the County of Hereford, calling into his aid the Kings of Wales, made ſome ſmall diſturbance. And indeed all the States of the Kingdom might in his very perſon finde ſomething to make them apt to tolerate his Government. For firſt, the people might think themſelves in a ſort advanced, being now made members of a greater body; when the Dukedom of Normandy ſhould come to be annexed to the Kingdom of England; and by experience of his good Government being a Duke, they might well hope, he would not govern worſe being made a King. And the Nobility might be well content, as having a King of their former Kings chooſing; and though a ſtranger, yet no Alien, as having in him many veins of the ſame blood, and therefore likely alſo to have ſome veins of the ſame goodneſs of their good King Edward. But ſpecially the Clergy could not chuſe but be content, as having a King who came commended to them, by a commending as ſtrong as a commanding, the Popes Benediction.

He takes from the Clergy all Temporal Authority.

He takes from the people all their Armour.

He ordains Couure feu at eight a Clock.

What Troubles or Inſurrections were during his Reign.

BUT the body of a State being more obnoxious to crudities and ill humours, then the ſtate of a Natural Body, it is impoſſible to continue long without diſtempers; notwithſtanding any preſervatives that can be applied. And therefore in the ſecond year of his reign, brake forth the diſcontentment of Edgar Atheling, juſtly the firſt, as having moſt cauſe, being the next of the late Royal Blood, and therefore the moſt apt to be ſenſible of ſervitude; who taking along with him his Mother Agatha, and his two Siſters, Margaret, and Chriſtine, ſtole ſecretly away to Sea, with intention to paſs into Hungary, the Countrey where he was born: but by contrary windes was caſt upon the coaſts of Scotland, where the King Malcolme, not only moſt kindely entertained him, but for a ſtricter bond of kindeneſs took his Siſter Margaret to wife, by whom he had many Children, out of which, in the ſecond Generation after, a match was found, by which in the perſon of King Henry the ſecond, the Saxon and Norman blood were conjoyned, the union whereof continues in the race of our Kings of England to this day. Not long after to Edgar in Scotland, came the two great Earls, Edwyn and Marchar, brothers to Agatha the late King Harold's Wife; alſo Hereward, Goſpatrick, and Syward, with many other Lords; and ſhortly after Stigand and Aldred Archbiſhops, with divers of the Clergy. And theſe Lords being together in Scotland, did but watch opportunity, to recover that, which for want of taking opportunity they had loſt: And aſſiſted by the Scots, they invade the North parts, ſpoiling the Countrey, and killing many for the fault they had themſelves committed, but all they could do, was but to forrage the Countrey, and ſo return.

After this, in the third year of his Reign, the two ſons of Sweyne King of Denmark, Harold and Canutus, with a fleet of 240 Ships, entred Humber, and invaded the North parts, with whom the Engliſh Lords in Scotland joyned, and forraged all the Countrey, till they came near to York. When the Normans that were in the Town, to ſave the City, ſet fire on the Suburbs; but the fire not ſo contented, by aſſiſtance of a violent winde, took hold of the City it ſelf, burning a great part of it, and which perhaps was more worth then the City, a Library of excellent Books; and the Normans that were left in defence of the City, to the number of three thouſand, were all ſlain. King William hear-hearing hereof was ſo much incenſed, that with all ſpeed he raiſed an Army, and entred Northumberland, waſting the Countrey that already lay waſte; and yet for all this great rage, was contented with a great ſumme of money, to purchaſe the Danes departure. By theſe devaſtations in many Shires of the Kingdom, but eſpecially in Northumberland, ſo great a Dearth and Famine followed, that men were glad to eat horſes and dogs, cats and rats, and what elſe is moſt abhorrent to nature, and between York and Durham, the ſpace of 60 miles, for nine years together, there was ſo utter deſolation, as that neither any houſe was left ſtanding, nor any ground tilled.

Many other inſurrections there were in his Reign, as at Exeter, at Oxford, in the Iſle of Ely, and many times by the Scots in the Northern parts. The moſt dangerous of all the Conſpiracies, and moſt diſtaſted of him, was that of Roger Fitz Aubre, Earl of Hereford, Ralph Waher Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, Waltheoff Earl of Northumberland, with Euſtace Earl of Boloigne, (ſent purpoſely, as it was thought, by the King of France into England, to incite and joyn with the Conſpirators.) Ralph Waher married the Siſter of Roger the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the expreſs commandement of King William: at the ſolemnization of the marriage, theſe Lords conſpire to keep the King now in Normandy, and diſpoſſeſs him of his Sovereignty, which to perform, they agreed to joyn theirs with the Daniſh Forces, whom they intended to call in. This was the moſt dangerous combination of all, it happening when he was out of England, at the ſiege of Dole, a Caſtle in Britain belonging to Ralph Waher, and defended againſt him by the King of France; and at ſuch a time as almoſt all Chriſtendom had declared their jealouſies of him, and ill affections toward him. The King of Scotland, and Princes of Wales ready to aſſiſt the Rebels at home; Swaine King of Denmark invading England with a Navy of 200. ſail, to which Drone King of Ireland added 65. Ships. How much ſuch an action did diſtaſte and offend him, may be conjectured, by that moſt of theſe great Noblemen were either his Kinſmen, or in affinity nearly allyed to him: But William's fortune ſecures him as well at home againſt Traitors, as in the field againſt his Enemies. This grand conſpiracy is diſcovered by Waltheoff to Lanfranck Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who perſwades the Earl to go over to King William, and inform him in what danger he was. Notwithſtanding this diſcovery, Roger and Ralph perſiſt in their intentions, raiſe forces to proſecute their deſigns: but by the diligence of Odo the Kings Brother, Biſhop of Bayeux, the Biſhop of Worceſter, and the Abbot of Eveſham, were ſo prevented, that they could never unite their forces. Ralph flies into France, Roger Earl of Hereford is taken, put in priſon, and as ſome report, to death; Waltheoff, of all lamented, beheaded. But all theſe were eaſily ſuppreſt; for they were but ſcattered Forces, Et dum ſinguli pugnant univerſi vincuntur; whereas if they had united themſelves into an Army, they might perhaps have made it a War, which now were little more then Routs and Riots. Yet ſome write, that Malmesbury.

King William granted Cumberland to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold from him conditionally, that the Scots ſhould not attempt any thing prejudicial to the Crown of England, for which grant King Malcolme did him homage.

The greateſt and laſt was an Inſurrection raiſed in Normandy, by his Son Robert, the more dangerous becauſe unnatural; for by the inſtigation and aſſiſtance of Philip King of France, (emulous now of King William's greatneſs) he entred Normandy, and claimed it as in his own right. His Father indeed had made him a promiſe of it long before, but Robert impatient of delay, as counting ſo long ſtaying to be little better then diſinheriting, endeavoured by ſtrong hand to wreſt it from his Father. But his Father King William hearing hereof, with a ſtrong Army paſſeth over into Normandy, where in a Battel meeting hand to hand with his Son, he was by him unhorſed, and hurt in the arm: but his Son perceiving him by his voice to be his Father, ſuddenly leaps off his horſe, takes up his Father, caſts himſelf down at his feet, and humbly intreats his pardon; which as a Father he eaſily grants, embraceth his Son: and ever after, the Son from the Father had fatherly love, and the Father from the Son a filial obedience. But though his Father did thus pardon him, yet it ſeems there is a Nemeſis, or to ſay better, a Divine Providence, that did not pardon him; for after this, it is obſerved he never proſpered in any thing he undertook. It cannot perhaps be diſcovered, whether the Kings ſeverity begat his Subjects Inſurrections; or his Subjects Inſurrections the Kings Severity: but which of them ſoever was the mother, it is certain they were Nurſes each of them to other. Yet after this, King William ſo far truſted his Son Robert, that he ſent him with an Army againſt Malcolme King of Scotland, who had invaded Northumberland: but at the coming of Duke Robert retired. At which time Duke Robert began the foundation of a Caſtle upon the River of Tyne; whereof the Town of Newcaſtle did after take both beginning and name, which before this time was called Moncaſter. In his twentieth year in Whitſun-week, he honoured his Son Henry, with the order of Knighthood, wherein what Ceremony he uſed, is not certainly known: but it is worth obſerving, that before his time, the cuſtom among the Saxons was; firſt, he who ſhould receive the order of Knighthood, confeſſed himſelf in the evening to a Prieſt; then he continued all that night in the Church, watching and applying himſelf to his private devotion: The next morning, he heard Maſs, and offered his Sword upon the Altar. After the Goſpel was read, the Sword was hallowed, and with a benediction put about his neck. Laſtly, He communicated the Myſteries of the bleſſed Body of Chriſt; and from that time, remained a perfect Knight. But this cuſtom of conſecrating Knights, the Normans abhorred.

His ſon Robert riſeth in arms againſt him.

He unhorſeth his Father.

His aptneſs to forget Injuries.

CErtainly there is no ſuch goodneſs of nature, as aptneſs to be reconciled; of which vertue it ſeems King William had a large proportion, for he ſeldom remembred injuries after ſubmiſſion. Edrick the firſt that rebelled againſt him, he placed in Office near about him. Goſpatrick, who had been a factious man, and a plotter of Conſpiracies againſt him, he made Earl of Gloceſter, and truſted him with managing a War againſt Malcolme King of Scots. Euſtace Earl of Boloigne, who in the Kings abſence in Normandy attempted to ſeize upon Dover Caſtle, he received afterward into great favour and reſpect, The Earls Marchar and Syward, with Wolnoth the Brother of Harold, a little before his death, he releaſed out of Priſon. Edgar, who as next heir to the Saxon Kings, had often attempted by Arms to recover his right, he not only after twice defection pardoned, but gave him alſo allowance as a Prince: It is ſaid twenty ſhillings a day, or rather a pound weight of Silver, and other large livings beſide; ſo as Edgar finding the ſweetneſs of ſafety, and the pleaſures of a Countrey life, ſpent the reſt of his dayes (which were many) retired from Court, neither envying nor being envied. Only Waltheoff, Earl of Northumberland, and Northampton, of all the Engliſh Nobility was put to death in all the time of this Kings reign; and not he neither, till he had twice falſified his Oath of Allegiance.

Waltheoff Earl of Northumberland the only Nobleman put to death in all this Kings time.

Of new Acqueſts to this Kingdom, by this Kings means.

1079. An. Reg. 13. IN the thirteenth year of his Reign, he ſubdued Wales, and made it tributary to him, as before in the ſeventh year of his Reign, he brought Malcolme King of Scots to do him Homage, and thereupon to give him Hoſtages; that if England made him greater then he was before, a King of a Duke; he no leſs made England greater then it was before, three Kingdoms in one.

Of his Exactions and Courſes for raiſing of Money.

AS his Taxations were many in number, ſo they were various in kinde, not alwayes bringing in money directly, but ſometimes obliquely ſaving it: The firſt Tax he laid upon his Subjects was in the firſt year of his Reign, after his return out of Normandy; a grievous Tax all Writers ſay, but none what it was. In the third year of his Reign he ranſacked all Monaſteries, and all the Gold and Silver of either Chalices or Shrines, he took to his own uſe. Moreover, whereas many of the more principal, and richer perſons of the Realm, fearing King William's cruelty, and inſatiable deſire of moneys, depoſited their Treaſures, Jewels, and chiefeſt commodities, in the Monaſteries and Abbeys, as in ſure Sanctuaries to be ſafely kept for their own uſes; the King violently ſeiſed on all for himſelf, neither regarding the ſanctity of the places, nor what injuſtice he did to his own Subjects, but as a Conquering Tyrant made their poverty his own ſecurity. Likewiſe he ſeſſed all Biſhops and Abbots what number of Souldiers they ſhould finde to ſerve him in his Wars: alſo the ſtrangers which he maintained in Pay, he diſperſed into Religious houſes, and ſome alſo among the Nobility to be maintained at their charge. Many other Taxations he made, but laſt of all in the eighteenth year of his Reign, by the advice of Roger Earl of Hertford, he cauſed the whole Realm to be deſcribed in a Cenſual Roll (whereof he took a Precedent from King Alfred) ſo as there was not one Hyde of Land, but both the yearly rent, and the owner thereof was therein ſet down: How many Ploughlands, what Paſtures, Fens or Mariſhes, what Woods, Farms, and Tenements were in every Shire, and what every one was worth: Alſo how many Villains every man had; what Beaſts, what Cattel, what Fees, what other goods, what rent or commodity his Poſſeſſions did yield. This Book was called the Roll of Winton, becauſe it was kept in the City of Wincheſter. By the Engliſh it was called Doomſ-day book, either by the reaſon of the generality thereof, or elſe corruptly, in ſtead of Domus Dei book, for that it was laid in the Church of Wincheſter, in a place called Domus Dei. According to this Roll Taxations were impoſed, ſometimes two ſhillings, and at this time ſix ſhillings upon every Hyde of Land, (a Hyde containing, as ſome account it, twenty Acres, but as Maſter Lambert proveth, a hundred Acres.) In all thoſe Lands which he gave to any man, he reſerved Dominion in chief to himſelf, as alſo a yearly rent, and likewiſe a Fine whenſoever the Tenant did alien or die. Theſe were bound to him by Oath of Fealty and Homage, and if any died, his heir being within age, the King received the profits of his Lands, and had the cuſtody and diſpoſing of the heirs body, until his age of one and twenty years. To be ſhort, his greedineſs of money, was ſo great, that he ſpared not his own Brother Odo, but found accuſations againſt him, to the end he might ſeiſe upon his Treaſure, which was infinite great, and which he had gathered in hope to buy the Papacy. Only one kinde of profit he forbare to meddle with, that is, Vacancies of Abbyes and Biſhopricks; which he always reſerved for the Succeſſors: but then he took another courſe of far greater profit, for he compelled all men to make new Fines at his pleaſure, for confirmation of any Grant or priviledges formerly granted by any Prince of the Realm; by which device he got into his poſſeſſion the greateſt part of all the riches of the Land, as well of the Clergy, as of the Laity. And one particular may not be omitted that is reported of him, which was this: The Monks of Ely, to purchaſe their peace, agreed to give him ſeven hundred Marks, when coming to pay it, there wanted a Groat in the weight, (for in thoſe dayes greater ſums were not paid by tale, but by weight) which the King underſtanding, denyed them all compoſition for Peace, until with much ſuit he was intreated to accept of a thouſand Marks more.

be written in French; and alſo that all Cauſes ſhould be pleaded, and all matters of Forms diſpatched in French; upon a pretenſe to dignifie the French tongue, but with a purpoſe to intrap men through ignorance of the language, as indeed it did: or perhaps to make the Normans language predominant in the Kingdom as he had made their perſons: which yet was ſo far from effecting, that there is not ſo much as any footſteps remaining of the Norman language in the Engliſh tongue. Forms of Judgment, and tryals by Fire and Water, called Ordeal, formerly uſed, were in ſhort time after the Conqueſt diſuſed, and in the end utterly abrogated by the Pope, as derived from Paganiſm. That of Combat continued longer, but of no ordinary uſe: and all actions both criminal and real, began now to be wholly adjudged by the Verdict of twelve men, according to the cuſtome of Normandy, where the like form is uſed, and called by the name of Enqueſt, with the ſame cautions for the Jurors, as it is here continued to this day; Though by the Laws of Etheldred it appears, that the trial by twelve men was in uſe long before his time. And where before the Biſhop and the Alderman were the abſolute Judges to determine all buſineſs in every Shire, and the Biſhop, in many Caſes ſhared in the benefit of the Mulcts with the King, now he confined the Clergie within the province of their own Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, to deal only in buſineſs concerning rule of ſouls, according to the Canons and Laws Epiſcopal. And where the Cauſes of the Kingdom were before determined in every Shire, and by a Law of King Edward, all matters in queſtion were upon ſpecial penalty decided in their Gemote, or Conventicle held monethly in every Hundred: now he ordained that four times in the year, for certain daies, the ſame buſineſſes ſhould be determined in ſuch places as he would appoint, where he conſtituted Judges to attend for that purpoſe. Alſo he decreed there ſhould be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Juſtices of Peace for puniſhment of Malefactors. Finally, he ordained his Councel of State, his Chancery, his Exchequer, (Scaccarium, corruptly called ſo, of the word Statarium, or rather of the board or Table, where the Officers ſate;) alſo his Courts of Juſtice, which alwayes removed with his Court. Theſe places he furniſhed with Officers, and aſſigned four Terms in the years for determining controverſies among the people. The place of theſe Courts was Weſtminſter, where King William Rufus afterwards built a ſtately Palace. Now for his proviſionary Revenues, the Kings Tenants, who held Lands of the Crown, paid him no money at all, but only Corn and other Victuals; and a juſt note of the quality and quantity of every mans ratement, was taken throughout all the Shires of the Kingdom, and levied ever certain, for maintenance of the Kings houſe. Only the Kentiſh men procured the continuance of their antient Laws by a trick; for King William riding towards Dover, at Swanſcombe, two miles from Graveſend, the Kentiſh men met him, but in the form of a moving Wood, by reaſon of the great boughs they had cut, and carried in their hands, and compaſſing the King about, they only made ſuit for the continuance of their Laws, and Cuſtomes; of which one ſpecial was, that the Tenure of their Lands was Gavelkind; by which they deſcended not to the eldeſt alone, as in other Countreys, but were partable between all the Sons: and the Priviledges which the owners of ſuch Lands enjoyed were chiefly theſe: Not to forfeit them for Felony: Not to be ſubject to ſervices before the Juſtices: Not to be challenged for Villains. So the Conquerour conſidering, that he might as well allow them, as other Kings had done before him, eaſily condeſcended to their requeſt. But ſee the levity of theſe Kentiſh men, to hazard themſelves more for the preſerving a ſimple Cuſtome; then for preſerving the Liberty of themſelves, and their Countrey: But ſuch is the violence of conceit, till it be maſtered by time, or rather ſo very a Changeling is Humane Reaſon, that what they then cut down great Woods to defend, they have ſince been content to ſee aboliſhed, without cutting down ſo much as a twig. But one Law eſpecially he made, extremely diſtaſteful to all the Gentry of the Land, for where before they might at their pleaſure hunt, and take Deer which they found abroad in the Woods; now it was ordained under a great penalty, no leſs then putting out their eyes, that none ſhould preſume to kill, or take any of them, as reſerving them only for his own delight. And indeed ſo great delight he took in that kinde of ſport, that he depopulated a great part of Hampſhire, the ſpace of thirty miles, where there had been (ſaith Caxton) ſix and twenty Towns, and fourſcore Religious Houſes, and made it a habitation for ſuch kind of Beaſts; which was then, and to this day is called the New Foreſt. But the lamentable diſaſters that have happened to this Kings iſſue, do plainly ſhew, that there is a Power, that obſerves all our Actions, and which we may know to be Memorem Fandi atque Nefandi. But in the firſt year of this Kings Reign, he granted to the City of London, their firſt Charter and Liberties, in as large form, as they enjoyed them in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, which he granted at the ſuit of William a Norman, Biſhop of London; in grateful remembrance whereof, the Lord Maior and Aldermen, upon the ſolemn daies of their reſort to Pauls, do ſtill uſe to walk to the Graveſtone, where this Biſhop lies interred. Alſo this King was the firſt, that brought the Jewes to inhabit here in England: as likewiſe he made a Law, that whoſoever forced a woman ſhould loſe his Genitals: and in his time, long Bows came firſt into uſe in England, which as they were the weapons with which France under this King conquered England: ſo they were the weapons with which England under after-Kings, conquered France; as if it were not enough for us to beat them, if we did not beat them with their own weapons. This King alſo appointed a Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and a Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, with Immunities, as they are at this day. And to be ſhort, this King ordained ſo good Laws, and had them ſo well executed; that it is ſaid a girl might carry a bag of Money all the Countrey over without danger of robbing; and in his time, the ſetting Seals to Bonds and Writings was firſt uſed,

Affairs of the Church in his Reign.

IN his time, Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was for divers cauſes deprived of his dignity, and kept private all his life after in the Caſtle of Wincheſter: after whom ſucceeded Lanfrank an Italian, in that See: who in the twelfth year of this Kings Reign, held a Synod at London, where amongſt other things he removed the Biſhops Sees from ſmall Towns to great Cities, as from Silliway to Chiceſter; from Kyrton to Exeter; from Wells to Bathe; from Shirborn to Salisbury; from Dorcheſter to Lincoln; and from Lichfield to Cheſter, and from thence again to Coventry: and not long before, the Biſhoprick of Lindisfern, otherwiſe called Holy Land, upon the River Tweede, had been tranſlated to Durham. In the ſixth year of his reign, a controverſie ariſing between the two Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, they appealed to Rome, and the Pope remitted it to the King and Biſhops of England. Hereupon a Synod is holden at Windſor, where ſentence was given on Lanfrank's, then Archbiſhop of Canterburies, ſide: That in matters of Religion, the Archbiſhop of York, ſhould ever be ſubject to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury: Only at Rome it was decreed, for matter of Title, that the See of York ſhould be ſtyled Primas Angliæ; and the See of Canterbury, Primas totius Angliæ, as it is at this day. And as the Archbiſhop of York oweth obedience to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſo all the Biſhops of Scotland owe obedience to the Archbiſhop of York, as to the primate of Scotland. It ſhall not be amiſs here to write the journey of Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury to Rome; who in the fifth year of King William's Reign made Biſhop of Canterbury, went to Rome to obtain the Pall, due to Archbiſhops, taking for his companions Thomas Archbiſhop of York, and Remigius Biſhop of Lincoln; arrived at Rome, and admitted to the Popes preſence, Pope Alexander roſe from his ſeat, and gently ſaluting him, ſaith with all, This honour I do not give, as due to your Archbiſhoprick, but as due to my Maſter; to whoſe labour I muſt acknowledge to be due what learning I have. The next day having audience he accuſed the two companions of his journey.

Biſhops See removed.

The Archbiſhop of York, Primas Angliæ; of Canterbury, Primas totius Angliæ.

But as this King took down the Prelates in Temporalties, for he ordained they ſhould exerciſe no Temporal Authority at all: ſo in Spiritualties, he rather raiſed them, as may be ſeen by a paſſage between Aldred Archbiſhop of York and the King; for at a time, upon the repulſe of a certain ſuit, the Archbiſhop in great diſcontentment offered to depart, when the King in awe of his diſpleaſure, ſtayed him, fell down at his feet, deſired pardon, and promiſed to grant his ſuit. The King all this while being down at the Archbiſhops feet, the Noblemen that were preſent, put him in minde that he ſhould cauſe the King to riſe: Nay (ſaith the Archbiſhop) let him alone, let him finde what it is to anger Saint Peter. And as by this ſtory we ſee the inſulting pride of a Prelate in thoſe daies: ſo by another, we may ſee the equivocating falſehood of a Prelate at that time; For Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury would often ſwear, he had not one penny upon the Earth, when under the Earth it was afterwards found he had hidden great Treaſure. Alſo it is memorable, but ſcarce credible of another Biſhop, who being accuſed of Simony, and denying it, the Cardinal before whom he was to anſwer, told him that a Biſhoprick was the gift of the Holy Ghoſt; and therefore to buy a Biſhoprick, was againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and thereupon bid him ſay, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt; which the Biſhop beginning, and oft aſſaying, could never ſay [and to the Holy Ghoſt] but ſaid it plainly when he was put out of his Biſhoprick. And yet was not the Church in that age ſo barren of vertue, but that it afforded ſome good Biſhops, as William Biſhop of Durham, Founder of Univerſity-Colledge in Oxford, but eſpecially Biſhop Wolſtan; whom upon Lanfrank's reporting to be inſufficient for the place, for want of Learning, the King commanded to put off his Pontifical Robes, and to leave his Biſhoprick: when ſuddenly out of a divine Inſpiration, Wolſtan anſwered, A better then you, O King, beſtowed theſe Robes upon me, and to him I will reſtore them. And therewithall going to St. Edward's ſhrine, who had made him a Biſhop, and putting off his Robes, he ſtruck his Staff, upon St. Edward's Monument, which ſtuck ſo faſt in the ſtone of it, that by no ſtrength it could be drawn forth, till he drew it forth himſelf: which ſo terrified both Lanfrank and the King, that they intreated him to take his Robes again, and keep his Biſhoprick. Alſo Oſwald Biſhop of Salisbury, who deviſed a form of Prayers to be daily uſed in his Church, and was uſed afterwards in other Churches, from whence proceeded the common ſaying of Secundum uſum Sarum. In this Kings time was Berengarius, who denied the true body of Chriſt to be in the Sacrament; Alſo in his time, Pope Gregory the ſeventh, removed married Prieſts from executing Divine Service, whereof great troubles aroſe in England: alſo in his time was inſtituted the Feaſt of the conception of the Virgin Mary: alſo in his time, Pope Gregory the ſeventh, in a Synod holden at Rome, ordained that none ſhould be called Pope but only the Biſhop of Rome, where before all Biſhops were called Popes.

Works of Piety, by him and others, in his time.

THis King founded the Abbey of Battel in Suſſex, where he overcame Harold, as a monument in memory of his Victory; but there ſucceeded a greater monument in memory of this Battel, if it be true which Newbrigenſis ſaith, that after every ſmall rain, the Graſs where the Battel was fought, ſhews to be of the colour of blood, and had continued to do ſo, to his dayes, who lived in the time of King Stephen, almoſt an hundred years after the Battel was fought. The Abbey of Selby in Yorkſhire; and a third near London, called St. Saviours. He founded founded also the Priory of St. Nicholas at Exeter, and gave great priviledges to St. Martins le Grand in London; which Church was founded before the Conquest, by Ingelricus and Emardus his Brother, Cousins to King Edward the Confessour. He also builded the Tower of London: namely the great white and square Tower there. These were this Kings works of Piety in England; but in Normandy he founded also an Abbey at Caen, where his Wife Maude built also a Monastery of Nuns. He gave also to the Church of St. Stephens in Caen, two Mannors in Dorsetshire, one Mannor in Devonshire, another in Essex, much land in Barkshire, some in Norfolk, a Mansion in Woodstreet, London, with many Advowsons of Churches; and even he gave his Crown and Regal Ornaments to the said Church, being of his own Foundation: for the redemption whereof, his Son Henry gave the Mannor of Brydleton in Dorsetshire. In this Kings time Robert, Son to Hildebert Lacies founded the Priory of Pontfraight: Henry Earl Ferrers founded a Priory within his Castle at Tutbury; Alwyne Childe, a Citizen of London, founded the Monastery of St. Saviours at Bermondsey, in Southwark, and gave the Monks there divers Rents in London: Also in this Kings time, Maurice Bishop of London, after the firing of the former Church of St. Paul in London, began the Foundation of the New Church, a work so admirable, that many thought it would never have been finished. Towards the building of the East end whereof, the King gave the choice stones of his Castle at the West end of the City, upon the bank of the River Thames; which Castle having been at that time fired, in place thereof Edward Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury, did afterwards found a Monastery of Black-fryers. The King also gave the Mannor of Starford to the same Maurice, and to his Successours in that See; after whose decease, Richard his next successour bestowed all the Rents of his Bishoprick to advance the building of this Church, maintaining himself by his private Patrimony: and yet all he could do, made no great shew, but the finishing of the work was left to many other succeeding Bishops. In the fifteenth year of this Kings reign, William Bishop of Durham, founded University-Colledge in Oxford; Also one Gilbert a Norman Lord, founded the Abbey of Merton in Surrey, seven miles from London; and Thomas Archbishop of York first builded the Minster of York. In this Kings sixteenth year, his Brother Duke Robert being sent against the Scots, builded a Fort, where at this day standeth New-Castle upon Tyne: but the Town and Walls were builded afterward by King John. Also in this Kings time Ledes Castle in Kent was builded by Creveken, and the Castle of Oxford, by Robert d' Oylie; two Noblemen that came into England with him. Osmund Bishop of Salisbury built the new Church there: Also Waring Earl of Shrewsbury, built two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury: and another at Wenlock.

St. Fauls Church new founded.

University Colledge in Oxford founded.

New-Castle upon Tyne builded.

Casualties happening in his time.

A great fire in London.

IN the twentieth year of his Reign, so great a fire happened in London, that from the West-Gate to the East Gate, it consumed Houses and Churches all the way, and amongst the rest the Church of St. Paul, the most grievous fire that ever happened in that City. Also this year, by reason of distemperature of weather, Thunders and Lightnings, by which many men perished, there insued a Famine, and afterwards a miserable mortality of Men and Cattel; and which is very strange, Hens, Peacocks, Geese, and Ducks bred in, and accustomed to houses, forsook their wonted hives, and turned wilde. (Matth. Westmon. Anno Dom. 1087.) Also this year in the Province of Wales, upon the Sea-shore, was found the body of Gawen, Sisters Son to Arthur, the great King of the Britains, reported to be fourteen foot in length. Also in this Kings time, a great Lord sitting at a Feast, was set upon by Mice; and though he were removed from Land to Sea, and from Sea again to Land; yet the Mice still followed him, and at last devoured him.

The body of Gawen, sisters Son to King Arthur, found.

A Lord eaten up with Mice.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE had to Wife, and her only, Mathilde, or Maud, Daughter to Baldwyn Earl of Flanders. She was Crowned Queen of England, the second year of his reign: the seventeenth year of his reign she died. A Woman only memorable for this, that nothing memorable is recorded of her, but that she built a Nunnery at Caen in Normandy, where she lies buried. By her he had four Sons and five Daughters. His Sons were, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry: of whom Robert the eldest called Court-cayse of his short Thighs, or Court-hose, of his short Breeches, or Courtois, of his courteous behaviour, (for so many are the comments upon his name) succeeded his Father in the Dutchy of Normandy. Richard his second Son was kill'd by misfortune, hunting in the New Forest. William his third Son, called Rufus, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England. Henry his youngest Son, called Beauclerk for his learning, had by his Fathers will five thousand pounds in money, and the Inheritance also of his Mother: His Daughters were Cicelie, Constace, Adela, Margaret, and Elenor, of whom Cicelie was Abbess of Caen in Normandy. Constace was married to Alan Earl of Britain. Adela to Stephen Earl of Blois. Margaret affianced to Harold King of England, but never married, and died young. Elenor betrothed to Aphonsus King of Gallicia, but desiring to die a Virgin, she had her wish, spending her time so much in Prayer, that with continual kneeling her knees were brawned.

Robert Courtois why so called.

Good Devotion.

Of his personage and Condition.

HE was but mean of stature, yet big of Body, and therewithal so strong, that few were able to draw his Bow: growing in years he was bald before; his beard alwayes shaven, after the manner of the Normans; and in his younger time, he was much given to that infirmity of Youth, which grows out of strength of Youth, Incontinency. After he was once married, whether out of saciety, or out of Grace, he was never known to offend in that kinde. Of so ſo perfect health, that he was never ſick, till that ſickneſs whereof he died. Of a ſtern countenance, yet of an affable nature: In War as expert as valiant: In Peace, as Provident as prudent: and in all his Enterprizes as fortunate, as bold and hardy. Much given to Hunting and Feaſting, where he was no leſs pleaſant then magnificent. He made no great proficiency in learning, as having had his Education in the licentiouſneſs of the French Court; yet he favoured learned men, and drew out of Italy, Lanfrank, Anſelm, Durand, Tarherne, and divers others, famous at that time for Learning and great Piety. Very devout he was, and alwayes held the Clergy in exceeding great Reverence. And this is one ſpecial honour attributed unto him, that from him we begin the Computation of our Kings of England.

His Places of Reſidence.

HIS Chriſtmas he commonly kept at Gloceſter, his Eaſter at Wincheſter, and his Whitſuntide at Weſtminſter, and once in the year at one of theſe places would be new Crowned; as though by often putting on his Crown, he thought to make it ſit the eaſier upon his head. And for the houſes which the Kings of England had in thoſe dayes in London; I finde that at Weſtminſter was a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England, from the time of Edward the Confeſſour; which in the Reign of King Henry the Eight, was by caſual fire burnt down to the ground. A very large and ſtately Palace this was, and in that Age, for building, incomparable. The Remains whereof are the Chamber of aſſembling the High Court of Parliament, and the next unto it; wherein anciently they were wont to begin the Parliament, called St. Edward's Painted Chamber; becauſe the Tradition holdeth, that the ſaid King Edward died in it. Adjoyning unto this, is the White-hall, wherein at this day the Court of Requeſts is kept: Beneath this, is the Great Hall; where Courts of Juſtice are now kept: This Hall which we now have, was built by King Richard the ſecond, out of the ground; as appeareth by his Arms engraven in the ſtone work: (when he had plucked down the old Hall, built before by William Rufus) and made it his own habitation. But the aforeſaid Palace, after it was burnt down in Anno 1512. lay deſolate, and King Henry the Eight ſhortly after tranſlated the Kings ſeat, to a houſe not far off, built by Cardinal Woolſey, and is called White-hall. The Tower of London was anciently uſed by the Kings of England to lodge in. Other houſes they anciently had; one where Bridewel now ſtandeth, out of the ruines whereof, the now Bridewel was built. Another called the Tower-Royal, now the Kings Wardrobe. Another in Bucklers-bury, called Sernes Tower. Another where the now Popes-head Tavern is, over againſt the Old Exchange, thought to have been the Kings Houſe; alſo another in Limeſtreet, called the Kings Artirce. Alſo another in the Old Jury; and oft-times they made uſe of Baynards Caſtle. But theſe are all long ſince demoliſhed, that we may ſee Palaces and Places have their fates and periods as well as men. And as for his Arms, he gave three Lions paſſant Gold in a Field Gules; which have ever ſince been uſed as peculiar to the Crown of England; to which three Flower de Luces were added by King Edward the Third, by reaſon of his claim to the Crown of France.

His Death and Burial.

TOwards the end of his Reign, he appointed his two Sons, Robert and Henry, with joynt authority, Governours of Normandy. Theſe went together, to viſit the King of France lying at Conſtance; where entertaining the time with variety of ſports, Henry played with Lewis the Heir of France at Cheſs, and winning much money of him, Lewis grew ſo cholerick, that he threw the Cheſs-men at Henries face, calling him the Son of a Baſtard; and thereupon Henry ſtruck Lewis with the Cheſs-board, and had preſently ſlain him, if his Brother Robert had not ſtept in and ſtayed him. Upon this the King of France invades Normandy, and draws Robert, King William's eldeſt Son, to joyn with him againſt his Father: But King William coming preſently over with an Army, was ſoon reconciled to his Son; yet being corpulent and in years, was by this means much diſtempered in body, and ſo retired to Roan, where he ſtayed, as not being well in health. The French King hearing of his ſickneſs, ſcoffingly ſaid, that he lay in Childe-bed of his great belly. Which ſo incenſed King William, that he ſwore by Gods Reſurrection and his Brightneſs, (his uſual Oath) that as ſoon as he ſhould be Churched of that Childe, he would offer a thouſand Lights in France: and indeed he performed it. For he entred France in Arms, and ſet many Towns and Corn-fields on fire, in which he was ſo violent, that by reaſon of his travel, and the unreaſonable heat, being in the month of Auguſt, it brought upon him a relapſe of his ſickneſs, and withal, leaping on Horſeback over a Ditch, his fat belly did bear ſo hard upon the pommel of his Saddle, that he took a Rupture in his inner parts; whereupon returning to Roan, his ſickneſs ſo increaſed, that in ſhort time he dyed. And that which is ſcarce credible, yet recorded for certain, the very ſame day he dyed at Roan, his death was known at Rome, a thouſand miles off; which if it be true, it ſeems there are certain Inviſible Intelligencers, that can make ſuch ſpeed: whereof Froiſſard tells a ſtrange ſtory; and for the ſtrangeneſs not unworthy to be here related. There was (ſaith he) in the time of King Edward the Third, a Knight in France, called Coraſſe, who could tell any thing that was done all the world over, the very day it was done, or within a day or two, how far ſoever it were off; and this he did by ſuch an inviſible Intelligencer, for he had gotten a Familiar Spirit, called Orthone, who brought him the news continually; and held on this courſe with him divers years, till at laſt he loſt him, by this occaſion. He had only heard the voice of his ſpirit Orthone, and now had great longing to ſee his ſhape: whereupon the ſpirit ſeeing his earneſtneſs; Well then (ſaith he) to morrow morning when you riſe out of your bed, the firſt thing you ſee ſhall be I. So the the Knight riſing the next morning, looked out, but could ſee nothing: whereupon he blamed his ſpirit Orthone, for not keeping his promiſe with him. Orthone anſwered, he had kept his promiſe: for ſaith he, bethink your ſelf, what it was you firſt ſaw after your riſing. Then the Knight bethinking himſelf, remembred he ſaw two ſtraws upon the ground, tumbling upon one another: Why (ſaith Orthone) that was I. Then the Knight deſired he might ſee him in ſuch a ſhape, as that he might take notice of him. Well then, ſaid Orthone, to morrow morning when you riſe, the firſt thing you ſee, that ſhall be I. So the next morning, the Knight riſing, and looking out of his Chamber Window, the firſt thing he ſaw was a Sow, ſo lean and deformed, that he could not abide to ſee it: and thereupon cauſed his men to ſet Dogs upon it, to drive it away: which being done, the Sow vaniſhed away; after this his ſpirit Orthone never came to him any more, And this relation Froiſſard had from the Knights own mouth: and by ſuch a like means, it might perhaps be, that the death of King William was known at Rome, the very day he died at Roan, though a thouſand miles aſunder. And now to go on with the ſtory: William the Conquerour in all the time of his ſickneſs retained to the very laſt his memory and ſpeech; and ſhewed many demonſtrations of his Devotion, and true contrition, ſpecially for his ſeverity uſed towards the Engliſh. And thus he who was a Conquerour of men, was conquered himſelf by death, the ninth day of September, when he had reigned twenty years, and near eleven months, in the threeſcore and fourth year of his age: Malmesbury ſaith in the fifty ninth. I may well ſay he was conquered by death, ſeeing death uſed him more deſpitefully, then ever he living uſed any whom he had conquered: For no ſooner was the breath out of his body, but his attendants purloining what they could lay hands on, forſook him and fled, leaving his body almoſt naked upon the ground. Afterwards, William, Archbiſhop of Roan, commanded his body ſhould be conveyed to Caen, but his command was little regarded: till at laſt, one Herlewyne, a Countrey Knight, at his own charges cauſed his body to be Embalmed, and conveyed thither; where the Abbot and Monks meeting the corps, ſuddenly in the midſt of their ſolemnities, a violent fire brake out in the Town, with the fright whereof, every man left the place; and thus was his body the ſecond time left forlorn. In the end a few Monks returned, and accompanied the Herſe to the Abbey Church; but when the Divine Office was ended, and the body ready to be laid in the Grave, one Anſelm Fitz Arthur, ſtood up and claimed that ground to have been the Floor of his Fathers houſe, which King William had violently wreſted from him, and thereupon charged them, as they would anſwer it before the dreadful face of God, not to cover his Body with the earth of his Inheritance. Whereupon after ſome pauſe, agreement was made with him, and three pound was paid in hand for the ground broken up, and an hundred pounds more afterwards for the ground it ſelf, paid him by Henry, the Kings youngeſt Son, who only of all his Sons was preſent at the Funeral. And yet this was not all, but when his body was to be put in the earth, it happened that the Sepulchre of ſtone which ſtood within the Grave, was hewen ſomewhat too ſtrait for his fat belly, ſo as they were fain to preſs it down with ſome violence, with which, whether his bowels burſt, or whether ſome Excrements were forced out of their natural paſſage, ſuch an intollerable ſtinck proceeded from him, that none were able to indure it, but made all the haſte they could to be gone, And yet neither was this the laſt of his miſeries, for in the year 1562. when Caſtillion took the City of Caen, certain diſſolute Souldiers opened his Tomb, and not finding the Treaſure they expected, threw forth his bones with great deriſion: whereof ſome were afterward brought into England. So that if we conſider his many troubles in life, and after his death: we may well think, that notwithſtanding all his greatneſs, a very mean man would hardly be perſwaded to change fortunes with him.

King William being dead, how neglected and moleſted at his burial.

The Arms born by King William.

He bare the ſame Arms as peculiar to the Crown of England; which all ſucceeding Princes have uſed: namely, Three Lions paſſant Gold in a Field Gules: for as for the three Flowre de Luces, they were added by King Edward the third, upon his claim of the Crown of France.

Men of Note in his time.

MEN of Learning in his time, were but rare in this Iſland, yet ſome there were, particularly Marianus Scotus, a Hiſtoriograhper, and Alpheredus a Monk of Beverly, a Writer alſo of Hiſtorical Argument. And as for the men of Valour, they are not to be expected in a time of ſervitude, but as if all the Engliſh valour were now remaining in the Kentiſh men, they only made reſiſtance, when all other Countries had ſubmitted. Yet it is memorable in this time, what a private Norwegian Souldier did, who himſelf alone upon a Bridge, reſiſted the whole Army of the Engliſh, ſlew forty of them, and maintained the place for divers hours together, till one getting under the bridge, found means to thruſt up a Spear into his body and killed him.

The REIGN of KING WILLIAM THE SECOND.

William Rufus is Crowned.

Anno Dom. 1087.

KING William the ſecond, called Rufus, ſecond Son to William the Conquerour, appointed Succeſſor by his Fathers Will, was upon the fifth of October, in the year 1087. by Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Crowned at Weſtminſter King of England. Wherein his Father ſeems to have followed the example of Jacob, who gave to his younger Son Joſeph, the Land which he had taken with his Sword and his Bow: for with his Sword and his Bow, had King William gotten the Land of England; and therefore might juſtly beſtow it on which of his Sons he pleaſed. And beſides, there was cauſe enough, why he ſhould ſhew this Son of his ſome extraordinary favour, ſeeing in the Rebellion of his Brother Robert, yet he ſtood firmly for his Father; and in his quarrel incurred no ſmall hazard of his life, as wherein he received divers wounds: and perhaps alſo, his Father thought the rough diſpoſition of this Son, fitter to bridle the inſurrections of the Engliſh, then the ſoftly diſpoſition of his Son Robert.

His brother is incited to claim the Crown.

But though he have thus quietly gotten the Crown, he muſt not look to hold it ſo; and indeed at his very beginning is aſſaulted with two troubles in one: for both his Brother Robert prepares to recover it from him, and the Lords of the Kingdom combine with Robert to aſſiſt him in it. The firſt mover of this trouble was Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, his Unkle, who finding himſelf not to bear the ſway he expected, and ſpecially for an old grudge he bore to Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and by whoſe means, in the former Kings time he had been impriſoned, the Archbiſhop telling him, that though he might not impriſon a Biſhop, yet he might impriſon an Earl of Kent (as this Otho was made not long before) he draws many other Biſhops and Temporal Lords to joyn with him, in behalf of Duke Robert againſt the King: but though the ſtorm were violent for a while, yet it ſoon paſſed over; that indeed of his Lords, with more difficulty: but that of his Brother Robert with more coſt: for it was at laſt agreed, that Rufus ſhould pay him three thouſand marks a year, during his life, and leave him the Kingdom after his own deceaſe. But there was difficulty in repreſſing his Rebel Lords by reaſon of their ſpreading themſelves abroad in many quarters. For Odo fortified himſelf in Kent, Roger Mountgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeſhire; Hugh de Grandmenil, in Leiceſterſhire, and Northamptonſhire; Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, poſſeſt himſelf of Briſtow; William Biſhop of Durham, of the North parts of the Realm; and divers other of the Clergy, and Nobility, fortifie themſelves in Herefordſhire, Shropſhire, Worceſterſhire, and all the Countreys adjoyning to Wales, thinking by this means to diſtract the King that he ſhould not know where to begin, nor whither to turn him. But this courſe, as it made it hard to repreſs them ſuddenly, ſo it made it eaſie to repreſs them at leaſure; for being thus divided, they were but as ſingle ſticks, that are eaſily broken; where if they had united themſelves, as into a Faggot, they might have made a ſtrength of far greater reſiſtance. But the King having Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, firm of his ſide: partly by their Authority and love amongſt the people; but chiefly by his own promiſes, to reſtore their ancient Laws, and to allow them liberty of hunting in his Foreſts, he ſo firmly won the hearts of all unto him; that ſome of the Rebel Lords he reconciled with fair words: as Robert Mountgomery; (a principal ſinew of the Faction) ſome again he maſtered by ſtrong hand; and Odo the chief Engineer of all the work, he beſieged in the Caſtle of Rocheſter, took him Priſoner, and forced him to abjure the Realm. And thus this great Rebellion was ſuppreſſed: In which it is obſervable, that though ſo many hot bloods were up, yet there was but little blood ſpilt. A happy rebellion for the Engliſh; for the Rebel Lords and Biſhops being all Normans, the King had none to truſt to, but the Engliſh, whom for their faithfulneſs to him in this ſervice, he ever after reſpected more then he had done before,

The Rebel Lords are won or overcome.

The Engliſh firmer to King William then the Normans.

He is compounded with for 3000 marks a year.

This year died Lanfrank, after he had been Archbiſhop of Canterbury eighteen years, who had brought the Monks to ſome good order, that before his time followed hunting and hawking, dicing and carding, to the great diſcredit of their profeſſion.

An. Reg. 3. 1090.

After this ſtorm was over in the South, there ariſeth another in the North; For now Malcolme King of Scots, thinking it a fit time to do ſome feats when King William was troubled at home, invades Northumberland, and having burnt and ſpoiled the Countrey, returns home laden with booties: Which King William hearing, he takes his brother Robert along with him, and with a mighty Army enters Scotland, brings Malcolme to acknowledge his ancient homage: and upon Faith given, returns to London. After this, Duke Robert finding his brother King William not to keep his promiſe, in paying his Penſion, complains to the King of France, and with his aid, aid, assaults and take some Towns, which he before had delivered in pawn for money to his brother King William; who hearing of it, hastens into Normandy with an Army, and by the mediation of money takes off the King of France, and makes his brother, being left destitute of assistance, to ask him pardon; a wise and merciful course in King William; for to buy his peace with the King of France, did cost him but money, where to have purchased it by War, must besides money, have cost the lives of many.

An. Reg. 6. 1093. After this Malcolm, King of Scots, came in kindness to visit King William at Glocester: but the King not vouchsafing so much as to see him, put him into so great an indignation, that returning home, he makes ready an Army, invades Northumberland, making great spoil, and getting great spoils, but by Robert Mowbray, the Kings Lieutenant there, was taken in ambush, and together with his eldest Son Edward, defeated and slain. This King Malcolm was a most valiant Prince, as may appear by an Act of his of an extraordinary strain; for hearing of a conspiracy plotted to murther him, whereof one was Author, whose name is not recorded, he dissembled the knowing of it, till being abroad one day a hunting, he took the fellow apart from the company, and being alone, said unto him: Here now is a fit time and place, to do that manfully, which you have intended to do treacherously; draw your weapon, and if you kill me, none being present, you can incur no danger: with which speech of the King, the fellow was so daunted that presently he fell down at his feet, confessed his fault, humbly asked forgiveness, and being granted him, was ever after serviceable and faithful to him. The death of King Malcolme and his Son, was so grievous, and so grievously taken of Margaret his Queen, the Sister of Edgar Atheling, that she made it her Prayer, and had it granted, not to over-live them, and so within three daies after died. A woman as full of vertues all her life, as at this time of sorrows; whom yet I should not break order to mention, but for one Pious Act of hers, in causing a most barbarous custome of Scotland to be abrogated, that when a man married, his Lord should lie the first night with his Bride. Which custome by her endeavour was altered to a payment in money.

Malcolme King of Scots with his eldest Son Edward is slain.

With grief of whose death his Queen Margaret dyeth within three daies.

A barbarous custom in Scotland abrogated her means.

After these troubles were ended in the North, a new trouble ariseth in the West; for now the Welsh men hearing of King William's distractions, enter upon the English borders, making spoil and havock of men and Towns: whom King William went with an Army to encounter, but could do no good upon them, till he was fain to return to London, and provide him a stronger Army. About this time also Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, by whom Malcolme King of Scots was in King William's service formerly slain; finding his service not rewarded as he expected, enters into conspiracy against the King: but the King being informed of the practice, seiseth suddenly upon many of his Complices; and himself, after many devices and shifts for flight, is taken and put in Prison, in the Castle of Windsor. After this, King William to take a further revenge of the Welsh, and to make an absolute conquest of that unquiet people, with a far greater Army than ever before, enters Wales, and thinks with new devices of Castles and Forts, utterly to subdue them; but they defending themselves, with their Woods and Mountainous passages, tyre and weary out the King and his Army, so as he leaves the business to two Hughs, one Earl of Salop, the other of Chester, who first invaded and took Anglesey, (their Island of refuge) where they used all kinde of cruelty, pulling out of eyes, and cutting off hands and noses: in prosecuting of which business, Hugh Earl of Salop was slain, but Hugh Earl of Chester, entred Wales, and in the end with the slaughter of Rees, the last King of Wales, made an absolute conquest of the Countrey. For after this, though they had often rebelled, yet they were in a true subjection. And these for the most part, were all the troubles of his reign: where we may observe, that none of them did overtake him, but still he met them; and from none of them he ever fled, but was still the pursuer; and yet so many as might well have taken away all the comfort of a Crown, and have made him willing to change his Diadem for a pair of Beads: but that Ambition, though sometimes weary, yet never tires.

His Exactions and Courses for raising of Money.

IN the second year of his Reign, Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury dyed, who had kept the Kingdom and King in some good order; but assoon as he was dead, the King, as though he were then got loose, ranged without reins, in all licentiousness, praying especially upon the Clergy, as amongst whom he found the richest Booties. When Bishopricks or Abbeys were vacant, it was familiar with him to seise them into his own hands, as this of Lanfranks, he kept to his own use four years together, and longer would have kept it, if a sickness of his body had not healed this disease of his minde; For finding himself in some hazard of death, he then conferred the Archbishoprick of Canterbury upon Anselm, and the Bishoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet, two eminent men of that time: but assoon as he was well again, it repented him of that he had done, and he was not quiet, till he had drawn from the said Bloet, five thousand pounds, and from Anselm also good sums of money. For he repented not more in time of sickness for the evil he had done in health, then being in health he repented of the good he had done in sickness; that it may in a manner be said, there was nothing made him sick but health, and nothing made him be in health but sickness. But this preying upon the Clergy was grown into such a custome with him, that he kept in his hands at one time, three Bishopricks, Canterbury, Winchester, and Salisbury, and twelve Abbeys; all which he let out to Farm, and received the profits: and from this King the use is said to have risen first in England, that the Kings succeeding had the Temporalties of Bishops Sees, as long as they remained void. Having agreed to pay the King of France a great sum of money, he raised it in this manner; He caused twenty thousand men to be levied, under pretence for his wars in Normandy; but when they were ready to be shipped, it was signified to them from the King, that whosoever would pay ten shillings towards the levying of Souldiers in Normandy, should be excused from going, and ſtay at home; which was ſo plauſible an offer to the Army, that ſcarce a man was found that accepted not that condition. When Duke Robert went into the Holy Land he pawned his Dutchy of Normandy to his Brother King William for 6666 pounds, or as ſome write, for 12600. which money King William took up part by a grievous Impoſition: ſo that Biſhops melted their Plate, and the Temporal Lords ſpoiled their Tenants for the payment thereof: and part by loan; but chiefly of Religions Perſons. He ſold the Abbey of Glaſtenbury to Thurſtan for five hundred pounds; and when he built Weſtminſter Hall, he made that an occaſion to lay a heavy tax upon the people, who grudged at it, as done on purpoſe. He uſually ſold all Spiritual Preferments, to them who would give moſt; and took Fines of Prieſts for Fornication, as alſo he took money of Jews, to cauſe ſuch of them as were converted, to renounce Chriſtianity, and return to Judaiſm, as making more benefit by their unbelief then by their converſion. He cauſed divers of the Nobility to pay grievous Fines for tranſgreſſing his Laws, though the fault were never ſo ſmall. He ſet forth a Proclamation that none ſhould go out of the Realm without his Licence, by which he drew much mony from many; for either they muſt tarry at home and live diſcontented, or elſe content him for giving them leave to go abroad. And from thence the Cuſtom or Law of Ne exeas Regno, ſeems to have taken its beginning: for Precedents of ſervitude are ſure to live, where Precedents of Liberty are commonly ſtil-born. Theſe were his wayes for raiſing of money, wherein Promoters and informers and informers were his darling ſervants; and the moſt officious of all was Ralph Biſhop of Durham, of whom he would often ſay, there was not ſuch a man in the world to ſerve a Kings turn. And yet he was not ſo greedy of lucre, but that he did ſome acts that may ſerve for examples; as one time, an Abby being vacant, two Monks of the Covent came ſuiters to him for the place, offering great ſums, and each of them out-bidding the other; whereupon the King looking about, and eſpying another Monk ſtanding not far off, asked him what he would give for the place? Who anſwering, he neither had any thing to give, nor would give any thing if he had it: Well (ſaid the King) thou haſt ſpoken honeſtly, thou art fitter to be Abbot then either of theſe; and ſo beſtowed the place upon him gratis.

Of his Magnanimity.

WOrd was brought him as he ſat at dinner, that his City of Mans in Normandy was beſieged, and in great danger to be taken, if not preſently relieved: whereupon the King asked which way Mans lay; and then cauſed Maſons preſently to take down the Wall, to make him paſſage the next way, and ſo rode inſtantly towards the Sea. His Lords about him, adviſing him to ſtay till his people were ready, No (ſaith he) ſuch as love me I know will follow me. And being come on Shipboard, and the weather growing very tempeſtuous, he was adviſed by the Maſter of his Ship, to ſtay for ſome calmer ſeaſon: No (ſaith he,) Fear nothing, I never yet heard of any King that was drowned. And thereby coming to Mans unexpected, preſently diſperſed the Beſiegers, and took Helias, Count de la Fleſche, who had been Author of the tumult, priſoner; who vaunting to the King, and ſaying, Now indeed you have taken me by a wile; but if I were at liberty again, you ſhould finde me to do other kinde of feats: at which the King laughing, Well then (ſaith he) go your waies and do your worſt, and let us ſee what feats you will do. Being reconciled to his Brother Robert, he aſſiſted him to recover the Fort of Mount St. Michael, which their brother Henry did formerly hold in Normandy: during which ſiege, ſtragling one time alone upon the ſhoar, he was ſet upon by three Horſemen, who aſſaulted him ſo fiercely, that they drove him from his ſaddle, and his ſaddle from his Horſe; but he taking up his ſaddle, and withall drawing out his Sword, defended himſelf till reſcue came: and being afterward blamed for being ſo obſtinate to ſave his ſadle, he anſwered: It would have angred me at the very heart, that the knaves ſhould have bragged they had won the ſaddle from me.

In what he was juſt in keeping his word, in what he was failing.

THis vertue eſpecially was commended in him, and he would often ſay, That even God himſelf was obliged by his Word. But if we obſerve the courſe of his life, we ſhall finde that howſoever he might keep his word in ſmall matters, yet certainly not in great: For he kept not his word with his brother Robert, to whom he promiſed to leave his Kingdom of England after his deceaſe, but performed it not. Nor he kept not his word with his Subjects, for in the rebellion of the Norman Lords, he promiſed the Engliſh, if they would now ſtick to him, they ſhould have their ancient Laws reſtored, and be allowed liberty to hunt in his Foreſts; which promiſe he kept not at all, or at leaſt ſoon brake. Nor he kept not his word with God himſelf; for being ſick at Gloceſter, and in ſome hazard of his life, he made a ſolemn vow, that if he recovered he would lead a new life, and give over all his diſorderly courſes: but being recovered he grew more diſorderly then he was before: that if denomination be made from the greateſt actions, it cannot be truly ſaid, that he was juſt of his word. But ſuch is the priviledge of Princes over their Subjects, that if they make a promiſe, it muſt be believed; and if they break it, it muſt not be queſtioned.

Of his Incontinency and Prodigality.

MUch is ſpoken of his laſcivious life in general, but nothing in particular; for neither is mentioned any violence he ever offered to any; nor is any woman named to have been his Concubine; and Princes Concubines are ſeldom concealed. It is true, he was never marryed and of a ſtrong conſtitution of body, and ſo probable he might be inclined to that vice: but probabilities are not alwayes concluding, and therefore whether it be a true accuſation, or but a ſlander, it may well be doubted; only one baſe Son is ſpoken of, called Bertrannus, whom he advanced in honour, and matched in a Noble Family.

King William never married.

Family. But why ſhould we look more for particulars of his Incontinency, then of his Prodigality? for he was taxed no leſs for being Prodigal, then for being Incontinent; and yet for his Prodigality there is not ſo much as one inſtance recorded, unleſs we take this for an inſtance; that when his Chamberlain brought him a pair of hoſe, which becauſe they were new, he asked what they coſt? And being told they coſt three ſhillings, in a great chafe he threw them away; asking him, If he thought a pair of thoſe of 3 s. to be fit for a King to wear? Get thee gone (ſaith he) and let me have a pair of a Mark. His Chamberlain went, and bringing him another pair ſcarce ſo good as the former, and telling him they coſt a Mark; I marry (ſaith the King) theſe are ſomething like, and was better ſatisfied with hearing what they coſt, then with ſeeing what they were worth: and yet was this no imputation to his wiſdom, for to ſay the truth, it is no defect of wiſdom in a King to be ignorant what his clothes are worth.

A coſtly ſuit for a King.

Of his wavering in Religion.

HE appointed a diſputation to be held between Chriſtians and Jews, and before the day came, the Jews brought the King a Preſent, to the end they might have an indifferent hearing; The King took the Preſent, encouraging them to quit themſelves like men: and ſwore by St. Luke's face (his uſual Oath) that if they prevailed in Diſputation, he would himſelf turn Jew, and be of their Religion. A yong Jew on a time was converted to the Chriſtian Faith, whoſe Father being much troubled at it, preſented the King ſixty Marks, intreating him to make his Son to return to his Judaiſm; whereupon the King ſent for his Son, comman[illegible]n without more ado to return to the Religion of his Nation: But the young man anſwered, he wondred his Majeſty would uſe ſuch words; for being a Chriſtian, he ſhould rather perſwade him to Chriſtianity: with which anſwer the King was ſo confounded, that he commanded the young man to get him out of his ſight. But his Father finding the King could do no good upon his Son, required his money again, Nay (ſaith the King) I have taken pains enough for it; and yet that thou maiſt ſee how kindly I will deal, you ſhall have one half; and the other half you cannot in conſcience deny me. There were fifty Gentlemen accuſed for hunting and killing the Kings Deer, which they denyed, and were therefore condemned to the trial of fire, which by Gods merciful judgement they paſſed through untouched: the King hearing it, and deceived of the confiſcation expected, is ſaid in a great chaſe to ſay; How happens this? Is God a juſt Judge in ſuffering it? Now a murrain take him that believes it. It ſeems alſo he doubted in many points of Religion, then in credit; For he would often proteſt, that he believed not that Saints could profit any man in Gods ſight, and therefore neither would he, nor any other that were wiſe (as he affirmed) make Interceſſion either to Peter, or to any other for help.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

THE King claimed the Inveſtiture of Biſhops to be his right, and forbad Appeals and Intercourſe to Rome: for Appeals had been ſeldom uſed till Anſelm in this Kings reign appealed to the Pope; upon whoſe complaint the Pope was about to Excommunicate the King, but having a little before Excommunicated the Emperour Henry the fourth, he forbare at that time to do it, leſt by making Excommunication common, he ſhould make it be ſlighted. At this time great contention aroſe between the King and Archbiſhop Anſelm; and Anſelm not yielding to the King in any point prejudicial to the Popes authority: nor the King yielding to Anſelm in any point prejudicial to his own Prerogative, (which were points indeed incompatible) the contention continued long and hot, and the hotter, becauſe there were at that time two Popes on foot at once; one elected by the Conclave, called Urbanus the ſecond; another ſet up by the Emperour called Clement the third: for Anſelm held with Urban, the King with Clement: and thus not agreeing in a third, it was impoſſibl they ſhould agree between themſelves. And this contention, though palliated with pretentions, ſometimes of one ſide, ſometimes of another; yet brake out again, and was renewed both in this Kings time, and in the time of many Kings after. Anſelm often threatning his going to Rome, the King told him plainly he would not thruſt him out of the Realm: but if he would go without his leave, he would then keep him out during his pleaſure; and beſides, he ſhould carry nothing out of the Realm with him. Yet Anſelm ventured it, and the King performed it; for William Warlewaſt was ſent to rifle him in his paſſage at Sea, of all he had, neither was he ſuffered to return as long as the King lived; during all which time, the King took the profits of his Archbiſhoprick to his own uſe. It may not be amiſs to ſhew a paſſage here concerning the firſt cauſe of contention between the King and Anſelm, which ſome ſay was this; The King required a thouſand Marks of him for having preferred him to that See; which Anſelm refuſed to give, as judging it no leſs Simony to give after the preferment then before: but yet afterward offering five hundred pounds, the King refuſed to accept it, as being worth (he ſaid) five times as much; whereupon Anſelm told him, Your Grace may have me, and all that is mine, to ſerve your turn in a friendly manner: but in the way of ſervitude and bondage, you ſhall neither have me nor mine; Which words ſo angred the King, that they could never after be reconciled. In this Kings Reign Pope Urban exhorted all Chriſtian Princes to joyn together for recovery of Jeruſalem and the Holy Land: and by the ſolliciting of Peter an Hermite, there aſſembled for that enterpriſe, under the conduct of Godfrey of Bulloigne, to the number of three hundred thouſand men; amongſt whom was Robert Duke of Normandy who ſo valiantly carryed himſelf in the action, that after Jeruſalem was won, the Kingdom of it (as ſome write) was offered to him: but he looking more after the Kingdom of England; and therefore refuſing it, it is obſerved he never proſpered all his life after. In this Kings reign, although he had no command in Ireland, yet their Biſhop of Dublin was ſent over to Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury,

* Wilfred before this appealed to the Pope; as Bede largely relateth.

Alſo in this Kings dayes the Pope forbad the marriage of Prieſts. And in his time, was the firſt Appeal to Rome, made by Anſelm, that ever before had been made in England.

Works of piety by this King, or by others in his time.

THis King gave the Monks of Southwark, the Church of St. Saviour of Bermondſey, and Bermondſey it ſelf; He alſo founded at York the Hoſpital of St. Leonards: He gave the Church of St. Peter in the City of Bathe to be a Biſhops See. Hugh Earl of Cheſter in this Kings days builded the Abbey of Cheſter: Oſwald Biſhop of Salisbury, founded the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. Remigius Biſhop of Dorcheſter, to the end his Biſhoprick might be removed to Lincoln, began to build the Cathedral Church of Lincoln; and Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury builded two Hoſpitals without the City; the one of St. John, the other at Harbaldown; repaired Chriſts Church, and cauſed five and twenty Manours to be reſtored to that See, which had unjuſtly been withholden. He repaired alſo the Abbey of St. Albans, and the Church of Rocheſter, where for four ſecular Prieſts he placed to the number of fifty Monks. In the ſixth year of this Kings Reign, William Warren the firſt Earl of Surrey, (who came with Duke William into England) and Gundred his Wife, founded the Abbey of Lewis in Suſſex: and Warren Earl of Shrewsbury, built two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury, the other at Wenlock. In his twelfth year, Robert Loſaunge Biſhop of Thetford, removed his See from Thetford to Norwich, and founded there a fair Monaſtery.

His Buildings and Structures.

THis King enlarged the Tower of London, and compaſſed it with new walls: he alſo built the great Hall at Weſtminſter, being 270. foot in length, and 74. in breadth; but thinking it too little, he intended to have built another Hall which ſhould have ſtretched from the Thames to the Kings ſtreet. He repaired the City and Caſtle of Carliſle, which had been waſted by the Danes two hundred years before; and becauſe it had but few Inhabitants, he brought a Colony thither out of the Southern parts. He finiſhed New-Caſtle upon Tyne and many other Caſtles erected or repaired upon the borders of Scotland; many alſo upon the Frontiers, and within the very Breaſt of Wales.

Caſualties happening in his Reign.

IN the fourth year of his Reign, on St. Lukes day, above ſix hundred houſes in London were thrown down with tempeſt, and the roof of St. Mary Bow Church in Cheapſide, was ſo raiſed, that in the fall ſix of the beams being 27. foot long, were driven ſo deep into the ground (the ſtreets being not then paved with ſtone) that not above four foot remained in ſight, and yet ſtood in ſuch rank and order as the workman had placed them upon the Church. Alſo in this Kings Reign all the Lands in Kent, ſometimes belonging to Earl Godwin, were by breaking in of the Sea covered with Sands, and are called Godwin's Sands to this day. In his eleventh year, at a Town called Finchamſtead in the County of Berks, a Well caſt out blood, as before it had done water; and after by the ſpace of fifteen dayes, great flames of fire were ſeen in ſundry places, and at ſundry times.

Of his Perſonage and Condition.

HE was but mean of ſtature, thick and ſquare bodied, his belly ſwelling ſomewhat round, his face was red, his hair deep yellow, whereof he was called Rufus, his forehead four ſquare like a window; his eyes ſpotted, and not one like another; his ſpeech unpleaſant, and ſtammering, eſpecially when he was moved with anger. Concerning the qualities of his minde, they may beſt be known by looking upon the actions of his life; in which we ſhall finde he was never more aſſured, then when he was leaſt ſure; never leſs dejected, then when in moſt extremity; being like a Cube, that which way ſo ever he fell, he was ſtill upon his bottom. For his delights to paſs the time, there was none in more requeſt with him then hunting, a delight hereditary to him; which was the cauſe that as his Father had begun the great new Foreſt, ſo he enlarged it to a far greater extent. Other delights of his we finde not any, unleſs we ſhall reckon his Wars for delights; for though they were oftentimes forced upon him, when he could not avoid them: yet ſometimes he entred into them when he needed not, but for his pleaſure. And in general, it may be ſaid that one of his greateſt virtues, was that which is one of the greateſt virtues, Magnanimity; and his worſt vice, was that which is the worſt of vices, Irreligion.

Preſages that precedeth his Death.

AT Finchamſtead in Barkshire, near unto Abington, a ſpring caſt up liquor for the ſpace of fifteen dayes, in ſubſtance and colour like to blood. The night before the King was kild, a certain Monk dreamed, that he ſaw the King gnaw the image of Chriſt crucified with his teeth; and that as he was about to bite away the legs of the ſame Image, Chriſt with his feet ſpurned him down to the ground: and that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, with abundance of ſmoak. This being related to the King by Robert Fitz Mammon, he made a jeſt of it, ſaying, This Monk would fain have ſomething for his Dream: Go, give him a hundred ſhillings; but bid him look that he dream more auſpicious Dreams hereafter. Alſo the ſame night, the King himſelf dream'd that the veins of his arms were broken, and that the blood iſſued out in great aboundance: and many other like paſſages there were, by which it ſeems he had friends ſomewhere, as well as Julius Caſar, that did all they could to give him warning: but that, as Caſars, ſo his malus Genius would not ſuffer him to take.

No warning can prevent deſtiny.

Of

Of his Death and Burial.

KIng William having kept his Chriſtmaſs at Gloceſter, his Eaſter at Wincheſter, his Whitſuntide at Weſtminſter; notwithſtanding forewarned by many ſigns of ſome great diſaſter toward him, would needs the day after Lammas, go a hunting in the New Foreſt; yet ſomething reſenting the many preſages, he ſtayed within all the forenoon. About dinner time, an Artificer came and brought him ſix Croſsbow Arrows, very ſtrong and ſharp; whereof four he kept himſelf, and the other two he delivered to Sir Walter Tyrel, a Knight of Normandy, his Bow-bearer, ſaying, Here Tyrel, take you two, for you know how to ſhoot them to purpoſe: and ſo having at dinner drank more liberally then his cuſtom, as it were in contempt of Preſages, out he rides into the New Foreſt, where Sir Walter Tyrel ſhooting at a Deer, at a place called Charingham, (where ſince a Chappel hath been erected) the Arrow glanced againſt a tree, or as ſome write, grazed upon the back of the Deer, and flying forward, hit the King upon the breaſt: with which he inſtantly fell down dead. Thus it is delivered by a common conſent of all; only one Sugerius a Writer that lived at that time, and was a familiar acquaintance of the ſaid Tyrels, againſt the current of all Writers, affirms that he had often heard the ſaid Sir Walter ſwear that he was not in the Foreſt with the King all that day. I have been the longer upon this point, becauſe a more pregnant example of Gods Judgement remains not any where upon record. For not only this King at this time, but before this, a Brother of his named Richard, a young Prince of great hope; and alſo a Nephew of his, the Son of his Brother Robert, came all in this place to violent deaths; that although King William the Founder of the Foreſt eſcaped the puniſhment in his own perſon, yet it was doubled and trebled upon him in his Iſſue. Thus died King William Rufus, in the three and fortieth year of his age, and twelfth and ſome months, of his reign. His body was drawn in a Colliers Cart, with one Horſe, to the City of Wincheſter, where the day following it was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Swithin, and was laid there in the Quire under a Marble ſtone; till afterward it was tranſlated, and laid by King Canutus bones.

[THE

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE FIRST.

Of his coming to the Crown.

Anno Dom. 1100.

ALthough Henry came not to the Crown, as his Brother William did, by the gift of his Father, yet he came to it by the Prophecy of his Father; for when his Father made his Will, and divided all his Estate in Land between his two Eldest Sons, giving to Henry his youngest only a portion in money, with which division he perceived him to be much discontented, he said unto him, content thy self Harry, for the time will come, that thy turn shall be served as well as theirs. And now the time was come that his Prediction was accomplished, for on the fifth of August, in the year 1100. he was Crowned King of England at Westminster by Maurice Bishop of London, (as Dean of all the Bishops of England, and therefore might do it without any prejudice to the Archbishop of Canterbury, though he had been present, who was indeed at this time in exile.) But though it appears fuisse in Fatis, to be decreed by the Divine Providence that it should be so; yet it would not have been so, if his own endeavours had not been concurring. And therefore being in the New Forrest, when his Brother King William was killed, he never stayed to complement the Disaster, but rode presently to Winchester, and there, not without some opposition of the keepers, seized upon his Brothers Treasure, as knowing Treasure to be the means of getting of Friends, and Friends the means for getting the Crown; and having now gotten the first means he made use of it for the second; and both of them together brought him to this he is. Yet withal there were circumstances in his own person that conduced to it; his Brother was born, when their Father was but a Duke, he, when he was a King; Robert but a Foraigner, being born in Normandy, himself a Native, born at Selby in Yorkshire; and it was not the least circumstance, that he was called Beauclerk, as much as to say, a good Scholar, having been bred in Cambridge; not perhaps that his learning was so great, but that it was great, either in respect of that age, which had but little, or in respect of his Brothers, who had none at all: and the people having been oppressed before, by the ill Government of two Kings that were illiterate, could not chuse but be glad to come under the Government of a King that was learned. And though his Brother Robert, as being the elder, had right unto it; yet he as out of sight was out of minde, and perhaps neglected, as being himself negligent: withal it was given out, that he was chosen King of Jerusalem, and therefore no looking for him to come home; and to give force to all these reasons, Henry Newborough Earl of Warwick was a principal furtherer.

King Henry is crowned. The Bishop of London is as Dean to all the Bishops of England.

Why Henry preferred before Robert his Brother.

His course for establishing himself in the Kingdom.

IT is a hard matter to keep that safely, which is unjustly gotten; and therefore he took all possible care to overcome that hardness, which he effected by these means: First he called Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury home from Exile; placed William Gyfford a learned man, in the Bishoprick of Winchester; and Monasteries that had been long vacant, he furnished with good Abbots. And because it is no less pleasing to the people to have bad Instruments punished, then the good to be advanced, he cast Ralph Bishop of Durham (a principal cause of their late oppressions) into prison, then mitigated the rigour of the new Laws, and promised restitution of the old. And that there might be no abuse in measures, he ordained a measure, made by the length of his own Arm, which is called a Yard. He restored to his Subjects the use of Lights and Fire in the night, which before had been forbidden after eight a clock at night. He acquitted the people from the Tax of Dane-gilt, and from all other unjust payments, which had been imposed upon them by the two former Kings. He gave free liberty to the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, to inclose Parks for Deer, and Warrens for Coneys, and such like Game. And because he knew Scotland might be an ill Neighbour to him, if not tied by some Bond, and none so sure as the Bond of Alliance, he therefore takes Matild sister of the present King Edgar to be his Wife.

Anselm called home from exile.

An. Reg. 2.

Ralph, Bishop of Durham, the late King William's greatest Instrument for Exactions, that had by this King been committed to the Tower, made an escape, and passing over to Duke Robert in Normandy, incenseth him, not to suffer himself to be baffled by a younger Brother: as for his Brother William there was some reason, because his Father had given him the Kingdom by his Will; but what could Ralph Bishop of Durham inceneth Duke Robert to claim the Crown.

Henry

Henry pretend, who had his Portion given him in money? Besides, it was an agreement with his Brother William, with consent of all the Lords of the Realm, that the survivor of them should succeed. With such like instigations, and withal assuring him, there were many in England would take his part; he easily perswaded the Duke to that, from which he could hardly have disswaded him. Who thereupon with a convenient Army puts to Sea, and lands at Portsmouth, while Henry waited for his coming about Hastings; and being landed there, much people resorted to him, that it was like to have been a bloody business: but by mediation of friends, working upon the flexible nature of Duke Robert, it was brought at last to this agreement, that King Henry should pay to Duke Robert, three thousand marks yearly, and Duke Robert should succeed him in the Kingdom, if he survived. And thus this cloud, that threatned so great a storm, brought with it rather Sun-shine, and fair weather; for now to his possession of the Kingdom, there was added a right, and he might now justifie his being a King, without any scandal or usurpation. After this another little cloud arose, but was soon dispersed; for Robert de Belesm, Earl of Shrewsbury, a rash young man of disposition, but more through discontentment, though discontented for nothing, but that having a great estate, he was not a King as well as some others, fortified the Town of Shrewsbury, and the Castle of Bridgenorth, and got many Welshmen to assist him: but the King coming with a mighty Army, so terrified the Welsh, that they abandoned the Earl, and left him a prey to the King in his person, and more in his estate; for the King seised his estate into his hands, but for his person he only banisht it the Realm. For as yet the shedding of blood, and putting to death, though for great Treasonable Practices, was not much in use: Policy of State was not yet grown to that height of severity. The like attempt, and upon the like occasion, was made by William Earl of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwal in England, Uncle to the King, only for denying him the Earldom of Kent, which because he could not obtain, he entred into Treasonable practices, by which he lost the Earldoms he had before. But these troubles were but as the labour of a woman that is safely delivered; painful for a time, but ending in joy: and indeed for the most part this King had the fortune to be a gainer by his losses.

1101. Duke Robert comes with an Army into England.

Is compounded with upon certain conditions.

Robert de Belesm Earl of Shrewsbury rebels.

An. Reg. 3. 1102. Banishment as yet the greatest punishment, though for Treason.

William of Cornwal rebels.

After this Duke Robert came in kindeness into England, to visit his Brother Henry; where he was so well pleased with his entertainment, that in requital thereof, and to do favour to the Queen, that was his God-daughter, he released to King Henry, the three thousand marks, which he was yearly to pay him. But returning into Normandy, and considering better what he had done, he so repented him, that he spared not to give out, that his Brother had directly cousened him. Which coming to King Henries ear, so incensed him, that he presently sent over a mighty Army, which forraged the Countrey, and won many Towns, and Cities, and soon after went over himself; where he so prevailed, that he left Duke Robert but only Roan in all Normandy to put his head in; and this done, returns into England. And now Duke Robert begins to be sensible of his own weakness, and therefore comes over into England to try the uttermost of his Brothers good nature. Himself had sent him a Tun of Wine to refresh him withal, when in a siege he was ready to perish for want of water: and it cannot be, but that gratefulness and natural affection, meeting together, must needs work something in the mind of a Brother. Thus resolved, he presents himself to the King, referring both his Dukedom and himself, and all differences and debates to his will and pleasure. But whether incensed with the scandalous words Duke Robert had given out of him, or whether aspiring to joyn Normandy to England, as his Father had done before, King Henry scarce vouchsafed to hear him speak, at least vouchsafed not to make him any answer, but in a sullen manner turned away, and so left him: which scornful usage put the Duke into such indignation, that he resolved to set his whole state to stake, and either to redeem his disgrace, or to forfeit his life. So returning into Normandy, he useth all his force in railing of Forces; but King Henry suspecting his intentions, and not using to give Insurrections time to ripen, came upon him so suddenly with a mighty Army, that he drew him to a Battel before he was half ready to fight. In which Battel King Henry received sundry stripe on the heads at the hands of one William Crispine, Count de Exreux; so as the blood burst out of his mouth: yet nothing abashed, he struck down divers of his enemies, and particularly the said Crispine who was there taken prisoner at the Kings feet. And now desire of revenge so animated the Duke, and the Duke his Souldiers, that never Battel was more fiercely fought; and the Normans seemed at first to have the better, till King Henry shewing himself in the Army, put such courage into his Souldiers, that they quickly made good the advantage they had in number, and King Henry obtained a compleat Victory, both in slaughter of men, (of whom there were slain above ten thousand) and in taking of Prisoners (to the number of four hundred:) amongst whom, besides other great ones, as the Earl of of Mortaigne, William Crispine, and William Ferrers, was Duke Robert himself, whom the King (having first taken order for all things, in his new state of Normandy) brought over with him into England, and committed him to the Castle of Cardyffe in Wales, where he remained a Prisoner till he died, used for a time with reasonable liberty for Recreation, till attempting to make an escape, it was thought fit to put out his eyes; which though it increased his misery, yet it shortned not his life, for he lived many years after, in all, from the time of his first imprisonment, eight and twenty. And thus this great Duke, who in his birth was the joy of Nature, in this life was the scorn of Fortune; and it is not unworthy the observing, that the English won Normandy, the very same day fortieth year, the Normans had won England. Such Revolutions of Fortune there are in Kingdoms, and so unstable is the state of all worldly greatness. He died; Anno Dom. 1134. and lies buried at Gloucester.

An. Reg. 4. 1104. Duke Robert remits his annuity.

1105. He giveth out that his Brother had cousened him.

1106 Duke Robert is invaded by King Henry.

1107. Is taken prisoner, brought into England, and hath his eyes put out.

ceſter. Matth. Weſtmon. writes that King Henry his Brother ſent him according to his cuſtom, a Robe of Scarlet; and putting it firſt on himſelf, perceived the Capouch to be ſomewhat ſtrait: whereupon he ſaid, Carry this Garment to my Brother, for his head is leſs then mine. The meſſenger delivering the Robe, Duke Robert demanded if any had worn it, and being told him the King had firſt aſſayed it, and what ſpeeches he had uſed, the Duke replied, I have now too long protracted a miſerable life, ſince my Brother is ſo injurious to me, that he ſends me his old cloaths to wear; and from that time would never eat any meat, nor receive any comfort.

And now is King Henry as great as ever his Father was; and as greatneſs draws envy, as much envied as ever his Father was; and as envy makes enemies, as much oppoſed as ever his Father was. For now Fulke Earl of Angiou, and Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, upon ſmall occaſions, and Lewis the Groſs, King of France, upon none but ſuch as envy ſuggeſted, ſeeking to place William, Son to Duke Robert, in his Right to Normandy, aſſaulted the Kings Dominions, perhaps to try whether greatneſs had not made him unwieldy; but King Henry, to ſhew that greatneſs had made him more active, went over into Normandy with a mighty Army, and at Nice encountred the French King, where a bloody Battel was fought, with exceeding valour on both ſides: but at laſt King Henry repelled the French King, and recovered Nice, and after many other Conflicts between them, with variety of Fortune, at laſt the King made peace with the Earl of Angiou, confirmed by a marriage of the Earls Daughter with his Son William; and upon this alſo the two Kings grew to a peace, in which William, Son to King Henry, being about ſeventeen years of age, was inveſted into the Dutchy of Normandy, doing homage for the ſame to the King of France. From whence it was afterward a cuſtom, that the King of England's eldeſt Son (as long as Normandy remained in their hands) was made alwayes Duke of Normandy. After this, Charles Earl of Flanders, being ſlain at Bruxels by a conſpiracy of his own people, and leaving no iſſue behinde him, Lewis King of France inveſted William, Son to Duke Robert, in the Earldom of Flanders, deſcended from Earl Baldwyn, whoſe Daughter Maude was Wife to King William the firſt, and Grandmother to this William. So as William now having gotten this ſtep of advancement, ſeeks to go on, and to recover Normandy, and was thereof by the aſſiſtance of the King of France in a fair poſſibility, when in a certain light conflict, receiving a wound in his hand, the thread of his fair poſſibility was upon a ſudden cut off; and of that light wound he ſhortly after died.

King Henry's Son William marries the Earl of Angiou's Daughter.

The King of England's eldeſt Son alwayes Duke of Normandy.

William Son to Duke Robert is wounded and dieth.

King Henry now in perfect peace abroad, was not without ſome little diſquietings at home, and marching through Powiſ-land in South Wales to repreſs ſome Inſurrections of the Welſh, he came to certain ſtraits, where his main Army could not paſs, in which place the King was ſmitten with an Arrow full upon the breaſt, whereat he ſwore by our Lord's death (his uſual Oath) that it was no Welſh arm had ſhot that Arrow; yet in his diſtreſs, for a thouſand head of Cattel, he had the paſſage left open, and came ſafely off. And theſe were his troubles of Arms, both at home and abroad, during all his reign.

King Henry in diſtreſs in Wales.

His Taxations and wayes for raiſing of Money.

TOwards the marriage of his Daughter Maude with the Emperour, he obtained at his firſt Parliament at Salisbury, three ſhillings upon every Hide of Land, throughout the Kingdom; which was afterwards drawn to a cuſtom, to receive aid from the Subjects, whenſoever the King gave his eldeſt Daughter in marriage. Beſides this he had no more in all his reign, but only one ſupply for his Wars in France, but he kept Biſhopricks, and Abbeys, void in his hands; and that of Canterbury, five years together. By an Act of Parliament, or rather by a Synod of Biſhops holden at London, he was authorized to puniſh marriage, and incontinency of Prieſts, which the Biſhops afterwards repented; for he ſuffered Prieſts to have Wives for Fines, or rather took Fines of them, whether they had Wives or no, becauſe they might have them if they would. Puniſhments which before his time were mutilation of Member, he made Pecuniary. And the Proviſions of his houſe, which were uſed to be paid in kinde, were in his time rated at certain prices, and received in money. By this Chapter and the next before, it appears there were in this Kings dayes, but few troubles at home, nor but few Taxations, whereof the one may be thought to be cauſe of the other; the firſt perhaps of the ſecond, but certainly the ſecond of the firſt.

The cuſtom of giving aid for marrying the Kings eldeſt daughter, when it firſt began.

Puniſhments made pecuniary.

His Rents paid now in money.

Laws firſt Inſtituted in his time.

HE firſt inſtituted the form of the High Court of Parliament; for before his time, only certain of the Nobility, and Prelates of the Realm were called to conſultation, about the moſt important Affairs of State: but he cauſed the Commons alſo to be aſſembled, by Knights and Burgeſſes of their own appointment, and made the Court to conſiſt of three parts, the Nobility, the Clergy, and the Common People, repreſenting the whole body of the Realm, and appointed them to ſit in ſeveral Chambers; the King, the Biſhops, and Lords of the Realm in one Chamber, and the Commons in another; to confer together by themſelves. Other Orders of that Court he Ordained, as they are in uſe at this day. The firſt Council of this ſort was held at Salisbury, on the 19. day of April, in the 16. year of his Reign. He forbad the wearing of long Hair, which at that time was frequent, after the manner of the French. He commanded Robbers upon the High-way, to be hanged without redemption; of whom a famous one at that time was one Dunne, and of him, the place where he moſt uſed, by reaſon of the great Woods thereabout, is to this day called Dunſtable, where the King built the Borough as now it ſtandeth.

The Court of Parliament firſt inſtituted by King Henry.

Long hair forbidden.

Dunſtable why ſo called.

Counterfeiters of money how punished.

ſtandeth. Counterfeiters of money he puniſhed with pulling out their eyes, or cutting off their privy members; a puniſhment both leſs then death, and greater.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

Contention between the King and the Pope about inveſtiture of Biſhops.

AT his firſt coming to the Crown, he forbore his claim to the inveſtitures of Biſhops; but after he had been King ſome time, he claimed that both to inveſt Biſhops, and to allow, or hinder appeals to Rome, belonged to him. In theſe Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was now returned into England, oppoſed him; affirming that both of them belonged to the Pope. The contention at laſt was brought to the Pope, to whom King Henry ſent William Warleſtwaſt, elect Biſhop of Exeter, who saying to the Pope, that his Maſter would not for the Crown of his Realm, loſe the Authority of inveſting his Prelates; the Pope ſtarted up, and anſwered, Neither will I loſe the diſpoſing of Spiritual Promotions in England, for the Kings head that wears the Crown; before God (ſaid he) I avow it. So the contention grew long and hot, and many meſſengers were ſent to and fro about it: The concluſion was (which proved no concluſion) that the King ſhould receive homage of the Biſhops elect; but ſhould not inveſt them by Staff and Ring: to which the King ſaid nothing for the preſent, but forbore not to do it ever the leſs. For five years after the death of Anſelm, Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter, was by the King made Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and notwithſtanding all former Decrees and Threatnings of the Pope, he received his Inveſtiture of the King. About this time a Council of Biſhops was held at London, at which the Temporal Lords were preſent; to the end that the Decree of the Council might be confirmed by both Orders. If any man deſire to know more of the paſſages between the King and Anſelm; and of the many great vertues of Anſelm, let him read Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who was as his Secretary, and hath written of purpoſe to ſet forth his praiſes. About this time a Canon was made againſt the marriage of Prieſts, to which purpoſe Johannes Cremenſis, a Prieſt Cardinal, by the Kings licenſe came into England, and held a ſolemn Synod at London; where inveighing ſharply againſt it, affirming it to be no better then profeſt Adultery, he was himſelf the night following taken in bed with a common Harlot. Even Anſelm himſelf, the moſt earneſt enforcer of ſingle life, dyed not, it ſeems, a Virgin; for elſe he would never in his writings make ſuch lamentation for the loſs thereof. A little before this, Anſelm being at Roan, Boemundus one of the chief Princes that had been at Jeruſalem, came thither; and amongſt other holy Reliques, gave unto him certain hairs of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary, which Anſelm held alwayes in great veneration: and * my ſelf having the cuſtody of them committed to me, haue found by experience great holineſs to be in them. About this time Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a Council at Weſtminſter, where divers Conſtitutions, were made; of which theſe were two, That Prieſts ſhould no more be ſuffered to have Wives: and that there ſhould be no more buying and ſelling of men in England, which was hitherto accuſtomed, as if they had been Kine or Oxen. Anſelm about this time dying at the age of 76. years, Rodolph ſucceeded in the See of Canterbury, but not till five years after the death of Anſelm; and Thomas dying, Thurſtane ſucceeded him in the Archbiſhoprick of York: between which two Prelates there aroſe great contention. Rodolph would not Conſecrate Thurſtane, unleſs he would profeſs obedience; Thurſtane was content to embrace his Benediction, but profeſs obedience he would not. In this contention the King take takes part with Rodolph, the Pope with Thurſtane; after many paſſages, in the buſineſs, upon the Popes threatning to Excommunicate the King, Thurſtane entred upon his Biſhoprick, and the King connived. In the tenth year of his reign, the Abbey of Ely was made a Biſhops See, and Cambridgeſhire was appointed for the Dioceſs thereof, which becauſe it belonged before to the Juriſdiction of Lincoln, the King gave the Biſhop of Lincoln, in recompenſe thereof, the manner of Spalding. This King alſo created a Biſhoprick at Carliſle, and endowed it with many honours. In his time, the Order of the Templars began, in the 27. year of his reign, the Grey-Fryers by the procurement of the King, came firſt into England, and had their firſt houſe builded at Canterbury. Alſo in this Kings time, the firſt Legat to ſupply the Popes room came into England, but as yet not admitted. I may here have leave to tell two ſtories of Church-men, for refreſhing of the Reader. Guymond the Kings Chaplain, obſerving that unworthy men for the moſt part were advanced to the beſt Dignities of the Church; as he celebrated Divine Service before him, and was to read theſe words out of St. James, [It rained not upon the Earth, III years, and VI months] he read it thus, It rained not upon the Earth, one, one, one years, and five one months. The King obſerved his reading, and afterwards blamed him for it; but Guymond anſwered, that he did it of purpoſe, for that ſuch Readers were ſooneſt preferred by his Majeſty. The King ſmiled, and in ſhort time after preferred him to the Government of St. Frideſwids in Oxford. The other is this, Thomas Archbiſhop of York falling ſick, his Phyſicians told him, that nothing would do him good, but to company with a woman; to whom he anſwered, that the Remedy was worſe then the Diſeaſe, and ſo dyed a Virgin, This King granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to William and his ſucceſſors, the cuſtody of Conſtable-ſhip of the Caſtle of Rocheſter for ever. In this Kings time the errours of Gilbertus Porretas, were condemned in a Council holden at Rheimes, by Pope Calixtus; alſo in his time Innocenitus and Anacletus contended for the Papacy, whereby a great Schiſm aroſe in the Church.

Works of Piety done by this King, or by others in his time.

THis King founded and erected the Priory of Dunſtable, the Abbey of Cirenceſter, the Abbey of Reading, the Abbey of Hide, without out the Walls of Wincheſter, the Abbey of Shirborn. He alſo new builded the Caſtle of Windſor, with a Colledge there: He made alſo the Navigable River between Torkeſey and Lincoln, a work of great charge, but greater uſe. His Wife Queen Maud, paſſing over the River of Lue, was ſomewhat endangered; whereupon ſhe cauſed two Stone-Bridges to be built, one at the head of the Town of Stratford, the other over another ſtream there, called Channel-Bridge, and paved the way between them with Gravel. She gave alſo certain Mannors, and a Mill called Wyggon Mill, for repairing the ſame Bridges, and Way. Theſe were the firſt Stone-Bridges that were made in England, and becauſe they were Arched over like a Bow, the Town of Stratford was afterward called Bow. This Queen alſo founded the Priory of the Holy Trinity, now called Chriſts Church, within the Eaſt Gate of London called Aldgate; and an Hoſpital of St. Giles in the Field, without the Weſt part of the City. In this Kings time Jordan Briſet Baron, founded the Houſe of St. John of Hieruſalem near to Smithfield, in London, and gave 14. Acres of ground, lying in the field next to Clerkenwel, to build thereupon a Houſe of Nuns, whein he with Myriel his Wife, were buried in the Chapter Houſe. Robert Fitſham, who came out of Normandy with the Conquerour, founded a new the Church of Tenkesbury, and was there buried. Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, founded the Cathedral Church there. The Priory and Hoſpital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, was founded by a Minſtrel of the Kings, named Reior, who became firſt Prior there. Before this time Smithfield was a Loyſtal of all ordure and filth, and the place where Felons were put to Execution. Hugh Lacy founded the Monaſtery of St. John at Lanthony near to Gloceſter. Juga Baynard, Lady of little Dunmow, founded the Church there, and gave to maintain it half a Hide of Land. This Lady Juga was late Wife to Baynard, that firſt built Baynards Caſtle in London. Eudo the Kings Sewer, founded the Monaſtery of St. John at Colcheſter, of black Canons, and thoſe were the firſt of that Order in England. Simon Earl of Northampton, and Maude his Wife, founded the Monaſtery of St. Andrew in Northampton. In the ſeventh year of this Kings Reign, the firſt Canons entred into the Church of our Lady in Southwark, called St. Mary Overy; founded by William Pountlarge Knight, and William Dancies, Normans. Robert the firſt Earl of Gloceſter, the Kings baſe Son, builded the Caſtles of Briſtow and Cardyffe, with the Priory of St. James in Briſtow; and his Son Earl William began the Abbey of Kenſham. Geoffery Clinton, Treaſurer and Chamberlain to the King, founded the Priory at Kenelworth, of Regular Canons. Henry Earl of Warwick, and Margaret his Wife, founded the Colledge of St. Mary in the Town of Warwick; and Roger de Belemond, his Son, and Ellyne his Wife, tranſlated the ſame Colledge into the Caſtle of Warwick, in the year 1123. Roger Biſhop of Salisbury built the Deviſes in Wiltſhire; the Caſtles alſo of Malmeſbury and Shirbourne, He repaired the Caſtle of Salisbury, and environed it with a Wall; he alſo built the ſtately Church of Salisbury; deſtined to a longer life then any of his other works. Ralph Biſhop of Durham began to build the Caſtle of Norham, upon the bank of the River Tweed. In the 32. year of this Kings Reign, the Priory of Norton in Cheſhire, was founded by one William the Son of Nythel, and the Abbey of Cumbermere, in the ſame ſhire. The Colledge of Secular Canons alſo in the Caſtle of Leiceſter, and the Abbey without the North gate of the ſame Town, called St. Mary de Prato. Alſo in the Kings Reign was founded the Monaſtery of Plimpton in Devonſhire, with the Cathedral Church of Exeter; the Priory of Merton, the Hoſpital of Kepar, the Priory of Oſeney near Oxford, by Robert de Oylye Knight: and the Hoſpital of St. Croſs near Wincheſter, by Henry Blois Biſhop there: alſo Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Merival; and indeed ſo many in his time were built, that one would think the Inhabitants of England to be all Carpenters and Maſons, that were able to finiſh ſo many great Buildings in ſo ſhort time as this Kings Reign.

Caſualties happening in his time:

IN this Kings days all the four Elements were guilty of doing much miſchief, but chiefly the Water: For King Henry returning into England after his conqueſt of Normandy, left his Son William with his Siſter Mary, Counteſs of Perche, Richard his Son by a Concubine, the Earl of Cheſter with his Wife Lucy, the Kings Neece by his Siſter Adela, and other Lords and Ladies, and paſſengers to the number of 180. to follow after him; who taking ſhipping (and the beſt Ship the King had) whether by careleſsneſs, or drunkenneſs of the Sailers were all drowned. The Prince indeed was got into the Ship-boat, and out of danger: but hearing the lamentable cries of his Siſter, compaſſion wrought ſo in him, that he turned about his Boat to take her in, which over-charged with the multitude, over-turned, and they all periſhed: none eſcaped but only one Sailor, who had been a Butcher, who by ſwimming all night upon the Maſt, came ſafe to Land. An accident not more grievous then exemplary; for amongſt other concluſions, from hence we may gather, that no ſtate is ſo uncertain as proſperity; no fall ſo ſudden as into adverſity: and that the Rule [He that ſtands, let him take heed he fall not] cannot alwayes be obſerved, becauſe a man happens ſometimes to fall before it is poſſible for him to take heed. Another great miſchief was in this Kings dayes wrought by the water; for by the breaking in of the Sea, a great part of Flanders was drowned: whereupon a great number of Flemmings being ſuitors to King Henry for ſome place to inhabit; he aſſigned them a part in Wales near the Sea, called Pembrokeſhire, where they have inhabited to this day: the King by this one action, working two good effects, both ſhewing compaſſion to diſtreſſed ſtrangers, and putting a bridle upon unquiet Natives. But the water had another way to do miſchief, as much by defect, as this was by exceſs; for upon the tenth of October, the River of Medway many miles together did ſo fail of water, that in the midſt of the Channel, the ſmalleſt Veſſels could not paſs: and the ſame day alſo in the Thames between the Tower of London, and the Bridge, men waded over on foot for the ſpace of two dayes: alſo at another time the River of Trent at Nottingham was dryed up a whole day. Now for the Earth, though naturally it be without motion, yet it moves ſometimes when it is to do miſchief, ſpecially being aſſiſted by the Air; as in this Kings dayes, it moved with ſo great a violence, that many buildings were ſhaken down, and Malmesbury ſaith, that the houſe wherein he ſate, was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time ſettled again in the proper place. Alſo in divers places it yielded forth a hideous noiſe, and caſt forth flames at certain rifts many dayes together, which neither by water, nor by any other means could be ſuppreſſed. But yet the active Element of Fire was buſieſt of all, for firſt Chicheſter with the principal Monaſtery was burnt down to the ground. From Weſt Cheap in London to Aldgate, a long tract of buildings was conſumed with Fire: Worceſter alſo and Rocheſter, even in the Kings preſence; then Wincheſter, Bathe, Gloceſter, Lincoln, Peterborough, and other places did alſo partake of this calamity, that there could be no charging the fire with any partiality: and to ſpeak of one foreign caſualty, becauſe a ſtrange one; in Lombardy this year was an Earthquake that continued forty dayes, and removed a Town from the place where it ſtood, a great way off. In the thirteenth year of this King, many prodigies were ſeen; a Pig was farrowed with a face like a Childe, a Chicken was hatched with four legs; and the Sun was ſo deeply eclipſed, that by the reaſon of the darkneſs, many ſtars did plainly appear. In this Kings time Gerard Archbiſhop of York, a man though learned, yet of many ill parts, ſleeping one day in his Garden after dinner, never waked again, but was there found dead.

Of his Wives and Children.

King Henry takes a wife out of a Nunnery.

AT his firſt coming to the Crown, he married Matild or Maude, Siſter to Edgar then King of Scotland, and Daughter to Malcolm by Margaret the Siſter of Edgar Atheling. This Matild, if ſhe were not a veyled Nun, ſhe was at leaſt brought up in a Nunnery, and thereby grown ſo averſe from Marriage, that when the motion was firſt made her to marry with King Henry, ſhe utterly refuſed it, as reſolved, though perhaps not vowed to die a Virgin; till at laſt importuned, and even forced by the Authority of her Brother, ſhe rather yielded then conſented; for ſhe did it with ſo ill a will, that it is ſaid, ſhe prayed, if ever ſhe had iſſue by the Marriage, that it might not proſper: and indeed it proſpered but untowardly, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. But though ſhe made this imprecation before ſhe knew what it was to be a Mother, yet when ſhe came to be a Mother, ſhe ſhewed her ſelf no leſs loving and tender of her Children, then loyal and obſequious to her Husband. And to make amends for this ſeeming impiety towards her Children, there is a ſtory related of her real piety towards the poor: for a Brother of hers coming one morning to viſit her in her Chamber, found her ſitting amongſt a company of Lazar people, waſhing and dreſſing their Ulcers and Sores: and then kiſſing them after ſhe had done; who wondering at it, and ſaying to her, How could ſhe think the King ſhould like to kiſs that mouth, which had kiſſed ſuch filthy Ulcerous people? ſhe anſwered, ſhe had a greater King to kiſs, who ſhe knew would like her never the worſe for it. By this Queen Matild, King Henry, according to ſome Writers, had four children; but as the received opinion is, only two, a Son named William, and a Daughter called Maude: of whom the Son at fourteen years old had fealty ſworn to him by the Nobility of Shrewsbury: at ſeventeen married the Daughter of Fulke Earl of Anjou: and at eighteen was unfortunately drowned, as hath been ſhewed. The Daughter lived to be an Empreſs, and afterwards a Dutcheſs; but could never come to be a Queen, though born to a Kingdom; as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. She ſurvived her ſecond Husband ſeventeen years, living a Widow, and at Roan in Normandy died, and was buried there in the Abbey of Bec, though there be a Tradition that ſhe was buried at Reading, in the Abbey there beſide her Father; but it appears to have been a cuſtom in thoſe dayes, for great perſonages to have their Monuments erected in divers places. After the death of this Queen Matild, who dyed at Weſtminſter, in the eighteenth year of his Reign, King Henry married Adeliza, the Daughter of Godfrey Duke of Lorain; who though ſhe were a beautiful and accompliſht Lady, yet had he never any iſſue by her. When ſhe was to be crowned, Ralph Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was to do the Office, came to King Henry, ſitting Crowned in his Chair of State, asking him who had ſet the Crown upon his head? the King anſwering, he had now forgotten, it was ſo long ſince. Well (ſaid the Archbiſhop) whoſoever did it, did me wrong to whom it belonged; and as long as you hold it thus, I will do no office at this Coronation. Then (ſaith the King) do what you think good: whereupon the Archbiſhop took the Crown off from the Kings head; and after at the peoples entreaty, ſet it on again, and then proceeded to Crown the Queen. By Concubines King Henry had many Children; it is ſaid ſeven Sons, and as many Daughters; of whom ſome periſhed in the great Shipwrack: of the reſt, two of the Sons, Reynold and Robert, were made Earls: Reynold of Briſtow, Robert of Gloceſter, and was a great aſſiſter of his ſiſter Maude, in her troubles with King Stephen, who after many acts of valour performed by him, in the twelfth year of King Stephen died, and was buried at Briſtow. The Daughters were all married to Princes and Noblemen of England and France, from whom are deſcended many worthy Families: particularly one of thoſe Daughters by Anne Corbet, was married to Fitz Herbert, Lord Chamberlain to the King: from which Fitz Herbert, our Family (abſit invidia verbo) is by Females deſcended, paſſing by the names of Cummin, Chenduit, Brimpton, Stokes, Foxcote, Dynebey, and ſo to Baker and Barret.

Of his Incontinency.

OF this enough hath been ſaid, in ſaying he had ſo many children baſely begotten: but if compariſon be made between his Brother Rufus and him, it may be ſaid, that howſoever they might be equal in looſeneſs of life; yet in that looſeneſs William Rufus was the baſer, and King Henry the more noble; for King Henry had certain ſelected Concubines, to whom he kept himſelf conſtant, whereas King William took only ſuch as he found conſtant to the pleaſure, but not to the perſons.

His courſe for eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion in Maud and her Iſſue.

HE married his only Daughter Maude, being but ſix years old, to the Emperour Henry the Fourth; but he leaving her a Widow without iſſue, he married her again to Geoffery Plantagenet, Son to Fulk, Duke of Anjou: not the greateſt Prince that was a Suitor for her, but the fitteſt Prince for King Henries turn; for Anjou is neighbouring upon Normandy, a great ſecurity to it, if a friend: and as great a danger, if an enemy. And having thus placed her in marriage, he now conſiders how to eſtabliſh her ſucceſſion in the Crown of England; whereupon he calls his Nobility together, and amongſt them David King of Scots, and cauſeth them to give their Oaths of Allegiance to her and her iſſue: and as thinking he could never make her ſucceſſion ſure enough, he cauſeth his Lords the year after again to take the like Oath, and after that a third time alſo; as conceiving that being doubled and trebled, it would make the tie of Allegiance the ſtronger: wherein nothing pleaſed him ſo much, as that Stephen Earl of Blois was the firſt man that took the Oath, becauſe he was known to be, at leaſt known he might be a pretender. But the King ſhould have conſidered that Nulla fides Regni, and therefore no Oath, though never ſo often iterated, ſufficient to warrant Loyalty in perſons ſo deeply intereſſed, as Stephen was: yet Providence could do no more, and the King was well ſatisfied with it; eſpecially when he ſaw his Daughter a Mother of two Sons: for this, though it gave him not aſſurance, yet it gave him aſſured hope to have the Crown perpetuated in his Poſterity.

King Henry cauſeth his Nobility to ſwear Allegiance to his Daughter Maude.

Of Ireland in his time.

THE King of England as yet had nothing to do with Ireland, the Countrey was governed by its own Kings; and the people of both Nations, though they were neighbours, yet divided by a rough Sea, but little acquainted: but now began entercourſe to be more frequented, and Mercherdach, chief King of the Iriſh, bore ſuch awful reſpect to King Henry, that he would do nothing but by his counſel, and with his good liking.

Mercherdach King of Ireland is much ru'ed by King Henry.

Whom King Henry uſed as his Vicegerent in his abſence.

HE was abſent ſometimes in Normandy, three or four years together; during which times, he committed commonly the care of the Realm to Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, a politick Prelate; and one as fit to be the ſecond in Government, as King Henry to be the firſt.

His Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was a perſon tall and ſtrong, broad breaſted, his limbs well knit, and fully furniſhed with fleſh, his face well faſhioned, his colour clear, his eyes large and fair, his eyebrows large and thick, his hair black and ſomewhat thin towards his forehead, his countenance pleaſant, ſpecially when he was diſpoſed to mirth. A private man, vilified, and thought to have but little in him; but come to the Crown, never any man ſhewed more excellent abilities, ſo true is the ſaying, Magiſtratus indicat virum: His natural affection in a direct line was ſtrong, in an oblique but weak; for no man ever loved Children more, nor a Brother leſs. Though a King in act, yet he alwayes acted not a King; but in Battels ſometimes the part of a common Souldier, though with more then common valour: as at a Battel in France, where he ſo far hazarded himſelf, that though he loſt not his life, yet he loſt his blood. He delighted much in Beaſts of Foreign Countries; as in Lions, Leopards, Camels, and ſuch like, for which he incloſed a place at Woodſtock of purpoſe to keep them.

Of his Death and Burial:

A Diſcontent of minde upon ſome differences between him and his Son-in-law, the Earl of Anjou, brought upon him a diſtemper, which encreaſed by eating againſt his Phyſicians advice, of a Lamprey, a meat alwayes pleaſing to him, but never agreeing with him, caſt him into a Feaver, which in few dayes put a period to his life: So certain it is, that one intemperate action is enough to overthrow the temperance of a whole life; as of this King Henry it is ſaid, that he ſeldom did eat but when he was hungry, never did drink but when he was a thirſt: yet this but once yielding to his ſenſual appetite, made him forfeit all benefit of his former abſtinence, though ſome write he took his death by a fall off his Horſe. He dyed upon the firſt of December at night, in the year 1135. when he had reigned five and thirty years, lived threeſcore and ſeven. His Bowels, Brains, and Eyes, were buried at Roan in Normandy where he dyed: the reſt of his body was ſtuffed with Salt, wrapped in Oxe Hides, and brought over into England, and with honourable Exequies buried in the Monaſtery of Reading, which himſelf had founded. The Phyſician that took out his Brains, with the intolerable ſtench ſhortly after died. In this King Henry ended the Line of the Normans, as touching the Heirs Males; and then came in the French by the title of Heirs General.

Men

Men of note in his time.

MEN of Learning in his time were many; firſt, Stephen Harding, a Benedictine Monk, who was founder to the Ciſtercian Order. Then Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who beſides his activeneſs in matters of State, writ many great and learned Books. Then Walter Calene, Archdeacon of Oxford, who delivered a Hiſtory written in the Britiſh tongue, from Brute to Cadwallader, to Geoffery of Monmouth to tranſlate; and added forty years of his own time. Alſo Florentius a Monk of Worceſter, who writ De rebus Geſtis Anglorum. Alſo Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who beſides other works, writ the Hiſtory of his own time, under the two Williams, and Henry the firſt.

KING STEPHEN.

Anno Dom. 1135.

AFter the deceaſe of King Henry, preſently ſteps upon the Stage of Royalty, Stephen Earl of Boleyne, Son to Stephen Earl of Blois, by Adela, Daughter of King William the Conqueror; and though there were two other before him, Maude the Empereſs, and Theobald his elder Brother, She in a ſubſtantial right, He in a colourable, yet taking advantage of being primus Occupans, the firſt Invader, (as being quickly here after King Henry's death, where the other ſtaid lingring about other affairs) he ſolicits all the Orders of the Realm, Biſhops, and Lords, and People, to receive him for their Soveraign: wherein beſides his own large promiſes, what great matters he would do for them all, he had alſo the aſſiſtance of Henry his Brother, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Popes Legate, and of Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury, his great friend, (two the moſt powerful men at that time in the State) who partly by force of Reaſons, but more indeed by Force then Reaſons, procure the State to accept him for their King, and ſo upon St. Stephen's day, in Anno 1135. he was Crowned at Weſtminſter, in the preſence of but three Biſhops, few of the Nobility, and not one Abbot, by William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with great ſolemnity. That which put a ſcruple in mens minds, and made them averſe at firſt, from conſenting to Stephen, was the Oath they had taken to receive King Henry's Daughter Maude to be their Queen, after his deceaſe; but the weight of this ſcruple was ſomething abated, when it was urged, that no Precedent could be ſhewed, that ever the Crown had been ſet upon a womans head. And Robert Biſhop of Saliſbury, brought another Reaſon, becauſe they had taken that Oath but upon Condition, that the King ſhould not marry her out of the Realm without their conſents; and the King having broken the condition, was juſt cauſe to nullifie their Obligation. To which was added that the Oath having been exacted by Authority, which is a kinde of forced, it might have the Plea of Per minas, and therefore void. And yet more then all theſe, Hugh Bigot, ſometime Steward to King Henry immediately after his deceaſe, came over into England, and took a voluntary Oath before divers Lords of the Land, that he was preſent a little before King Henry's death, when he adopted and choſe his Nephew Stephen to be his ſucceſſor, becauſe his Daughter Maude had grievouſly at that time diſpleaſed him. But howſoever their breach of Oath was thus palliated, it is certain that many of them, as well Biſhops as other Lords, came afterward to an evil end, at leaſt to many calamities before their end.

K. Stephen is Crowned.

Upon what reaſons the Oath before taken to Maude was ſlighted.

What courſe he took to eſtabliſh himſelf in the Kingdom.

IT is a true ſaying, Iis rebus optime ſervatur Imperium, quibus paratur; and this was Stephen's courſe, he got the Kingdom by promiſes, and he eſtabliſht it by performances; He pleaſed the People with eaſing them of Taxes and Impoſitions: He pleaſed the Clergy with forbearing to keep Biſhopricks and Abbeys vacant, and with exempting them from the Authority of the Temporal Magiſtrate; He pleaſed the Nobility with allowing them to build Caſtles upon their own Lands; he pleaſed the Gentry with giving them Liberty to hunt the Kings Deer in their own Woods; and beſides with advancing many of them in Honours: and for his brother Theobald, who being the elder, was before him in pretence to the Crown, he pleaſed him with a Grant to pay him two thouſand Marks a year; and then to ſtrengthen himſelf abroad no leſs then at home, he married his Son Euſtace to Conſtace a Daughter of Lewis King of France, which alliance alone might be thought a ſufficient ſecurity againſt all oppoſition. And yet one thing more, which eſtabliſht him more then theſe, at leaſt theſe the more for this, that he had ſeiſed upon King Henries treaſure, which amounted to one hundred thouſand pounds, beſides Plate and Jewels of ineſtimable value, which he ſpent not in vain riot, but imployed to his beſt advantage, both in procuring of Friends, and in levying of Souldiers out of Britany and Flanders.

He marries his Son Euſtace, to the King of France's Daughter. King Henry had left a hundred thouſand pounds in ready money.

Of his Troubles in his Reign.

THere may well be made a Chapter of the troubles of his Reign, ſeeing his whole Reign was in a manner but one continued trouble, at leaſt no longer intermiſſion, then as to give him breath againſt new encounters; till at laſt, when he grew towards his laſt, he rather left to be in trouble, then was at quiet, being forced to make his adverſary his Heir; and to leave his Crown to him that had ſought his life. For he was no ſooner ſet in his Chair of State, but he was preſently diſquieted and made to riſe, by the provocation of David King of Scots, who ſolicited by ſome Lords of England, but chiefly by Maude the Empereſs (whoſe right he had ſworn to defend) with a mighty Army entred Northumberland, took Carliſle and Newcaſtle, and was proceeding further, till King Stephen with a greater Army coming againſt him, yet rather bought his peace then won it; for to recover Newcaſtle out of his hands, he was fain to let King David hold Cumberland, and his Son Henry the Earldom of Huntington, as their Inheritance, for which, the Father would not for his, as being engaged, but the Son for his as being free, did Homage to King Stephen.

Upon a bruit of King Stephen's death, the Lord's poſſeſs themſelves of ſeveral Caſtles.

No ſooner was this trouble over, but he was preſently under another; for being faln ſomewhat ill at eaſe, it was bruited abroad that he was dead; which ſo diſtracted mens minds, that every one thought it wiſdome to ſhift for himſelf; and the great Lords made a contrary uſe of Caſtles, to that which King Stephen intended, when he gave liberty to build them, for the King intended them for his own defence againſt his Enemies, and they made uſe of them in their own defence againſt the King; for now Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk poſſeſſeth himſelf of Norwich, Baldwyn Rivers of Oxford, and Robert Queſquerius of other Caſtles. In theſe difficulties King Stephen, though he could not in perſon be in all places at once, yet in care he was; and there moſt, where was moſt danger, imploying others againſt the reſt. Againſt Baldwyn he went himſelf, whom, driven before out of Oxford, and gotten to the Iſle of Wight, the King followed and drove him alſo from thence, and at laſt into Exile.

Geoffry Duke of Anjou enters into Normandy: but is Compounded withall.

And now England afforded him once again to take a little breath, but then Normandy preſently begins with him afreſh: For now Geoffery Plantagenet Duke of Anjou, in right of Maude his Wife enters upon his Towns there, and ſeeks to get poſſeſſion of the Countrey; when K. Stephen paſſeth over with an Army, and arreſts his proceedings: and after ſome ſmall defeats of his Enemies, brings the matter at laſt to a pecuniary Compoſition: He to pay the Duke five thouſand Marks a year, and the Duke to relinquiſh his claim to Normandy. This done, he returns into England, where new commotions are attending him. For the Lords in his abſence, reſenting his breach of promiſes upon which they had admitted him to the Crown, make uſe every one of their Caſtles, and ſtand upon their Guard: The Lord Talbot held Hereford; Earl Robert Mauds Brother, Briſtow; William Lovell, the Caſtle of Cary; Paganell, the Caſtle of Ludlow; William Mounc, the Caſtle of Dunſter; Robert of Nichol now called Lincolne, the Caſtle of Warham; Euſtace the Son of John, the Caſtle of Melton; William the Son of Alan, the Caſtle of Shrewsbury; and withall David King of Scots, never regarding his former agreement, enters Northumberland with an Army, committing ſo great cruelty, in raviſhing of Maids, murthering of Infants, ſlaughtering of Prieſts, even at the Altar, that never any barbarous Nation committed greater. Thus the Kingdom from the one end to the other was in combuſtion; that if the King had had as many hands as Briareus, there would have been work enough for them all. Yet all this diſmay'd not the King, but as having learned this leſſon, Tu ne cede malis, ſed contrà audentior ito, grows the more in confidence, the leſs he was in aſſurance; and as if danger were the fuell of courage, the more erected in himſelf, the leſs he was upheld by others: and ſo, venturing what his Rebels at home would do in his abſence, he paſſeth himſelf in perſon againſt David King of Scots; as being moſt dangerous, and therefore the firſt to be repreſſed: but finding it hard to draw him to a battel, and impoſſible without a battel to do any good upon him, he leaves the care of that quarrel to Thurſtane Archbiſhop of York, and returns himſelf home, if it may be called home, where he ſcarce had a ſafe place to put his head in. But though many Lords were rebellious againſt him, yet ſome there were that ſtuck firmly to him, by whoſe aſſiſtance and his own induſtry, partly by inticements, partly by inforcements, he reduced moſt of them to obedience, and all of them to ſubmiſſion. When in the mean time Thurſtane Archbiſhop of York, and in his ſickneſs, Ralph Biſhop of Durham, aſſiſted with William Earl, of Aumerle, William Piperell of Nottingham, and Hubert de Lacy, fought a memorable battel againſt David King of Scots; wherein though King David himſelf, and his Son Henry performed wonderful Acts of Proweſs, yet the Engliſh got the Victory, with the ſlaughter of eleven thouſand Scots in the Fight, beſides many other ſlain in the flight; where of the Engliſh none of account were ſlain, but only a Brother of Hubert Lacyes, and ſome ſmall number of common Souldiers. This Victory infinitely pleaſed and comforted King Stephen, who not long after to make an abſolute ſuppreſſion of the Scots, paſſeth again with an Army, and inforceth King David to demand a Peace, delivering his Son Henry into King Stephen's hands for a pledge; and coming homeward, by the way he beſieged Ludlow one of Rebels neſts, where Prince Henry of Scotland had been taken Priſoner, if King Stephen in his own Perſon had not reſcued him,

He goes in perſon againſt the King of Scots.

The rebel Lords are reduced to obedience.

Eleven thouſand Scots ſlain, and but very few Engliſh.

King Stephen's good nature and valour.

After this, once again the King got a little breathing time, but it was but to prepare him for greater Encounters. For now Maude the Empereſs her ſelf in Perſon comes into play, in whom the Oath before taken was to have its tryal; for till now, though never ſo really intended, yet it could not actually be performed; for how could they receive her for Queen, who came not in place to be received? but now that ſhe came in Perſon, now was the time of tryal, how the Oath would work; and work it did indeed with many, and that ſtrongly. For Maude coming into England with Robert Earl of Gloceſter, her baſe Brother was moſt joyfully received at Arundel Caſtle, by William de Aubigny, who had marryed Adeliza the Queen Dowager, of the late King Henry, and had the ſaid Caſtle and County aſſigned for her Dower. King Stephen having intelligence hereof, cometh to Arundel Caſtle with an Army, and beſiegeth it; but either diverted by counſel, or elſe finding the Caſtle to be inexpugnable, he left the ſiege, and ſuffered the Empereſs to paſs to Briſtow. The King hearing, that Ranulph Earl of Cheſter, Son in Law to Robert Earl of Gloceſter, had poſſeſt himſelf of the City of Lincoln, thither he goeth with an Army, and beſiegeth it: thither alſo came the ſaid Earl of Cheſter, and Robert Earl of Gloceſter to raiſe the ſiege; at which time a moſt fierce battel was fought between them upon Candlemaſs-day; wherein as it is memorable what wonders of valour King Stephen performed, For when all men about him were either either fled or slain; yet he kept the field himself alone, no man daring to come near him, Horrentibus inimicis incomparabilem ictuum ejus immanitatem, saith Hoveden: yet overmastered at last by multitude, he was taken Prisoner, and brought to Maud the Empress; who sent him to be kept in safe custody in the Castle of Bristow, where he remained till All-hollantide after. And now the Empress having gotten King Stephen into her hands, she takes her journey to London; received in all places, as she went, peaceably, and at London joyfully. Where Queen Matild made humble sute unto her, for the liberty of King Stephen her Husband, and that he might but be allowed to live a private life; the Londoners also made suit to have the Laws of King Edward restored: but the Empress not only rejected both their suits, but returned them answers in harsh and insulting language: Indeed most unseasonably; and which gave a stop to the current of all her fortunes. For Queen Matild finding thereby how high the Empresses pulses did beat, sent presently to her Son Eustace, being then in Kent, to raise Forces with all speed, with whom the Londoners as much discontented as she, do afterwards joyn; and Henry Bishop of Winchester, as much discontented as either of them, fortifies his Castles at Waltham and Farnham, and especially Winchester, where he stayes himself, attending upon what Coast the next wind of the Empress would blow. Of all these things the Empress had intelligence, and thereupon secretly in the night she fled to Oxford, sending straight charge, to have King Stephen more narrowly watched, more hardly used, but (as some write) in Fetters, and fed with very bare and poor commons; withall she sends to her Uncle David King of Scots, to come unto her with all speed possible, who coming accordingly, they fall into consultation what is first to be done. The lot falls upon Winchester, as being their greatest Adversary, now, no less in appearance then in power: so Winchester they besiege which Queen Matild hearing, she with her Son Eustace and the Londoners, came presently to the succour, where a fierce battel being fought, the end was, that the party of Queen Matild prevailed, and the Empress to make her escape, was fain to be laid upon a Horse-back in manner of a dead Corps, and so conveyed to Gloucester; while Earl Robert her Brother disdaining to flie, was taken Prisoner, whom Queen Matild caused to be used the more hardly, in retaliation of the hard usage which the Empress before had shewed to King Stephen. Things standing in these terms, propositions were made by the Lords for pacification; but such were the high spirits of the Empress and her brother Robert, that no conditions would please them, unless the Empress might injoy the Crown. But after long debate, whether by agreement between themselves, or by connivence of the Keepers, both King Stephen and Earl Robert got to be at liberty. When the first thing King Stephen did, was to look out the Empress to requite the kindness she had shewed him in Prison; and hearing her to be at Oxford, he layes siege to the Town, and brings the Empress to such distress that she had no way to free her self but by flight; and no way to flie but with manifest danger: yet she effected it by this device. It was in the Winter season, when frost and snow covered all the ground over; she therefore clad her self, and her four servants that were with her in white clothes, which being of the colour of snow, made her pass the Watches without being discerned, and by this means came safe to her friends at Wallingford. Yet Malmesbury, who lived at that time, confesseth he could never learn certainly by what means she made her escape. But howsoever she escaped this present danger; yet it left such an impression of fear upon her, that she never had after any mind to appear upon this Stage of War: but left the prosecution of it to her Son Henry, who was now about sixteen years of age; and being forward of his age and able to bear Arms, was by his great Uncle David King of Scots Knighted, to make him more forward.

It was now the ninth year of King Stephen's Reign, when Ralph Earl of Chester, keeping possession of the City of Lincoln, was in night time assaulted by the King; but the Earl perceiving the King Forces to be but small, suddenly issued forth, and repelled the King with the slaughter of fourscore of his men. Yet two years after this, the Earl was reconciled to the King; and came of his own accord to wait upon him, when perfidiously he was detained by the King, and not set at liberty, till he had surrendred into the Kings hands all the Castles that were in his possession; which though it brought the King some present benefit, yet it wrought him a greater future loss; for it lost him his credit with all men, and no man afterward would trust his word.

Now was Duke Henry come to the age of nineteen years, and was in possession of the Dukedom of Anjou, by the death of his Father Geoffery Plantagenet: and not long after this, he married Eleanor, the Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Guyen, by whom he had that Dutchy, and also the Earldom of Poicton Normandy he had by his Mother; but more by the peoples inclination. So as being possest now of four great Principalities, this greatness of Estate adding to the greatness of his spirit, made him aspire to recover his right in England; and over he comes, bringing with him but small Forces, but promising himself great, from the people of this Kingdom. And many indeed resorted to him; with whom he fell presently, and besieged Marleborough: but by the Kings greater Forces was repelled.

Eustace King Stephens son dyeth.

After this, their Armies continued in the field still; rather watching advantages to be doing, then doing any thing; sometimes advancing when no Enemy was near, and then retiring when the Enemy came; til at last it was like come to a set Battel, when suddenly Eustace King Stephen's only Son unfortunately dyed: Unfortunately for himself, but fortunately for the Kingdom; for now King Stephen being left destitute of issue to succeed, was the more easily drawn to conditions of Peace, as likewise the Empress Maud, having lately lost her Brother Robert Earl of Gloucester, and Miles Earl of Hereford, (her two best Champions) was no less willing then he: which being furthered by the Lords of both sides, was at last concluded upon these conditions,

King Stephen and Prince Henry agree.

tions that Stephen ſhould hold the Kingdom of England during his life, and adopt Duke Henry as his Heir to ſucceed him. And this agreement thus made, and in a Parliament at Wincheſter confirmed, Duke Henry ever after accounted King Stephen no leſs then a Father; and King Stephen: Duke Henry no leſs then a Son, and well he might, if it be true which ſome write, that the Empereſs, when a Battel was to be fought between King Stephen and her Son, went privily to him, asking him how he could finde in his heart to fight againſt him that was his own Son? Could he forget the familiarity he had with her in her Widow-hood! But this was no matter for the Writers of that time to deliver. It touched too near the Intereſt of Princes then in being, and Princes muſt not be touched while they live; nor when they are dead neither, with uncertainties, as this could be no other: But howſoever it was, certain it is, that after this agreement between King Stephen, and Duke Henry, they continued in mutual love and concord, as long after as they lived.

Prince Henry thought by ſome to be King Stephens Son.

No mention what became of Maud at this time.

But what became of Maud the Empereſs at this time? For that ſhe was alive, and lived many years after this agreement between King Stephen and her Son Henry, all Writers agree; and to ſay that ſhe conſented to the agreement, without any proviſion made for her ſelf, is to make her too much a woman, a very weak veſſel: and to ſay there might be proviſion made, though it be not Recorded, is to make all Writers defective in great exceſs: And beſides, being ſo ſtirring a woman as ſhe was, that upon a ſudden ſhe ſhould be ſo quiet, as not to deſerve to have one word ſpoken of her in all the long time ſhe lived after, (being no leſs then twelve or thirteen years) is as ſtrange as the reſt. And if ſhe placed her contentment ſo wholly in her Son, that in regard of him ſhe regarded not her ſelf at all, it deſerves at leaſt the Encomium of ſuch a motherly love as is very unuſual, and not alwayes ſafe. Whatſoever it was, I muſt be fain to leave it as a Gordian knot, which no Writer helps me to unty. Matthew Paris makes her to live one and thirty years after the death of King Stephen; and makes this her Epitaph.

Of his Taxations and wayes for raiſing of Monies.

OF Taxations in his time, there is no mention made; for Taxations indeed, are properly drawn from a body of State when it is entire, whereas the ſtate all this Kings time was altogether in Factions. But what he wanted in Taxations, he ſupplied with Confiſcations, which by reaſon of the many revoltings of men of all ſorts, could not chuſe but fill his Coffers, every Rebellion being in nature of a purchaſe to him; for whatſoever became of the perſons, their Lands and Goods were ſure to be his. And if it happened at any time, that Confiſcations came in but ſlowly, he had then devices to haſten their pace; for upon light ſuggeſtions (not ſo much oftentimes as juſt ſuſpicions) he would call men into queſtion, and ſeiſe upon their Goods, as in the caſe particularly of Ralph Biſhop of Salisbury; and it may not be unpleaſing to hear from what beginning this Biſhop grew to ſuch a height of greatneſs, which was thus. In the time of King William Rufus he was a poor Prieſt, ſerving a Cure in a Village near to Caen in Normandy, when the Kings younger Brother Henry chanced to paſs that way, and to make ſome ſtay in the ſaid Village, who being deſirous to hear a Maſs, this Roger being Curate, was the man to ſay it; which he diſpatched with ſuch celerity, that the Souldiers (who commonly love not long Maſſes) commended him for it, telling their Lord, that there could not a fitter Prieſt be found for men of War then he. Whereupon Henry appointed him to follow him; and when he came to be King, preferred him to many great places, and at laſt to be Chancellour of England, and Biſhop of Salisbury. You have heard his riſing, now hear his fall. When King Stephen came to the Crown, he held this man in as great account as his Predeceſſour King Henry had done, and perhaps in greater; for being a great begger of Suits, the King would ſay of him, If this man wil never give over asking, neither ſhall I ever give over giving. Yet this great Prelate fell firſt through pride into envy, and then through envy into ruine. For King Stephen having given liberty to build Caſtles, this man did ſo far exceed all others in magnificence (for he builded the Caſtles of Salisbury, the Vyes, Sherburn, Malmesbury, and Newark, to which there were no Structures comparable in the Kingdom) that the Lords out of envy put it into the Kings head, that theſe Caſtles of his were built thus magnificently for entertainment of Maud the Empereſs. Which ſo poſſeſſed the King, or he would be thought to be ſo poſſeſſed, that taking this for a juſt cauſe, he ſeiſed them all into his hands, and forty thouſand Marks beſides, which he had in money; and not contented with this, he took the like courſe alſo with Alexander, Biſhop of Lincoln, only becauſe he was his Nephew, and of his near kindred. Another way he had for gaining of Money; for in the firſt year of his Reign, having given liberty to hunt in his Foreſts, he afterwards at Oxford cauſed many to be impleaded for that liberty: a trick which perhaps he learned from Hunting, firſt, to give men leave to do a thing, and then to fine them for having done it. But this is the priviledge of Princes, that their leave muſt be interpreted by him that gives it, and not by him that takes it.

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

HE gave licence to the City of Norwich to have Coroners and Bailiffs, before which time, they had only a Sergeant for the King to keep Courts; and after this, in the 37. year of King Henry the Third, they had licenſe to incloſe the Town with Ditches.

Norwich is allowed to have Coronets and Bailiffs.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

UPon the Kings ſeiſing into his hands, the Biſhop of Salisburies Caſtles, and Goods, complaint was made, and a Synod was called by the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Popes Legate, to right the Biſhop, where the King was cited to appear; who ſending to know the cauſe, anſwer was made, that it was to anſwer for his impriſoning of Biſhops, and depriving them of their Goods, which being a Chriſtian King he ought not to do. The King Replies by his Lawyer, Alvric de Vir, that he had not arreſted the Biſhop of Salisbury as a Biſhop, but as his Servant that was to make him accompt of his Imployment. To this the Biſhop anſwereth, that he was never Servant or Accomptant to the King. And many Allegations and Probations were urged to and fro, but in concluſion the Synod brake up, and nothing was done. The Biſhops durſt not Excommunicate the King without the Popes privity; ſo in the end they fell from Authority to ſubmiſſion: and in the Kings Chamber fell down at his feet, beſeeching him that he would pity the Church, and not ſuffer diſſenſion to be between the Kingdom and the Prieſthood. And this was no ſmall magnanimity in the King, that he was able to pull down the high ſtomachs of the Prelates in that time. In the eighth year of his Reign, a Synod was held in London by Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, where it was decreed, that whoſoever ſhould lay violent hands upon any Clergyman, ſhould not be abſolved but by the Pope himſelf; and from this time forward, Clergy men were exempt from the ſecular power. In the tenth year of his Reign, by the ſoliciting of Saint Bernard, many took upon them the Croſs, for a ſupply to the Holy Land, amongſt whom ſome Engliſh Lords alſo.

The King might not impriſon Biſhops.

Clergy men exempt from ſecular power.

Works of Piety by him, or by others in his time.

HE founded the Abbeys of Cogſhall in Eſſex, of Furneys in Lancaſhire; of Hurguilers and Feverſham in Kent; at Heigham in Kent, a houſe of black Nuns, alſo an houſe for Nuns at Carew. His Queen Matild builded the Hoſpital of St. Katharines by the Tower of London: A Knight called Sir William of Mount Fitchet, founded the Abbey of Stratford Langthorn, within four miles of London; William of Ypre founded Boxeley Abbey in Kent: Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Merival in Warwickshire, and in the ſame Shire, Robert Earl of Gloceſter, the Abbey of Non Eaten. Thurſtane Archbiſhop of York founded the Monaſtery of Fontes in Yorkshire. Alſo by others were founded the Abbeys of Tiltey, of Rieval, of Newborough and Beeland, of Garedon in Leceſterſhire, of Kirkstead in Yorkshire; and divers others in other places: ſo that more Abbeys were erected in his dayes, then had been within the ſpace of a hundred years before.

Of Caſualties happening in his time.

Newbrigenſis and alſo Huntingdon reporteth of one Raynerus, a wicked Miniſter of a more wicked Abbot, that croſſing the Seas with his Wife, he ſo with his iniquity overweighed the Ship, that in the midſt of the Stream, it was not able to ſtir; at which the Mariners aſtoniſhed, caſt lots, and the lot fell upon Raynerus: and leſt this ſhould be thought to happen by chance, they caſt the lots again and again, and ſtill the lot fell upon Raynerus: whereupon they put him out of the Ship, and preſently the Ship as eaſed of her burthen, ſailed away. Certainly a great Judgement of God, and a great Miracle; but yet recorded by one that is no fabulous Author. In this Kings time alſo, there appeared two Children, a Boy and a Girl, clad in Green, in a ſtuffe unknown, of a ſtrange language, and of a ſtrange diet; whereof the Boy being Baptized, dyed ſhortly after, but the Girl lived to be very old; and being asked from whence they were, ſhe anſwered, They were of the Land of St. Martyn, where there are Chriſtian Churches erected; but that no Sun did ever riſe unto them: but where that Land is, and how ſhe came hither, ſhe her ſelf knew not. This I the rather write, that we may know there are other parts of the World, then thoſe which to us are known: and this ſtory I ſhould not have believed, if it were not teſtified by ſo many, and ſo credible witneſſes as it is, In the fifteenth year of this King; the the River of Thames was ſo hard frozen, that Horſe and Cart paſſed over upon the Ice. In this Kings time lived Johannes de Temporibus, of whom it is recorded, that he lived three hundred ſixty and one years. He was one of Charlemain the Emperours Guard, and died in the Reign of Conradus the third, Anno Dom. 1139.

Newbrigenſis.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married by his Uncle King Henries means, Matild, Daughter and Heir of Euſtace, Earl of Boleyne, a Woman made for the proportion of both fortunes: In Adverſity not dejected, in Proſperity not elated. While her Husband was at liberty, a Woman; during his durance as it were a Man; acting his part for him when he was reſtrained from acting it himſelf; not looking that fortune ſhould fall into her lap, but induſtrious to procure it. By this Queen he had only one Son named Euſtace, a Prince more then of hope, for he lived to the bloſſoming of much valour, though it came not to maturity, as being cut off at eighteen years of age, ſome ſay by drowning, and ſome by a ſtranger accident. But ſtrange Relations muſt not alwayes be rejected, for though many of them be forged, yet ſome no doubt are true; and who knows but it may be of this kinde, which ſome Writers relate of this Prince, That being at the Abbey of Bury in Norfolk, and denied ſome money he required to have had, he preſently in a rage went forth, and ſet fire on the Corn Fields belonging to the Abbey; but afterwards ſitting down to dinner, at the firſt morſel of bread he put into his mouth, he fell into a fit of madneſs, and in that fit dyed? Certainly, the perſons of Princes are for more obſervation then ordinary people: and as they make Examples, ſo they are ſometimes made Examples. This Prince Euſtace was ſo beloved of his Father, that he had a purpoſe to have joyned him King with himſelf, but that the Pope upon the Biſhops complaining to him of it, diverted him from it. Howſoever being dead, he was buried in Feverſham Abbey, where his Mother

The ſtrange death of Euſtace.

Mother was buried a little before. Other legitimate iſſue King Stephen had none, but by a Concubine he had a Son named William, whom he made Earl of Norfolk; which honour was confirmed upon him, by a ſpecial Article, in the agreement made between King Stephen and Duke Henry; only a French Chronicle ſpeaks of another Son of his, named Gervaſe, made Abbot of Weſtminſter; and that he died in the year 1160. and was there buried.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, of great ſtrength, and of an excellent good complexion. Concerning the qualities of his minde, there was apparent in him a juſt mixture of Valour and Prudence; for if he had not had both, he could never have held out with ſuch weak friends as he did, againſt ſuch potent adverſaries as he had. And ſpecially it muſt be confeſt, he was of an excellent temper for a Souldier, ſeeing he never kill'd any enemy in cold blood, as Anthony did Cicero; nor any friend in hot blood, as Alexander did Clitus. What he would have been in Peace, we are left to judge by only a pattern, the ſhort time between his agreement with Duke Henry and his death. Which ſeeing he ſpent in travelling to all parts of the Realm, and ſeeking to ſtitch up the breaches which the violence of War had made, we may well think that if his life had been continued, he would have given as good proofs of his Juſtice in Peace, as he had done of his Valour in War. For of his extraordinary good nature we have a ſufficient example in one action of his, which was this: Duke Henry being on a time, in ſome ſtreights for money, ſent to his Mother Maud the Empereſs, deſiriug her to furniſh him, but ſhe anſwered that ſhe was in as great ſtraits her ſelf, and therefore could not do it: then he ſent to his Uncle Earl Robert to furniſh him, and he anſwered he had little enough to ſerve his own turn, and therefore could not do it: at laſt he ſent to King Stephen, and he though an Adverſary, and ſtanding in terms of oppoſition, yet ſent preſently, and ſupplied him with it. He was withal a great oppugner of ſuperſtition, which made him on a time to ride into Lincoln with his Crown upon his head, only to break the people of a ſuperſtitious opinion they held, that no King could enter into that City in ſuch manner, but that ſome great diſaſter would fall upon him. One ſpecial Virtue may be noted in him, that he was not noted for any ſpecial Vice, whereof if there had been any in him, Writers certainly would not have been ſilent.

A good temper for a Souldier.

King Stephen's good nature.

A ſuperſtitious opinion held of Lincoln.

Of his Death and Burial.

AS a Fiſh cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Deſtiny of this King, to live out of trouble. As ſoon as he came to enjoy quietneſs, he left to enjoy life. No time left him between his agreement with Duke Henry and his Death, but only ſo much as might reaſonably ſerve him to take his laſt leave of all his Friends: For it was but from January to October; and the laſt friend he took leave of was Theodorick, Earl of Flanders, whom he met at Dover, and as ſoon as he had diſmiſſed him, he was ſuddenly taken with the Iliack Paſſion and with an old Diſeaſe of the Emrods; and died in the Monaſtery there, the five and twentieth of October, in the year 1154. when he had reigned almoſt nineteen years, lived nine and forty, and was buried in the Abbey of Feverſham, which he had founded. 1154.

Men of Note in his time.

OF Clergy-men there was Thurſtane, Archbiſhop of York, and Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter the Kings Brother; alſo William another Archbiſhop of York, whom we may finde in the Calendar of Saints, as likewiſe St. Bernard, who lived in this time, though not of this Countrey. And if we may reckon ſtrangers, there lived at this time Peter Lombard, Maſter of the Sentences; Peter Comeſtor, writer of the Eccleſiaſtical Story; and Gratian, Compiler of the Canon Law, all three Brothers, and all three Baſtards: alſo Avicen, Averroes, Meſue, and Rabbi Solomon were in this time famous. Of Military men, there was Ranulph Earl of Cheſter; Reynold Earl of Cornwal, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk; but eſpecially Robert Earl of Gloceſter, the Kings baſe Son, whoſe praiſes, if any deſire to hear founded out to the full, let him read William of Malmesbury, who writ the Hiſtory of theſe times, of purpoſe to be his Trumpet. Of the Writers of our Nation, there was this William of Malmesbury, Henry Huntington, Simeon Dunelmenſis, William Revellenſis; and Geoffry of Monmouth, Biſhop of St. Aſaph in Wales. Alſo Hugo Carthuſianus, a Burgundian, but made Biſhop of Lincoln here in England.

The LIFE and REIGN of KING HENRY THE SECOND.

1155. King Henry is Crowned.

KING Stephen being dead, Henry Duke of Anjou, by his Father Geoffry Plantagenet, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of England, by agreement, whom he preceded by right, as being Son and Heir of Maud, ſole Daughter and Heir of King Henry the firſt; and was Crowned at Weſtminſter, by Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, on the ſeventeenth of December, in the year 1155. and was now a greater Prince then any of his Anceſtors had been before. And indeed the Kingdom of England, the Dukedom of Normandy, and the Dukedom of Anjou in his own right, and in the right of his Wife Queen Eleanor, the Dutchy of Guyen, and the Earldom of Poictou, being all united in his perſon, made him a Dominion of a larger extent then any Chriſtian King had at that time.

A greater Prince then any of his Anceſtors.

Born at Mentz in Normandy.

He was born at Mentz in Normandy, in the year 1132. a great joy to his Father Geoffry, Duke of Anjou, a greater to his Mother Maud the Empereſs; but ſo great to his Grandfather King Henry the firſt, that it ſeemed to make amends for his Son William, whom unfortunately he had loſt before by Shipwrack. The years of his childehood were ſpent at home under the care of his Parents. At nine years old or thereabouts, he was brought by his Uncle Robert Earl of Gloceſter into England, and placed at Briſtow, where under the tuition of one Matthew his Schoolmaſter, to inſtruct him in learning, he remained four years; after which time he was ſent into Scotland, to his great Uncle David King of Scots, with whom he remained about two years, initiated by him in the principles of State, but chiefly of his own Eſtate. And being now about fifteen years of age, was by him Knighted; and though ſcarce ripe for Arms, yet as a fruit gathered before its time, was mellowed under the Diſcipline of his Uncle Robert, one of the beſt Souldiers of that time. And now the Duke his Father not able any longer to endure his abſence, ſent with great inſtance to have him ſent over to him; for ſatisfying of whoſe longing, Earl Robert provided him of paſſage, and conducted him himſelf to Sea ſide, where he took his laſt farewel of him. Being come into Anjou, his Father perhaps overjoyed with his preſence, not long after died, leaving him in preſent poſſeſſion of that Dukedom, being now about nineteen years of age: when ſhortly after he married Eleanor the late Wife of Lewis King of France, but now divorced. A year or two after, he came again into England, where after ſome velitations with King Stephen they were at laſt reconciled, and his ſucceſſion to the Crown of England, ratified by Act of Parliament. Not long after he went again into France, and preſently fell to beſiege a Caſtle which was detained from him by the French King. In the time of which ſiege, news was brought him of King Stephen's death, which one would have thought ſhould have made him haſten his Journey into England; yet he reſolved not to ſtir till he had won the Caſtle. Which reſolution of his being known to the Defendants, they ſurrendred the Caſtle; but yet no ſooner, but that it was ſix weeks after before he came into England, when he was now about the age of three and twenty years.

His firſt Acts after he came to the Crown.

HE began his Reign as Solomon would have begun it, if he had been in his place. For firſt he made choice of wiſe and diſcreet men to be his Counſellours; then he baniſhed out of the Realm all ſtrangers, and eſpecially Flemmings, with whom the Kingdom ſwarmed: as of whom King Stephen had made uſe in his Wars, amongſt whom was William of Ypres, lately before made Earl of Kent. Caſtles which by King Stephen's allowance had been built, he cauſed to be demoliſhed, (of which there were ſaid to be eleven hundred and fifteen) as being rather nurſeries of Rebellion to the Subject, then of any ſafety to the Prince. He appointed the moſt able men of that profeſſion, to reform abuſes of the Laws, which diſorder of the Wars had brought in. He baniſhed many Lords, who againſt their Oath had aſſiſted King Stephen againſt him, as thinking that men once perjured would never be faithful; and to the end he might be the leſs preſſing upon the people with Taxations, he reſumed all ſuch Lands belonging to the Crown, which had any way been aliened or uſurped, as thinking it better to diſpleaſe a few then many; and many other things he did, which in a disjoynted State were no leſs profitable and expedient, then requiſite and neceſſary.

His troubles during his Reign.

HE had no Competitors, nor Pretenders with him for the Crown; and therefore his troubles at firſt were not in Capite, ſtrook not at the root, as King Stephen's did: but were only ſome certain niblings at inferiour parts, till at laſt he brought them himſelf into his own bowels. For what was the trouble in his firſt year first year with the Welsh; but as an exercise rather to keep him in motion, then that it needed to disquiet his rest? For though they were mutinous for a time, while they looked upon their own Bucklers, their Woods and Mountainous passages; yet as soon as King Henry did but shew his Sword amongst them, they were soon reduced to obedience for the present, and to a greater awfulness for the future. It is true Henry Earl of Essex that bore the Kings Standard, was so assaulted by the Welsh, that he let the Standard fall to the ground, which encouraged the Welsh, and put the English in some fear, as supposing the King had been slain; but this was soon frustrated to the Welsh, and punished afterward in the Earl, by condemning him to be shorn a Monk, and put into the Abbey of Reading, and had his lands seised into the Kings hand. And what was his trouble with Malcolme King of Scots, but a work of his own beginning? for if he would have suffered him to enjoy that which was justly his own, Cumberland and Huntingtonshire, by the grant of King Stephen, and Northumberland, by the gift of his Mother Maud the Empereſs, he might have stayed quietly at home, and needed not at all to have stirred his foot: but he could not endure there should be such parings off from the body of his Kingdom; and therefore went with an Army into the North, where he won not, but took Northumberland from him, with the City of Carliſle, and the Castles of Newcastle and Bamberg: and meerly out of gratefulness, in remembrance of the many curtesies done to him before, by David King of Scots, he left him the County of Huntington; but yet his with condition to owe fealty, and to do homage to him for it. And what was his trouble with his Brother Geoffry, but a Bird of his own hatchiug. For his Father Geoffry Duke of Anjou, had three Sons, Henry, Geoffry and William; and dying, he left his Dukedom of Anjou to his eldest son Henry, but to hold no longer then till he should come to be King of England, and then to deliver it up to his second Son Geoffry. And he made his Lords to swear, not to suffer his body to be buried, until his Son Henry had taken his Oath to do it. Which Oath Henry afterward, in reference to his Fathers body, did take: but as he took it unwillingly, so he willingly brake it, and sent presently to Adrian the then Pope, for a dispensation of his Oath. Which granted, he enters Anjou with an Army, and takes from his Brother Geoffry, being little able to make resistance, not only the Dukedom of Anjou, but some other Cuies also, which his Father had absolutely given him for his maintenance: yet out of brotherly kindness was content to allow him a Pension of a thousand pounds a year. Which brotherly kindness was so unkindly taken by his Brother Geoffry, that it brake his heart; and within a short time after he dyed.

His troubles with the Welsh soon ended.

King Henries unkindness to his brother Geoffry.

And thus these troubles begun by Henry himself, were soon ended; but now a trouble is comming on, begun by Lewis King of France, and this is like to stick longer by him. For King Lewis not having yet digested King Henries marriage with his divorced Wife Eleanor, seeks all opportunities to express his spleen, by doing him displeasure; and a fit opportunity was now offered. For there fell out a difference between Raymond Earl of St. Giles, and Henry King of England, about the Earldom of Tholouse, which Raymond possest, and Henry claimed: in this difference, King Lewis takes part with Raymond, as pretending to be the juster side. Hereupon are great Forces provided on both sides, and it was like to have come to a dangerous battel: but that by mediation of friends, a peace was made; and to make the Peace the firmer, a marriage was concluded between Henry, King Henries eldest Son, scarce yet seven years of age, and Margaret, Daughter of King Lewis not past three, who was delivered to King Henry to bring up till fit years for consummation. This was then thought a strong link to hold them in friendship, but it proved afterward a cause to make a greater breach; and indeed when a Son is once matched into a Family, the Father must never look from thence afterward to have a good wish; seeing the Daughter thus matched can have no advancement, but by the advancement of her Husband, and he none, at least, none so well, as by the ruine of his Father: yet this brake not out till some years after. It was now about the sixteenth year of King Henries Reign and his Son Henry grown to be seventeen years of age, when it came into the Kings minde to have his Son Henry crowned King, and Reign with himself in his own time; partly out of indulgence to his Son, but chiefly, as having found by his own experience, that Oaths for succession are commonly eluded: but Oaths for present Allegiance, as being Verba de præsenti, can have no evasion. And pleasing himself with this conceit, he acquaints his Lords with his purpose, and causeth his Son Henry to be crowned King by the hands of Roger Archbishop of York; and all the Lords to swear Allegiance to him. At the Feast of which solemnity King Henry to honour his Son, would needs carry up the first dish to his Table; whereupon the Archbishop Roger standing by, and saying merrily to the new King, What an honour is this to you, to have such a waiter at your Table? Why (saith he) what great matter is it for him that was but the Son of a Duke, to do service to me, that am the Son of a King and Queen? Which the old King hearing, began to repent him now it was too late, of that he had done For indeed the honour which by Gods commandement, children are to do their Parents, is by such making them their equals, in a manner abolished; at least it gives them stomachs to take more upon them then is fit. But King Henry passed it over, and meant to set the best side outward. Notwithstanding this ill success of King Henry, yet King Lewis of France soon after, did the like to his Son Philip, and caused him to be crowned King in his own life time, Paris, Anno 1179.

King Henry causeth his son Henry to be crowned King with himself.

The sons insolent speech against his Father.

And now King Lewis took displeasure that his Daughter was not crowned as well as her Husband; and therefore to satisfie him in that point, King Henry sendeth his Son Henry and his Wife Margaret into England, and causeth them both to be crowned by Walter Archbishop of Roan: and shortly after, the young King Henry and his his Wife go back to King Lewis her Father, and by him with great joy, and variety of sports were entertained. In the time of their being there, King Lewis partly out his old spleen to King Henry, and partly to make his Son-in-law more absolute, falls oftentimes into conference with him; and finding his hot spirit to be fit tinder for such fire, tells him, it was a shame he should suffer himself to be made a stale; have the title of a King, and not the authority: and that as long as he stood in such terms, that which seemed an honour was indeed a disgrace. With which words of King Lewis, the young King Henry was set a float, and from that time forward, stuck not openly to oppose his Father. Whereof his Father having intelligence, sent messengers to King Lewis, desiring him from the King their Master, to be a means to bring his Son to more moderation. But King Lewis hearing the Embassadours name their Master King, with an angry countenance said unto them; What mean you by this to call him King, who hath passed his Kingdom over to his Son? and with this answer sent them away. To this evil, another worse was added: That Queen Eleanor his Wife enraged with jealousie of her Husbands Concubines, both incenseth her Son Henry, & perswadeth also two other of her Sons, Richard and Geoffry, to joyn against their Father; telling them, it would be better for them that their Brother should prevail, who could not chuse but allow them better maintenance, then their Father did. With these perswasions they pass over into Normandy, and joyn with their Brother Henry, who emboldened by their assistance, grows now more insolent then he was before; that when messengers were sent to him from his Father, requiring him to lay down his Arms, and to come lovingly to him, he proudly made answer, that his Father must not look he would lay down his Arms, unless himself first would lay down his authority, and resign the Kingdom. And now Lewis King of France, calling together the great Lords of his Kingdom, and with them William King of Scots, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, Hugh Bigot, and others of his Sons party, they all take their Oaths to assist the young King Henry with all their power, and thereupon all in one day, the French invade Normandy, Aquitain and Britain; the King of Scots, Northumberland; and King Lewis the City of Vernoil, which he brought to that distress, that it was agreed by the Inhabitants, if it were not succoured within three daies, then to surrender it. King Henry hearing of this agreement, promiseth to succour them by that day. But here King Lewis useth a trick, gets that by fraud, which he could not do by force; for he sends to King Henry, that if he were willing to have a peace with his Sons, he should meet him at a place appointed, at such a time, and he doubted not to effect it. King Henry glad of such an offer, and with that gladness perhaps blinded, and not suspecting any deceit, promiseth to meet; and coming to the place at the day, which was the day he should have succoured Vernoil, he stayed there all day looking for King Lewis coming, who in stead of coming, sent word to Vernoil, that King Henry was defeated; and therefore their hope of succour was in vain. Whereupon the Citizens thinking it to be so indeed, because he came not according to his promise, surrendred the Town; which King Lewis finding himself unable to hold, set it on fire, and so departed. But King Henry when he perceived the fraud, followed him with his Army, and took a bloody revenge of his fraud, with the slaughter of many of his men. At the same time also King Henries Forces encountred Hugh Earl of Chester, and Robert Fulger, who had taken Dole in Britain, took them Prisoners, and brought them to King Henry. And about the same time likewise in England Robert Earl of Leicester thinking to surprise Reynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard Lacy, King Henry's Generals, at unawares, was himself by them overthrown, and the Town of Leicester taken; which only the site of the place defended from being battered to the ground. Robert Earl of Leicester being thus defeated, passeth over into France, and being supplied by King Lewis with greater forces then before, is together with Hugh Bigot sent back into England, to draw the countrey to Henry the Sons party, who at first assault take Norwich; and then sitting down before Bury, they are in a great battel, by Richard Lacy, and other of King Henry's Captains, overthrown with the slaughter of ten thousand men, and as many taken prisoners; amongst whom Earl Robert himself. Yet were not Roger Mowbray, and Hugh Bigot so daunted with this overthrow, but that together with David the King of Scots Brother, they gather new Forces, and invade Northumberland and Yorkshire, when Robert Scoccee, Ralph Granula, William Vesci, and Barnard Bayliol (of whom Baynards Castle in London first took the name) Knights of those parts assembled together, and fighting a great battel with them, overthrew them, and took the King of Scots prisoner, with many others. Yet is not Hugh Bigot daunted with this neither, but gathers new Forces and takes Norwich; and Robert Ferris, Nottingham. The news whereof, when King Henry the Son heard, he recovered new spirits, and obtaining new assistance from King Lewis, prepares himself afresh for War: which King Henry the Father hearing, returns speedily into England; and to appease St. Thomas Becket's Ghost, goes to visit his Tombe, and there askes him forgiveness. This done, he goes into Suffolk, and at Framingham Castle, which belonged to Hugh Bigot, staies with his Army, when suddenly moved, by what instinct no man knows, (unless the appeasing of Saint Thomas's Ghost did work it,) both Hugh Bigot delivers up his Castle into King Henry's hands, and likewise Robert Mowbray, Robert Ferris, and many others of that party, come voluntarily in, and submit themselves to the Kings mercy. Hereupon King Henry returns to London, about which time he comitted his Wife Queen Eleanor to prison, for her practices against him. In the mean time, King Lewis understanding that Normandy was but weakly guarded, together with his Son the young King Henry, and Philip Earl of Flanders, he besiegeth Roan, which the Kings Forces valiantly defended, till he came himself in person; and thereupon King Lewis despairing of any good to be done, sends messengers to King Henry

Henry for a truce, and appointed a day to meet at Gysors, where he doubted not to make a reconcilement between his Sons and him; K. Henry agreed willingly, but at the meeting nothing was done. It seems it was but one of K. Lewis his old tricks to come fairly off.

After this truce made with King Lewis, King Henry hearing that his Son Richard had in the mean time posseſt himself of a great part of the Province of Poicton, goes thither with an Army, where Richard at last, after some hesitation, as doubting his Forces, submits himself to his Father, and asks his pardon; which his Father as freely grants, as if he had never committed any fault. And thereupon K. Henry imploies him to King Lewis, and his brother Henry, to perswade them to peace: who wearied now with the wars, were easily drawn, and so reconciliation on all parts is made. And to confirm the reconciliation between the two Kings, Henry and Lewis, his Daughter Adela is affianced to King Henry's Son Richard, as Earl of Aquitain; and because the Lady was but young, she was committed to the care of King Henry, till she should be fit for marriage. Upon this King Henry sets Robert Earl of Leiceſter, and Hugh Earl of Cheſter, giving hostages and oath for their Allegiance, at liberty; and William also King of Scots paying a certain mulct, for which he delivered in pawn the strong Castles of Berwick, Roxborough, and Sterling to King Henry, and was fined to lose the County of Huntington, and never to receive any Rebels into his protection. These things done, the King with his son returns into England, where with all joyfulness they were received.

A reconciliation is made on all parts.

1179. It was now the year 1179. when King Lewis began again to grow discontented with King Henry; because his daughter was not yet married to his Son Richard as was agreed: but King Henry making him promise to have them married within a few daies, gave him satisfaction; though indeed he meant nothing less, for it was thought he kept her for himself, as with whom he had before that time, had unlawful familiarity.

With whom King Henry is thought to have unlawful familiarity.

An. Reg. 30 1184. The year 1184. was memorable for nothing, or for nothing so much as the death of the young King Henry, who died then, being of the age of one and twenty years: whose Widow Margaret returning into France, was afterward married to Bela King of Hungary. Now King Henry's Son Richard, no longer enduring to have his marriage delayed, which his Father often promised, but would never suffer to be performed, falls into his old fit of discontentment. Wherein though he cannot perhaps be justified, ye the may justly be excused, for to be kept from a wife at that time of his age, for which a Wife was most proper; and especially having been affianced so long before, which could not chuse but make his appetite the sharper; must needs be, if not a just cause, at least a strong provocation to make him do as he did. Howsoever from this fit of discontentment, he falls into a relapse of a Rebellion, and infecting with it his Brother John, and a great part of his Fathers Adherents, they all take part with Philip, (now after the decease of Lewis) King of France, who willing to make use of their assistance, before the stream of filial awfulness should return into the natural Channel, takes them along with him, and besiegeth the City of Mentz, in which King Henry at that time was himself in person. Who apprehending the danger, and then resenting the mischief of falling into his enemies hands, gets him secretly out of the City, leaving it to defend it self, till he should return with greater forces; for hearing afterward that the Town was taken, he fell into so great a distraction of minde, that it made him break out into these blasphemous words; I shall never hereafter love God any more, that hath suffered a City so dear unto me, to be taken from me: but he quickly recollected himself, and repented him that he had spoken those words. Indeed Mentz was the City in which he was born, That to have this City taken from him, was as much as to have his birthright taken from him. And to say the truth, after he had lost this City, he scarce seemed to be alive; not only because she shortly after died: but because the state of Majesty which had all his life accompanied him, after this forsook him, for now he was fain to beg peace of his enemies, who often before had begged it of him; now he was glad to yield to conditions, which no force before could have wrested from him. It is memorable, and worth observing, that when these two Kings had meeting between Turwyn and Arras, for reconcilement of differences, there suddenly happened a Thunderbolt to light just between them, with so terrible a crack, that it forced them for that time, to break off their conference; and afterward at another meeting, the like accident of thunder happened again, which so amazed King Henry, that he had fallen off his horse, if he had not been supported by those about him. Which could be nothing but drops let fall of the Divine anger, and manifest presages of his future disasters. And thus this great Princes troubles, which began in little ones, and were continued in great ones, ended at last in so great a trouble, that it ended his life, and left him an example of desolation, notwithstanding all his greatness; forsaken of his friends, forsakeen of his Wife, forsaken of his children; and (if he were not himself, when he blasphemed for the loss of Ments) forsaken of himself; which might be exemplar in this King, if it were not the common Epilogue of all greatness.

ROBERT Fitz-Stephen was the first of all English men after the conquest that entred Ireland, the first day of May, in the year 1170. with 390 men: and there took Wexford, in the behalf of Dernutius, Son of Mercherdach, called Mac Murg, King of Leymster. In September following, Richard Earl of Chepstow, surnamed Strong-bow, sayled into Ireland with twelve hundred men, where he took Waterford and Dublin; and married Eve the Daughter of Dernutius, as he was promised. From these beginnings, King Henry being then at rest from all Hostile Arms, both at home and abroad, takes into his consideration the Kingdom of Ireland, as a Kingdom which oftentimes afforded assistance to the French; and therefore purposing with himself

Where entring into conſultation what courſe was fitteſt to be taken in the enterpriſe, ſuddenly of their own accord the Princes of the Countrey came in, and ſubmitted themſelves unto him, only Rodorick King of Connacth ſtood out; who being the greateſt, thought to make himſelf the only King of that Nation, but King Henry forbearing him for the preſent, who kept himſelf in the faſtneſs of Boggs and Woods, and was not to be followed in the winter ſeaſon, takes his journey to Dublin, the chief City of the Countrey; and there calling the Princes and Biſhops of the Nation together, requires their conſent to have him and his heirs to be their King: which they affirming they could not do without the Popes authority, to whom, at their firſt converſion to the Chriſtian Religion, they had ſubmitted themſelves, the King ſent preſently to Adrian the then Pope, an Engliſh man, requiring his aſſent, which upon divers good conſiderations he granted; and hereupon the King built him a ſtately Palace in the City of Dublin; and having thus without blood poſſeſt himſelf of the Kingdom, the Spring following he returns joyfully into England. About four years after Rodorick alſo ſends his Chancellor to King Henry, to offer his ſubmiſſion, with a tribute to be paid of every ten beaſts, one ſufficient. TAxations in his time, were chiefly once; when he took Eſcuage of Engliſh men, towards his wars in France, which amounted to 12400 pounds: but confiſcations were many, becauſe many Rebellions, and every Rebellion was as good as a Mine. Alſo vacancies of Biſhopricks and Abbeys, kept in his hands ſometimes many at once; no time without ſome. He reſumed alſo all Lands which had either been ſold or given from the Crown by his Predeceſſors: but a principal cauſe that made him plentiful in money, was his Parſimony; as when he was enjoyned for a Penance, to build three Abbeys, he performed it, by changing Secular Prieſts into Regular Canons, only to ſpare coſt: And it was not the leaſt cauſe of alienating his Sons from him, that he allowed them not maintenance anſwerable to their calling. And it could be nothing but Parſimony while he lived, which brought it to paſs, that when he died, there were found in his Coffers, nine hundred thouſand pounds, beſides Plate and Jewels.

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

IN the beginning of his reign, he refined and reformed the Laws of the Realm; making them more tolerable and more profitable to his people then they were before. In the one and twentieth year of his reign, he divided his whole Kingdom into ſix ſeveral Circuits; appointing in every Circuit three Judges, who twice every year ſhould ride together, to hear and determine Cauſes between man and man: as at this day, though altered in the number of the Judges, and in the Shires of Circuit. In this Kings dayes the number Jews all England over was great: yet, whereſoever they dwelt, they might not bury any of their dead any where but in London; which being a great inconvenience to bring dead bodies oftentimes from far remote places, the King gave them liberty of burial in ſeveral places where they lived. It was in this Kings dayes alſo ordained, that Clergy men offending in hunting the Kings Deer, ſhould be puniſhable by the Civil Magiſtrate, according to the Laws of the Land; which order was afterward taken with them for any offence whatſoever they committed. Though it be not a Law, yet it is an Ordinance which was firſt brought in by this King, that the Lions ſhould be kept in the Tower of London. Alſo this King made a Statute, concerning Armour and Weapons; that every man that held a Knights-Fee, ſhould be bound to have a pair of Curaſſes, an Helmet, with Shield and Spear; and that every man of the Laity, having Goods and Revenues to the value of ſixt een Marks, ſhould have one pair of Curaſſes, an Helmet, a Spear and a Shield; and every man worth ten Marks ſhould have an Habergeon, a Steel Cap, and a Spear.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

THis Kings reign is famous for the contention of a Subject with the Prince; and though it may be thought no equal match, yet in this example we ſhall finde it hard to judge which of them had the victory. But before we come to ſpeak of the Contention, it is fit to ſay ſomething of the Man, and of the Quarrel. The man was Thomas Becket born in London, his Father, one Gilbert Becket, his Mother an outlandiſh woman, of the Countrey of Syria. His firſt riſing was under Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who taking a liking to him, (as one ſaith, no man knew for what) made him firſt Archdeacon of Canterbury, and then uſed means to have him be the Princes Tutor; after that to be Chancellour of England; and after the deceaſe of the ſaid Theobald, was himſelf made Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his place. One memorable thing he did at his coming to be Archbiſhop, he ſurrendred his place being Chancellour; as not thinking it fit to ſit at the Helm of the Common-wealth, and of the Church, both at once. But now began the contention between the King and him. The difference was, the King would have it ordained that Clergy men who were malefactors, ſhould be tryed before the Secular Magiſtrate as Lay-men were: This Becket oppoſed, ſaying it was againſt the Liberty of the Church, and therefore againſt the honour of God. Many Biſhops ſtood with the King, ſome few with Becket; the Contention grew long, and with the length ſtill hotter, till at laſt Becket was content to aſſent to the Ordinance with this clauſe, Salvo Ordine ſuo. the King liked not the clauſe, as being a deluding of the Ordinance: He required an abſolute aſſent, without any clauſe of Reſervation. At laſt, after many debatings and demurs, the Archbiſhop yields to this alſo, and ſubſcribes the Ordinance, and ſet his hand unto it: But

The contention between the King and him.

going homewards, it is ſaid, his Croſs-bearer, and ſome other about him, blamed him for that he had done. But whether moved with their words, or otherwiſe upon ſecond thoughts, the next day when they met again, he openly repented his former deed, retracts his ſubſcription, and ſends to the Pope for abſolution of his fault: which the Pope not only granted, but incouraged him to perſiſt in the courſe he had begun. It may be thought a fable, yet it is related by divers good Authors, that one time during this contention, certain fellows cut off the Archbiſhops Horſes tail; after which fact, all their children were born with tails like Horſes: and that this continued long in their Poſterity, though now long ſince ceaſed, and perhaps their families too. But King Henry finding there was no prevailing with Becket by fair means, begins to deal more roughly with him; and firſt makes uſe of Authority upon his Temporalties; and withal a cenſure was ſpoken of to be intended againſt his perſon. Which Becket underſtanding, thought it his beſt courſe to flee the Realm; and thereupon paſſing under the name of Dereman, he paſſeth over Sea, and there, two years by the Pope, and five by the King of France, was maintained as it were of Alms: in which miſery, nothing vexed him ſo much, as that King Henry ſent all his kindred, Men and Women, old and young, into baniſhment after him. And now King Henry finding that Becket ſtood much upon his Legantin Power, ſent meſſengers to the Pope, deſiring him to take that power from him, and to confer it upon his Archbiſhop of York; but the Pope anſwered he would not do ſo, but was content the King himſelf ſhould be his Legate, and ſent him Letters to that purpoſe, which King Henry took in ſuch ſcorn, that he threw away the Letters, and ſent them preſently back to him again. This dignity of Legatſhip, for the diligent ſervice of Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was by a ſpecial Decree of Pope Innocent the ſecond, to remain to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſo that they were intituled Legati nati, Legats born.

Children born with Horſes tails; and the cauſe.

Becket flees the Realm.

The Pope offers to make King Henry his Legat.

In this mean time, the King of France prevailed with King Henry to afford Becket a conference, hoping to bring them to ſome Agreement; where being together, King Henry alleaged before the King of France, that he required nothing of Becket, but his aſſent to an Ordinance, to which in his Grand-father King Henry the firſt's time, all the Biſhops of the Realm, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury that then was, did give their Aſſent: yet this moved not Bekcet at all, but he continued his former Tenet; it was againſt the honour of God, and therefore deſired to be excuſed. See now (ſaith King Henry) the perverſneſs of this man, all that agrees not with his own humour, is preſently againſt the honour of God. While theſe things were thus a working, Becket had gotten him more friends at Rome, and by their means prevailed with the Pope, to give him power to interdict ſome Biſhops in England that had done him wrong; and the Pope ſpared not to threaten Excommunication to King Henry himſelf, if he reſtored not Becket to his dignity. But whether awed with threatnings, or won by the King of France's importunity; or elſe perhaps relenting in himſelf, he was contented at laſt that Becket ſhould return home and enjoy his Biſhoprick. Who being come to Canterbury, the Biſhops whom he had interdicted for Crowning the young King Henry, (which he ſaid was his right to have done) made humble ſuit unto him, to be releaſed of the cenſure. Which, when the Archbiſhop would not grant, but with certain cautions and exceptions, the Biſhops diſcontented went over to the King, complaining of the hard meaſure that was offered them by the Archbiſhop: whereat the King being much moved, Shall I never (ſaith he) be at quiet for this Prieſt? If I had any about me that loved me, they would finde ſome way or other to rid me of this trouble. Whereupon four Knights ſtanding by, that heard the King make this complaint, namely Reynold Fitz-urſe, or Bereſon, Hugh Morvill, William Tracy, and Richard Britton, thinking they ſhould do an acceptable ſervice to the King, went ſhortly after into England; and going to Canterbury, found the Archbiſhop then at Church, when upon the ſteps there, they ſtruck him upon the head with their Swords and ſlew him the thirtyeth day of December, in the year 1172. Afterward with much ado, by King Henries means they were pardoned by the Pope, only enjoyned Penance to go on Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, as ſome write: but others more probably, that the King abhorred them ever after; and that within three years after they all dyed miſerably. You have heard his perſecution, and (as ſome would have it called) his Martyrdom: now hear the honours that have been done him, and the viſitations to his Tombe. And firſt King Henry himſelf coming to Canterbury, as ſoon as he came within ſight of Beckets Church, lighting of his Horſe, and putting off his hoſe and ſhooes, he went barefoot to his Tombe; and for a further penance ſuffered himſelf to be beaten with Rods, by every Monk of the Cloiſter. A few years after, King Lewis of France comes into England of purpoſe to viſit the Shrine of St. Thomas; where having paid his Vows, he makes Oblations with many rich Preſents. The like many Princes ſince that time have done; and many Miracles are reported to have been done at his Tombe, which yet may be unbelieved without unbelief, and with Faith enough. It is worth obſerving, how ſome dayes are to ſome men more fortunate then other dayes: as Mathew Paris writes of this Becket, that Tueſday was obſerved to be a fortunate day to him; for upon Tueſday he was born: upon a Tueſday he was baniſhed; upon a Tueſday he was recalled from Baniſhment: upon a Tueſday he ſuffered Martyrdom; upon a Tueſday 50 years after his death, his body with great ſolemnity was tranſlated.

Another difference in this Kings dayes, was between the two Archbiſhops of England, about the juriſdiction of Canterbury over York, which being referred to the Pope, he gave judgement on Canterburies ſide. Alſo in this Kings dayes there was a Schiſm in the Church of Rome, two Popes up at once, of whom Alexander the third was one; which ſchiſm continued the ſpace of almoſt 20. years. Alſo in this Kings dayes, one Nicholas Break ſpear, born at St. Albans, or as others write, at Langley in Hertfordſhire, being a bondman of that Abbey, and therefore not to be allowed to be a Monk there, went beyond Sea, where he ſo profited in Learning, that the Pope made him firſt Biſhop of Alba, and afterward Cardinal, and ſent him Legate to the Norwayes, where he reduced that Nation from Paganiſm to Chriſtianity, and returning back to Rome, was choſen Pope by the name of Adrian the Fourth, and dyed, being choaked with a Fly in his drink. In his dayes alſo Heraclius Patriarch of Jeruſalem, came to King Henry, deſiring aid for the Holy-Land, but not ſo much of money as of men; and not ſo much of men neither, as of a good General, as himſelf was: to whom King Henry anſwered, that though he were willing to undertake it, yet his unquiet State at home would not ſuffer him. With which anſwer the Patriarch moved, ſaid, Think not Great King, that Pretences will excuſe you before God; but take this from me, that as you forſake Gods cauſe now, ſo he hereafter will forſake you in your greateſt need. But (ſaith the King) if I ſhould be abſent out of my Kingdom, my own Sons would be ready to riſe up againſt me in my abſence; to which the Patriarch replyed, No marvail, for from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they ſhall; and ſo departed. Alſo in this Kings dayes there came into England, thirty Germans, Men and Women, calling themſelves Publicans, who denyed Matrimony, and the Sacraments of Baptiſm, and of the Lords Supper, with other Articles: who being obſtinate, and not to be reclaimed, the King commanded they ſhould be marked with a hot Iron in the forehead, and be whipped; which puniſhment they took patiently, their Captain (called Gerard) going before them ſinging, Bleſſed are ye when men hate you. After they were whipped, they were thruſt out of doors in the Winter, where they died with cold and hunger, no man daring to relieve them. This King after his conqueſt of Ireland, impoſed the tribute of Peter pence upon that Kingdom, namely, that every houſe in Ireland ſhould yearly pay a penny to St. Peter. In this Kings time, was held by Pope Alexander the third, the General Council of Lateran conſiſting of 310 Biſhops; where many Ordinances were made for the peace of the Church. Alſo in the 33 year of his Reign Jeruſalem was taken by the Turks.

THis King founded the Church of Briſtow, which King Henry the eighth afterward erected into a Cathedral. He alſo founded the Priories of Dover, of Stonely, of Baſinwork, and the Caſtle of Rudlan; and began the Stone-bridge over the Thames at London. He cauſed alſo the Caſtle of Warwick to be builded. Maud the Empereſs, his Mother, founded the Abbey of Bordeſly. In his time alſo Hugh Mortimer founded Wigmore Abbey: Richard Lucye the Kings Chief Juſtice laid the Foundation of the Conventual Church, in the honour of St. Thomas, in a place which is called Weſtwood, otherwiſe Leſnes, in the Territory of Rocheſter in the new Pariſh of Southfleet. He alſo builded the Caſtle of Anger in Eſſex. Robert Harding a Burgeſs of Briſtow, to whom King Henry gave the Barony of Barkley, builded the Monaſtery of St. Auguſtines in Briſtow. In the tenth of his reign, London Bridge was new made of Timber, by Peter of Cole-church a Prieſt. Robert de Boſcu Earl of Leiceſter, founded the Monaſtery of Gorendon, of Monks; and of Leiceſter, called St. Mary de Pater, of Canons Regular; and his Wife Amicia, Daughter of Ralph Montford, founded Eaton, of Nuns. In the two and twentieth year of his reign, after the foundation of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, the Stone Bridge over the Thames at London, began to be founded, towards which a Cardinal and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury gave a thouſand Marks. Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter founded a Monaſtery at Gloceſter of Benedictine Monks.

Caſualties that happened in his time.

IN the eleventh year of this Kings reign, on the ſix and twentieth day of January, was ſo great an Earth-quake in Ely, Norfolk, and Suffolk, that it overthrew them that ſtood upon their feet, and made the Bels to ring in the Steeples. In the ſeventeenth year of his reign, there was ſeen at St. Oſyths in Eſſex, a Dragon of marvellous bigneſs, which by moving burned houſes; and the whole City of Canterbury was the ſame year almoſt burnt. In the eighteenth year of his reign, the Church of Norwich with the houſes thereto belonging was burnt, and the Monks diſperſed. At Andover, a Prieſt praying before the Altar, was ſlain with Thunder. Likewiſe one Clerk and his brother was burnt to death with Lightning. In the three and twentieth year, a ſhowre of blood rained in the Iſle of Wight two hours together. In the four and twentieth year, the City of York was burnt; and on Chriſtmas day, in the Territory of Derlington, in the Biſhoprick of Durham, the Earth lifted up her ſelf in manner of an high Tower, and ſo remained unmovable from morning till evening, and then fell with ſo horrible a noiſe that it frighted the Inhabitants thereabouts and the Earth ſwallowing it up, made there a deep pit, which is ſeen at this day: for a Teſtimony whereof Leyland ſaith, he ſaw the Pits there, commonly called Hell-kettles. Alſo in the ſame year, on the tenth day of April, the Church of St. Andrews in Rocheſter was conſumed with fire. In the eight and twentieth year of his reign, Barnwell with the Priory, near unto Cambridge, was burnt. In the thirtieth year, the Abbey of Glanſtenbury was burnt, with the Church of St. Julian. In the year 1180. a great Earth-quake threw down many buildings, amongſt which the Cathedral Church of Lincoln was rent in pieces the five and twentieth of April: and on the twentieth of October, the Cathedral Church of Chicheſter, and all the whole City was burnt. This year alſo, near unto Orford in Suffolk, certain Fiſhers took in their Nets a Fiſh, having the ſhape of a man in all points, which Fiſh was kept by Bartholomew de Glandevile in the Caſtle of Orford ſix moneths and more; he ſpake not a word; all manner of meats he did gladly eat, but moſt greedily raw Fiſh, when he had preſſed out the juyce; oftentimes he was brought to the Church, but never ſhewed any ſign sign of adoration: at length, beeing not well looked to, he stole to the Sea, and never was seen after. In the year 1188. on the twentieth of September, the Town of Beverley with the Church of St. John there was burnt. And in this Kings time the bones of King Arthur, and his Wife Guynevour, were found in the Vale of Avolan, under an hollow Oak, fifteen foot under ground; the hair of the said Guynevour being then whole and of fresh colour; but as soon as it was touched, it fell to powder, as Fabian relateth.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Eleanor Daughter and heir of William Duke of Guien, late Wife of Lewis the seventh King of France, but then divorced; but for what cause divorced, is diversly related. Some say King Lewis carried her with him into the Holy Land, where she carried her self not very holily, but led a licentious life; and which is the worst kinde of licentiousness, in carnal familiarity with a Turk. Which King Lewis though knowing, yet dissembled, till coming home, he then waved that cause, as which he could not bring without disgrace to himself, and made use of their nearness in blood, as being Cousins in the fourth degree, which was allowed by the Pope, as a cause sufficient to divorce them, though he had at that time two Daughters by her. Being thus divorced, Duke Henry marries her, with whom it was never known, but she led a modest and sober life, a sufficient proof, that the former report was but a slander. By this Queen Eleanor he had five Sons, William, Henry, Richard, Geoffry, and John; and three Daughters, Maud married to Henry Duke of Saxony; Eleanor married to Alphonso the Eight of that name, King of Castile; and Jane or Jone married to William King of Sicily. Of his Sons, William died young. Henry born the second year of his reign, was Crowned King with his Father, in the eighteenth year, and died the nine and twentieth year, and was buried at Roan; married to Margaret, Daughter of Lewis King of France, but left no issue. Richard born at Oxford (in the Kings Palace there called Beau-mont) in the fourth year of his Fathers reign, and succeeded him in the Kingdom. Geoffry born the fifth year of his Fathers reign, married Constance Daughter and Heir of Conan, Earl of Little Britain, in the fourteenth year, and in the two and thirtieth year died; leaving by his Wife Constance, two Daughters, and a Posthumus Son named Arthur. John his youngest, called John without Land, because he had no Land assigned him in his Fathers time; born the twelfth year of his Fathers reign, and succeeded his brother Richard in the Kingdom. And this may be reckoned a peculiar honour to this King, that of his five Sons, three of them lived to be Kings; and of his three Daughters, two of them to be Queens. Concubines he had many, but two more famous then the rest; and one of these two more famous then the other; and this was Rosamund, Daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, whom he kept at Woodstock, in lodgings so cunningly contrived, that no stranger could finde the way in; yet Queen Eleanor did, being guided by a threed: so much is the eye of jealousie quicker in finding out, then the eye of care is in hiding. What the Queen did to Rosamund when she came to her, is uncertain; but this is certain, that Rosamund lived but a short time after, and lies buried in the Nunnery of Godstow near to Oxford. By this Rosamund King Henry had two Sons, William called Long-sword; who was Earl of Salisbury in right of his Wife Ela, Daughter and Heir of William Earl of that Countrey, and had by her much issue, whose posterity continued a long time: And a second Son named Geoffry, who was first bishop of Lincoln, and afterward Archbishop of York, and after five years banishment in his Brother King John's time, died in the year 1213. The other famous Concubine of this King Henry, was the Wife of Ralph Blewet a Knight; by whom he had a Son named Morgan, who was Provost of Beverley, and being to be elected Bishop of Durham, went to Rome for a dispensation, because being a Bastard he was else uncapable: But the Pope refusing to grant it, unless he would pass as the Son of Blewet, he absolutely answered, he would for no cause in the world deny his Father; and chose rather to lose the Dignity of the Place, then of his Blood, as being the Son, though but the base Son of a King.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was somewhat red of face, and broad breasted; short of body, and therewithal fat, which made him use much exercise and little meat. He was commonly called Henry Shortmantel, because he was the first that brought the use of short Cloaks out of Anjou into England. Concerning endowments of minde, he was of spirit in the highest degree Generous; which made him often say, that all the World sufficed not to a courageous heart. He had the Reputation of a wise Prince all the Christian World over; which made Alphonsus King of Castile, and Garsyas King of Navarre refer a difference that was between them, to his Arbitrament; who so judiciously determined the cause that he gave contentment to both parties: a harder matter then to cut cloth even by a threed. His custome was to be alwaies in action; for which cause, if he had no real Wars, he would have faigned; and would transport Forces either into Normandy or Britain, and go with them himself, whereby he was alwaies prepared of an Army: and made it a Schooling to his Souldiers, and to himself an Exercise. To his children he was both indulgent and hard; for out of indulgence he caused his Son Henry to be Crowned King in his own time; and out of hardness he caused his younger Sons to rebel against him. He was rather Superstitious then not Religious; which he shewed more by his carriage toward Becket being dead then while he lived. His Incontinency was not so much that he used other women beside his Wife, but the affianced wife of his own Son: And it was commonly thought, he had a meaning to be divorced from his wife Queen Eleanor, and to take the said Adela to be his wife. Yet generally to speak of him: he was an excellent Prince; and if in some particulars he were defective, it must be considered he was a man.

Why called Shortmantel.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE was not well at eaſe before, but when the King of France ſent him a liſt of thoſe that had conſpired againſt him, and that he found the firſt man in the Liſt to be his Son John, he then fell ſuddenly into a fit of fainting, which ſo encreaſed upon him, that within four daies after he ended his life. So ſtrong a Corroſive is grief of minde, when it meets with a body weakened before with ſickneſs. He died in Normandy, in the year 1189. when he had lived three ſcore and one years; reigned near five and thirty: and was buried at Fount-Everard in France; the manner of whoſe burial was thus. He was cloathed in his Royal Robes, his Crown upon his head, white Gloves upon his hands, Boots of Gold upon his legs, Gilt Spurs at his heels, a great rich Ring upon his finger, his Scepter in his hand, his Sword by his ſide, and his face uncovered and all bare. As he was carried to be buried, his Son Richard in great haſt ran to ſee him, who no ſooner was come near the body, but ſuddenly at his Noſtrils he fell a bleeding afreſh; which though it were in Prince Richard no good ſign of Innocency, yet his breaking preſently into bitter tears upon the ſeeing it, was a good ſign of Repentance. It may not be unſeaſonable to ſpeak in this place of a thing which al Writers ſpeak of, that in the Family of the Earls of Anjou, of whom this King Henry came, there was once a Princeſs a great Enchantreſs, who being on a time enforced to take the bleſſed Euchariſt, ſhe ſuddenly flew out at the Church window, was never ſeen after. From this Woman theſe latter Earls of Anjou were deſcended, which perhaps made the Patriarch Heraclius ſay of this King Henry's children, that from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they would. But Writers perhaps had been more compleat, if they had left this ſtory out of their Writings.

Of Military men, there was Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Reynold Earl of Cornwal, Hugh Bigot, Robert Ferrys, Richard Lacy, Roger Moubray, Ralph Fulger, Ranulph Granula, William Veſci, and Raynard Bayliol; men of great atchievements in War, and of no leſs abilities in Peace.

The LIFE and REIGN of KING RICHARD THE FIRST.

Of his coming to the Crown, and of his Coronation.

Anno Dom. 1189. King Richard Crowned.

KING Richard the first of that name, after his Fathers Funeral, went to Roan, where he settled the state of that Province; and from thence came into England, where he was Crowned King at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, the third day of September, in the year 1189. And herein this Prince is more beholding to Writers then any of his Predecessors; for in speaking of their Crowning, they content themselves with telling where, and by whom they were Crowned: but of this Prince they deliver the manner of his Crowning, in the full amplitude of all Circumstances, which perhaps is not unfit to do, for satisfaction of such as are never like to see a Coronation; and it was in this manner. First, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Roan, Trier, and Dublin, with all the other Bishops, Abbots, and Clergy, apparelled in rich Copes, and having the Cross, Holy Water, and Censers carried before them, came to fetch him at the door of his Privy-Chamber; and there receiving him, they led him to the Church of Westminster, till they came before the high Altar, with a solemn Procession. In the middle of the Bishops and Clergy, went four Barons, bearing Candlesticks with Tapers; after whom came Geoffry de Lucy, bearing the Cap of maintenance, and John Marshal next to him, bearing a massie pair of Spurs of Gold; then followed William Marshal, Earl of Striguil, alias Pembroke, who bare the Royal Scepter, in the top whereof was set a Cross of Gold; and William de Patricke, Earl of Salisbury going next him, bare the Warder or Rod, having on the top thereof a Dove. Then came three other Earls, David, Brother to the King of Scots, the Earl of Huntington; John the Kings Brother, Earl of Mortaigne; and Robert Earl of Leicester, each of them bearing a Sword upright in his hand with the Scabberds richly adorned with Gold. The Earl of Mortaigne went in the midst betwixt the other two; after them followed six Earls and Barons, bearing a Checker Table, upon the which were set the Kings Scutcheons of Arms; and then followed William Mandevil Earl of Albemarle, bearing a Crown of Gold a great heighth before the King, who followed, having the Bishop of Durham on the right hand, and Reynold Bishop of Bathe on the left, over whom a Canopy was borne: and in this order he came into the Church at Westminster, where before the high Altar, in the presence of the Clergy and the people, laying his hand upon the Holy Evangelists, and the relicks of certain Saints, he took a solemn Oath that he should observe Peace, Honour, and Reverence to Almighty God, to his Church, and to his Ministers, all the dayes of his life; also that he should exercise upright Justice to the people committed to his charge; and that he should abrogate and disannul all evil Laws, and wrongful Customes, if any were to be found in the precinct of his Realm; and maintain those that were good and laudable. This done, he put off all his Garments from his middle upwards, but only his Shirt, which was open on the shoulders that he might be anointed. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury anointed him in three places, on the head, on the shoulder, and on the right arm, with Prayers in such cases accustomed. After this, he covered his head with a linnen cloth hallowed, and set his Cap thereon; and then after he had put on his Royal Garment, and his uppermost Robe, the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, with which he should beat down the enemies of the Church. Which done, two Earls put his Shooes upon his feet, and having his Mantle put on him, the Archbishop forbad him on the behalf of Almighty God, to presume to take upon him this Dignity, except he faithfully meant to perform those things which he had there sworn to perform; whereunto the King made answer, that by Gods Grace he would perform them. Then the King took the Crown beside the Altar, and delivered it to the Archbishop, which he set upon the Kings head, delivering to him the Scepter to hold in his right hand, and the Rod-Royal in his left hand; and thus being Crowned, he was brought back by the Bishops and Barons, with the Cross and Candlesticks, and three Swords, passing forth before him unto his Seat. When the Bishop that sang the Mass, came to the Offertory, the two Bishops that brought him to the Church, led him to the Altar, and brought him back again. The Mass ended, he was brought with solemn Procession into his Chamber; and this was the manner of this Kings Coronation. But at this solemnity there fell out a very disasterous accident. For this Prince not favouring the Jews, as his Father had done, had given a strict charge, that no Jew should be admitted to be a spectator of the solemnity; yet certain Jews, as though it had been the Crowning of King Herod, would needs be pressing in: and being put back by Officers set of purpose, it grew to be a brabble, and from words to blows, so so as many Jews were hurt, and some slain: and thereupon a rumour was suddenly spread abroad, that the King had commanded to have all the Jews destroyed. Whereupon it is incredible what rifling there was of Jews houses, and what cutting of their throats; and though the King signified by publick Declaration, that he was highly displeased with that which was done: yet there was no staying the multitude till the next day; so often it falls out, that great solemnities are waited on with great disasters, or rather indeed, as being connatural, they can hardly be asunder.

Of his first Acts after he was Crowned.

He sets his Mother Qu. Eleanor at liberty.

HE began with his Mother Queen Eleanor whom upon her Husbands displeasure, having been kept in prison sixteen years, he not only set at liberty, but set in as great authority, as if she had been left the Regent of the Kingdom. The next he gratifies was his Brother John, to whom he made appear how much the bounty of a Brother was better then the hardness of a Father; for he conferred upon him in England, the Earldoms of Cornwal, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Darby, and Leicester; and by the marriage of Isabel, Daughter and Heir to the Earl of Gloucester, he had that Earldom also, as likewise the Castles of Marleborough, and Lutgarsal, the Honours of Wallingford, Tichil, and Eye, to the value of 4000. Marks a year: an estate so great, as was able to put a very moderate minde into the humour of aspiring, of which Princes should have a care.

His bounty to his Brother John.

He refused his affianced Lady Adela, and why.

Concerning his affianced Lady Adela, it may be thought strange, that having desired her so infinitely when he could not have her, now that he might have her, he cared not for her: but the cause was known, and in every mans mouth; that she was now but his Fathers leavings: yet he would not send her home but very rich in Jewels, to make amends, if it might be, for the loss of her Virginity; though this was somewhat hard on his part, when the Father had taken all the pleasure, that the Son should afterward pay all the Charges. But by this at least he made a quiet way for his Marriage now concluded, and shortly after to be consummated in Sicily with Berengaria the Daughter of Garsyas King of Navarre. And now his minde is wholly set upon his long intended Voyage to the Holy-Land; for which he thinks not the treasure left by his Father to be sufficient, which yet amounted to nine hundred thousand pounds: but forecasting with himself the great charge it must needs be, to carry an Army so long a journey, he seeks to enlarge his provision of money by all the means he can devise. Not long before, Hugh Pudsey had been advanced to the Bishoprick of Durham; and now for a great sum of money he sold him the Earldom: and then said merrily among his Lords, Do ye not think me a cunning man, that of an old Bishop can make a young Earl? From the Londoners he drained also great sums of money, and made them recompense in Franchises and Liberties which they had not before. He made also great sales: to the King of Scots he sold the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough, for ten thousand pounds:

He marries Berengaria the daughter of the King of Navarre.

He makes great provision of money for his journey to the Holy-Land.

He makes the Bishop of Durham an Earl for money.

He sells Berwick to the King of Scots.

to Godfrey de Lucie, Bishop of Winchester, the Mannors of Weregrave and Mentz: to the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury, the Mannor of Midhal for one thousand Marks of Silver: to the Bishop of Durham, the Mannor of Sadborough; and when it was marvelled that he would part with such things, he answered, that in this case he would sell his City of London, if he could finde a Chapman. But the worst way of all was, that pretending to have lost his Signet, he made a new one; and made Proclamation, that whosoever would safely enjoy what under the former Signet was granted, should come to have it confirmed by the new: whereby he raised great sums of money to himself, but greater of discontentment in his Subjects. By these, and such like means, he quickly furnished himself with money; and now it remained only to consider, to whose care he should commit the Government of the Kingdom in his absence: and after deliberation he made choice for the Northparts, of Hugh Bishop of Durham; joyning in Commission with him, Hugh Baldulph, and William Brunel; and for the South parts he appoints William Longshampe Bishop of Ely, and Chancellour of England, and for his greater strength, causeth the Pope to make him Legat of all England and Scotland; and for Normandy and Aquitain, Robert Earl of Leicester; all men eminent for prudence and uprightness, and which is most of all, for loyalty: and indeed to make a man fit for such imployment, all these vertues must concur. As for his Brother John, he knew well his aspiring minde, and therefore would have tied him to live in Normandy, and not to come into England till his return, but that their Mother Queen Eleanor interceded, and passed her word for him: and that nothing might be left unprovided for, he appointed his Nephew Arthur, the Son of his Brother Geoffry Duke of Britain to be his Successour, if himself should fail. And now, Undique convenere, vocat jam carbasius auras, every man is ready to take Shipping, and no stay now but for a Winde; only some say that King Richard before his departing, calling his Lords and Knights unto him, and swearing them to be true, gave to every of them a blue Riband to be known by; from whence the first occasion of the Order of the Garter is thought to begin.

He leaves William Longashamp Bishop of Ely, Governour of the Kingdom.

Of his Journey into the Holy Land.

KIng Richard having prepared an Army of thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse; and having appointed to meet Philip King of France in Sicilie, at the latter end of June, in the year 1190. sets forward himself by Land to Marseilles, and there stayes till his Ships should come about: but his Navy being driven by tempest to other parts, and the King weary of long staying, after six weeks, he hireth Shipping for himself & his company, and passeth forward to Messana in Sicilie, where arrived also the King of France, and not long after, his own Navy. In this Island the King William, now lately dead, had married Jane, King Richard's Sister, from whom Tancred the present King with-held her Dower; and therefore though he shewed King Richard fair countenance: yet he dealt secretly with with the Meſſanians to uſe all means to get him gone: whereupon the Meſſanians taking a ſmall occaſion, ſet ſuddenly upon the Engliſh, and thruſt them out of their Town. With which King Richard juſtly offended, who had his Camp without the Town, prepares himſelf to revenge the affront; when Tancred ſending to him to ſignifie that the affront was offered without his knowledge, and much againſt his liking, ſo pacified him, that for the preſent he remained ſatisfied: but underſtanding afterward, that the Meſſanians did but wait their opportunity till the Spring, when King Richard ſhould be going, he reſenting their intention, ſtayes not their leaſure, but aſſaulting the Town with Fire and Sword, in one dayes labour takes it; and had made great ſlaughter in it, if King Richard had not been moved to compaſſion with the Meſſanians tears, but chiefly with King Tancred's offers; both to pay his Siſter Jane her Dower, and to marry his Daughter to King Richard's Nephew, Arthur, Duke of Britain, and to give a good part of the portion in hand. But King Philip was notwell pleaſed with theſe conditions, yet he breaks not out to open diſſenſion, till more fewel was afterward caſt upon the fire of his anger. In the Spring King Philip ſails with his Army to Ptolemais (otherwiſe called Acon) which the Chriſtians had long beſieged, and with them he joyns; while King Richard taking his Siſter Jane and Berengaria the young Daughter of the King of Navarre with him, in 190. Ships, and 50. Gallies, puts to Sea for the Holy Land: but is by Tempeſt caſt upon the Coaſt of Cyprus, where the Iſlanders ſeeking to hinders his landing, he ſets upon them with his Forces; and invading the Iſland, eaſily ſubdues, and brings it under his Subjection. And the King of the Countrey being taken Priſoner, and intreating King Richard not to put him in bonds of Iron, King Richard gives him his word, and keeps it, but puts him in bonds of Silver. In this Iſland he ſolemnized his marriage with Berengaria, and then leaving Richard de Canvile, and Robert de Thurnham, his Lieutenants in Cyprus, he paſſeth on to Ptolemais, which City was defended by Saladine, and had been beſieged now two yeart: when the Enemy ſeeing and fearing the encreaſe of the Chriſtian Forces, propounds Conditions, upon which accepted, they deliver it up in Auguſt, the year 1192.

He ſubdues the Iſland of Cyprus.

Here he marries Berengaria.

The firſt offence between King Richard and Leopold Duke of Auſtria.

At the taking of this Town there fell out an accident, ſeeming an honour to King Richard for the preſent, but proving a diſgrace, at leſt a great trouble and charge to him afterward; For Leopold Duke of Auſtria had firſt ſet up his colours upon the wall, which K. Richard cauſed to be thrown down, and his own to be ſet up: but this was no place to ſtand a quarrelling, it came not to the reckoning till ſome time after. When Ptolemais was taken, Saladine fearing the Chriſtians further proceeding, diſmantles all the beſt Towns that were near it; as Porphyria, Cæſarea, Aſcalon, Gaza: but of Joppa King Richard takes a care, and placeth it in a Colony of Chriſtians. For Joppa is a City of Paleſtine, that was built before the Flood, and hath belonging to it a Haven of great convenience. And now the King of France, though valiant enough himſelf, yet thinking his own great acts to be obſcured by greater of King Richard's, he began, beſides his old hating him, now to envy him. For indeed Emulation when it is in Vertue, makes the ſtronger knot of love and affection: but when it is in Glory, it makes a ſeparation, and turns into the paſſion of envy and malice. And ſo did it with King Philip, who pretending the air of the Countrey, did not agree with his body; but was indeed becauſe the air of King Richard's Glory did not agree with his minde, obtained King Richard's conſent to return home, ſwearing firſt ſolemnly not to moleſt his Territories in his abſence. But this fell out for the preſent enterpriſe moſt unſeaſonably: For the departure of the King of France, though it diminiſhed not much the ſtrength, (for he left Odo Duke of Burgundy in his place) yet it diminiſhed much the ſhew of aſſiſtance. And indeed Saladine, who was at this time in terms of ſurrendring Jeruſalem, when he ſaw the King of France departed, as knowing there muſt needs be a concluſion, where there was a beginning, doubted not but the reſt would follow ſoon after; and thereupon ſtayed his hands, and grew more confident then he was before. At this time Guy of Luſignan was poſſeſt of the City of Tyre, and with it of the right of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem: with him King Richard makes an exchange, that Guy ſhould have the Iſland of Cyprus, which King Richard had won, and King Richard ſhould have the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, to which Guy had a right; and upon this title the Kings of England were ſtiled Kings of Jeruſalem a long time after: as likewiſe the poſterity of the ſaid Guy hath by this exchange held the Kingdom of Cyprus to this day. Now was King Richard more hot upon taking Jeruſalem then ever before, and had certainly taken it, but that by ill counſel diverted, becauſe the Winter drew on; and indeed by the drawing back of Odo Duke of Burgundy, who envied that King Richard ſhould have the honor of taking it, he removed for that ſeaſon to Aſcalon; after which time, the Enemy growing ſtronger, and the Chriſtians weaker, all opportunity of taking it is utterly loſt, and they could never come to the like again. And ſhortly after King Richard was advertiſed of the King of France his invading Normandy, contrary to his Oath at his departure; which forced King Richard, much to his grief, to conclude a peace with Saladine, and that upon conditions not very honourable for the Chriſtians: and himſelf preſently to return home. And ſo ſending his wife Berengaria, and his ſiſter Jane, with a great part of his Army into Sicilie, and from thence into England, he paſſeth himſelf with ſome few in his company, by the way of Thrace, and was by tempeſt brought into Dalmatia; from whence being to paſs through Germany, and particularly through Duke Leopolds Countrey of Auſtria, he remembring the old grudge, changed his apparel, and travelling ſometimes afoot, and ſometimes on horſeback, he uſed all means poſſible to keep himſelf from being known. But deſtiny is not to be avoided, for as ſoon as he came to Vienna, partly by his tongue, and partly by his expences, it was preſently found he was an Engliſh man, and withal ſome great man; and by and by a rumour was ſpread, that it was Richard King of England; who finding himſelf to be discovered, and no means possible to escape, he puts off his disguise, putting on his Princely apparel, and avows himself. Which Duke Leopold understanding, sent presently to have him apprehended: but King Richard refusing to yield himself to any, but to the Duke himself: the Duke himself came and led him to his own Palace honourably enough, but yet strongly guarded: whereof as soon as Henry the Emperour heard, he sent with great instance to Duke Leopold to send King Richard over to him, under pretence of safer custody, but with a purpose indeed to be a sharer in his Ransome. And the Duke though well knowing his meaning, yet knowing withal that it was not safe for him to deny the Emperour, he sent him over to him; who soon after put him into a prison he had, called Trivallis, into which no man was ever known to be put that escaped with life, though done perhaps to him, but in terrorem, to draw the better Ransome from him. That with which King Richard was charged, beside the wrong done to Leopold, in throwing down his Colours at Ptolemais, was the death of Conrade Duke of Tyre, whom they pretended King Richard had murthered. Wherein though King Richard made his innocency appear by the testimony of Limboldus, who confessed himself to have been the author of the Marquesses death; yet the pretence served to detain him in prison: and in prison indeed they kept him, till his Ransome was agreed upon and paid. Which being a hundred thousand pounds, fourscore thousand was paid in hand, whereof two parts to the Emperour, a third part to Duke Leopold; and for the rest, hostages given to the number of fifty, of whom the Bishop of Roan was one: though the Hostages afterward were delivered without paying the rest; for Henry the Emperour dying shortly after, his Successour had the conscience not to take it, as knowing it had been unjustly acted. And indeed the accidents that befel both the Emperour and the Duke Leopold, were evident demonstrations of the injustice they had done; for the Emperour shortly after died, and the Duke Leopold in a Tilting for solemnity of his Birth-day, fell off his Horse, and so broke his Leg, that to save his life, he was fain to have his Leg cut off. And now after fifteen months imprisonment, King Richard is released, and returns into England four years elder then he went out; and thus ended his Journey to the Holy Land. Yet one memorable accident happening to him in the Holy Land, may not be omitted; that going one day a Hawking about Joppa, finding himself weary, he laid him down upon the ground to sleep, when suddenly certain Turks came upon him to take him: but he awakened with their noise, riseth up, gets a horseback, and drawing out his Sword, assaults the Turks, who feigning to flie, drew the King into an ambush where many Turks lay, who had certainly taken him if they had known his person; but one of the Kings Servants, called William de Patrellis, crying out in the Saracen tongue, that he was the King, they presently lay hold upon him, and let the King escape.

Troubles in his Dominions in his absence.

KIng Richard at his going out of England, had so well settled the Government of the Kingdom, that it might well have kept it in good order during all the time of his absence; but disorders are weeds which no foresight can hinder from growing having so many hands to water them: where occasions of distaste are no sooner offered then taken; and oftentimes taken before they be offered, as was here to be seen. For King Richard had left in chief place of Authority, William Longshampe, Bishop of Ely; a man who so carried himself, that although the things he did were justifiable; yet the pride with which he did them was unsufferable; seldom riding abroad without five hundred, some say a thousand in his train; not for safety, but for state: and though there were other left in Authority besides himself; yet his power was so predominant, that he made of them but ciphers, and ruled all as he list himself. This insolency of governing was soon distasted by many, and especially by John the Kings Brother, who counting the greatness of of his birth an equal match at least with any substitute greatness, affronted the Bishop in the managing of affairs in such sort, that while some adhered to the one, and some to the other, the Kingdom in the mean time was in danger to be rent asunder; till at last the Bishop finding himself too weak, or at least fearing that he was so, but rather indeed deposed from his Authority by the Kings Letters, and the Archbishop of Roan put in his place, thought it best for him to flie the Realm. Whereupon for his greater safety, disguising himself in womans apparel, and carrying a Web of Cloth under his arm, he sought in this manner to take shipping and pass the Seas: But being discovered and known, the women in revenge of the abuse done their cloaths, in making them his instruments of fraud, fell upon him, and so beat him, that it might have beaten humility into him for ever after. This disgrace made him glad to get into Normandy, his native Countrey, where to little purpose he wooed King Richard, and Queen Eleanor for reparation. But this was but a sport in comparison of the mischiefs done in Normandy by Philip King of France; for first he invades Normandy, where he takes many Towns, and amongst others Gysorts, and draws the Kings Brother John to combine with him, promising to assist him in winning the Kingdom of England, and to have his Sister Adela, whom King Richard had repudiated, to be his Wife: with which promise Duke John had been ensnared, if his Mother Queen Eleanor had not disswaded him. But in England Duke John took upon him as King, perswading the people that his Brother King Richard was not living; and indeed it was easie to remove, they knowing him to be a prisoner, to the affirming him to be dead: but such was the faithfulness of the Archbishop of Roan, and other the Princes of the Realm to King Richard, that they opposed Duke John, and frustrated all his practices; and the Bishop of Ely had told him plainly, that though King Richard were dead, yet the succession in the King-

The Duke John takes upon him as King.

Kingdom belonged not to him, but to Arthur Duke of Britain, Son of Geoffry his Elder Brother. And in these terms King Richard found his State when he returned from the Holy-Land.

His Acts and Troubles after his returning from the Holy-Land.

AT his coming home from the Holy-Land, the first thing he did, was to give his Lords and people thanks for their faithfulness to him in his absence, and then for their readiness in supplying him for his Ransome. But as for his Brother John in whom ungratefulness seemed to strive with Ambition, which should be the greater in him, he depriveth him of all those great possessions he had given him: some ado he had to make sound certain pieces which he had corrupted, as the Castles of Marleborough, Lancaster, and a Fortress at Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwal; but chiefly the Castles of Nottingham and Tichil, which stood so firmly for Duke John, that they were not reduced to obedience without some blood, and much expence. But his greatest trouble was with Philip King of France, in whom was so ingraffed a spleen against King Richard, that he seemed to be never well but when he was working him some ill. Now therefore King Richard to make it appear he had not left the Holy War for nothing (having first obtained in Parliament a Subsidy towards his charges, and caused himself to be new Crowned at Winchester, (when the King of Scots bore one of the three Swords before him) lest the people through his long absence might have forgotten they had a King) he departs with a hundred Ships into Normandy; but it was withal, upon this occasion: sitting one day at dinner in his little Hall (as it was called) news was brought him, that King Philip had besieged Vernoil, with which he was so moved, that he swore a great Oath, he would not turn his face till he were revenged. Whereupon he caused the wall right before him to be presently beaten down, that so he might pass forward without turning his face; and thus in haste he goes to Vernoil, whither he was no sooner come, but the King of France made as great haste to be gone, not without some loss, and more disgrace. Here his Brother John submits himself to him, and with great shew of penitence intreats his pardon, which he readily granted; saying only, I wish you may as well remember your fault, as I shall forget it. The King of France having left Vernoil, enters Turonia, and near to Vindocinum pitcheth his Tents: thither King Richard follows him, and with his coming so affrighted him, that leaving Bag and Baggage, Munition, Tents, and Treasure to a marvellous value, he get him gone, and glad he was so rid of King Richard. After this a Truce was agreed upon for a year, which each of them longed till it was expired: as having no pleasure but in troubling one another. In this time there was a trouble at home, though not to the King; yet to the Kingdom. For Robin Hood, accompanied with one little John, and a hundred stout fellows more, molested all passengers upon the High-way: of whom it is said, that he was of noble blood, at least made noble, no less then an Earl, for some deserving services: but having wasted his estate in riotous courses, very penury forced him to take this course. In which yet it may be said he was honestly dishonest; for he seldom hurt any man, never any woman, spared the poor, and only made prey of the rich; till the King setting forth a Proclamation to have him apprehended, it happened he fell sick at a certain Nunnery in Yorkshire called Birckleys; and desiring there to be let blood, was betrayed, and bleed to death. Such another trouble, though not to the King, yet to the Kingdom, fell out by reason of the Jews; and first at the Town of Lime in Norfolk, upon this occasion. A Jew being turned Christian, was persecuted by those of his Nation, and assaulted in the street; who thereupon flying to a Church hard by was thither also followed, and the Church assaulted: which the people of the Town seeing, in succour of the new Christian, they fell upon the Jews, of whom they slew a great number, and after pillaged their houses. By this example the like assaults were made upon the Jews at Stamford, and after that at Lincoln, and lastly at York, where infinite number of Jews were massacred; and some of them blocked up in the Castle, cut the throats of their Wives and Children, and cast them over the Walls upon the Christians heads, and then burnt both the Castle and themselves. Neither could this sedition be stayed, till the King sent his Chancellour the Bishop of Ely, with force of Arms, to punish the offenders. His last trouble was a punishment of covetousness; for one Guydomer having found a great treasure in the Kings Dominions; and for fear of King Richard, flying to a Town of the King of France for his safeguard, was pursued by the King: but the Town denied him entrance, and he thereupon going about the Walls to finde the fittest place for assaulting it, one Bertram de Gerdon, or as others call him Peter Basile, shot at him with a Cross-Bow, and hit him on the Arm, of which wound he died within four dayes after, and so ended all his troubles.

Of his Taxations and wayes for raising of Money.

OF Taxations properly so called, there were never fewer in any Kings Reign; but of wayes to draw money from the Subject never more. It is true, the first money raised for his journey, was all out of his own Estate, by selling or pawning of Lands; but then at his comming back, he resumed the Lands into his hands again, without paying back the money he had received. This if it may not have the name, yet certainly it had the venome of a bitter Taxation. Likewise the feigning to have lost his Seal, and then enjoyning them to have their Grants confirmed by a new; though it went not in the number, yet it had the weight of a heavy Taxation where it lighted. Afterward, the money raised for his Ransom, was not so properly a Taxation as a Contribution: or if a Taxation for him, yet not by him; which was done in his absence, by the Subjects themselves. And indeed no taxations are commonly so pinching, as those which are imposed upon the Subject by the Subject, and such was this; for to raise money for his Ransome, there was imposed upon every Knights Fee 20*s.* of all Lay-mens Revenues the fourth part; and the fourth part of all the Revenues of the Clergy, with a tenth of their Goods. Alſo the Chalices and Treaſure of all Churches were taken to make up the ſum. Afterward, this only was a plain Taxation, and granted in Parliament; that of every Ploughland through England, he would have two ſhillings, and of the Monks Ciſteaux, all their Wool of that year. And one more greater then this, and was this year impoſed towards his Wars in Normandy, that every Hide of Land, as much as to ſay, every hundred Acres of Land, ſhould pay five ſhillings; which computed without deductions will riſe to a ſum that will ſeem incredible.

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

HIs Ordinances were chiefly for the Meridian of London; for where before his time the City was governed by Portgraves, this King granted them to be governed by two Sheriffs and a Mayor, as now it is. And to give the firſt of theſe Magiſtrates the honour to be remembred, the names of the Sheriffs were Henry Cornhil, and Richard Reyner; and the name of the firſt Lord Mayor was Henry Fitz-Alwin, who continued Mayor during his life, which was four and twenty years. But Fabian who was himſelf a Sheriffe of London; and by that means moſt likely to know the truth, affirmeth, that the Officers ordained now by King Richard, were but only two Bailiffs: and that there was no Mayor nor Sheriff of London till the tenth year of King John; and therefore at that year I will begin their Catalogue. But howſoever, now began the City firſt to receive the form and ſtate of a Commonwealth, and to be divided into Fellowſhips and Corporations, as at this-day they are: And this Franchiſe was granted in the year 1189. the firſt year of King Richard the firſt. He made alſo divers Ordinances concerning the meaſures of Corn, and Wine, and Cloth; and that no Cloth ſhould any where be dyed of any other colour then black, but only in principal Towns and Cities. Alſo he ordained Juſts and Tournaments to be holden for the exerciſe of his Gentry in Arms.

Sheriffs and Mayor of London firſt ordained.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

THE Church within his own Dominions was quiet all his time, no conteſtation with the Pope, no alterations amongſt the Biſhops, no difference between the Clergy and the Laity, or the Clergy amongſt themſelves: they alſo ſeemed to be aſleep, till they were afterwards awakened, in the time of the ſucceeding King. But abroad in his time, there was an addition of of three orders of Devotion; the Order of the Auguſtine Friers, called Friers Mendicants, begun by William of Paris; then the Orders of Friers Minors begun by St. Francis; and laſtly the Orders of Friers Preachers begun by St. Dominick, though not confirmed till the firſt year of Pope Honorius.

New Orders of Friers.

Works of Piety in his time.

WOrks of Piety are for the moſt part works of plenty. Penury may inwardly have no good wiſhes, but outwardly it can expreſs but little. And indeed all parts of the Kingdom, all ſorts of people were drawn ſo dry, by the two great occaſions of his Journey and his Ranſome, and afterward by other Taxations; that the richeſt men had enough to do to maintain themſelves, without being at the charge to make proviſion for others. All works of Piety were now for the ſervice of the Holy-Land; and therefore it may well paſs, if not for a work of Devotion, at leaſt worthy to be remembred, that William Biſhop of Ely builded the outer Wall of the Tower of London, and cauſed a deep ditch to be made about it, with an intention the River of Thames ſhould have ſurrounded it, though it could not be effected. Only Hubert Walter who at one time was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Popes Legat, Lord Chancellour, Lord Chief Juſtice, and the immediate Governour under the King, both in Wales and England, founded a Monaſtery at Weſt Durham in Norfolk, where he was born; begun another at Wolverhampton; and finiſhed a Collegiate Church at Lambeth.

Of his Wife and Children.

IN his infancy he was contracted to a Daughter of Raymond Earl of Barcelone, after that affianced to Adela, or Alice, Daughter of Lewis King of France, yet married to neither of them; but he married Berengaria, Daughter of Garſias King of Navarre, whom his Mother Queen Eleanor brought unto him into Sicily, from whence paſſing into Cyprus, their marriage was there ſolemnized. Afterward going forward to the Holy-Land, he carried her and his Siſter Jane Queen of Sicily along with him, where they remained till his return home, and then ſent them to paſs to Sicily, and from thence into England: but that ever ſhe came into England, no mention is made, neither what became of her after ſhe parted from King Richard at the Holy-Land. But Children certainly he had none, either by his Wife, or by any Concubine, unleſs we reckon as a Prieſt in Normandy did, who told King Richard he had three Daughters; and the King marvelling who they ſhould be, ſeeing he knew of none he had; yes (ſaith the Prieſt) you haue three Daughters, Pride, Covetouſneſs, and Lechery. Which the King taking merrily, called to the company about him, and ſaid, I am told by a Prieſt here, that I have three Daughters; and I deſire you to be witneſſes how I would have them beſtowed: My daughter Pride upon the Templars and Hoſpitalers; my daughter Covetouſneſs, upon the Monks of the Ciſtercian Order; and my daughter Lechery, upon the Clergy.

Of Caſualties happening in his time,

IN his time the Town of Mawling in Kent with the Nunnery, was conſumed with fire. And in his time the bones of Arthur the famous King of Britain were found at Glaſtenbury in an old Sepulchre, about which ſtood two Pillars, in which Letters were written but could not be read. Upon the Sepulchre was a croſs of Lead, whereon was written; Here lieth the Noble King of Britain, Arthur. Alſo in this Kings dayes for three or four years together, there reigned ſo so great a dearth, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for 18. shillings 8. pence, and then followed so great a Mortality of men, that scarce the living sufficed to bury the dead.

A great dearth.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of stature, and well proportioned, fair, and comely of face, of hair bright abourne, of long arms, and nimble in all his joynts, his thighs and legs of due proportion, and answerable to the other parts of his Body. To speak of his moral parts, his Vices for the most part, were but only upon suspicion: Incontinency in him much spoken of, nothing proved. But his Virtues were apparent, for in all his actions he shewed himself Valiant, (from whence he had the appellation or surname of Cœur de Lion) Wise, liberal, Merciful, Just, and which is most of all, Religious. A Prince born for the good of Christendom, if a Bar in his Nativity had not hindred it. The remorse for his undutifulness towards his Father, was living in him till he died; for at his death he remembred it with bewailing, and desired to be buried as near him as might be, perhaps as thinking they should meet the sooner, that he might ask him forgiveness in another world.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE died of a wound with an Arrow in his arm, shot at him by one Bertrad, or Peter Basile, which neglected at first, and suffered to rankle, or as other say, ill handled by an unskilful Chirurgeon, in four dayes brought him to his end. But his Charity deserves to have it remembred, that finding himself past hope of Recovery, he caused the party that had wounded him to be brought before him: who being asked what moved him to do his Fact? answered, that King Richard had killed his Father and two of his Brothers with his own hand, and therefore he would do it if it were to do again.

King Richard's charitable minde at his death.

Upon this insolent answer, every one looked the King should have censured him to some terrible punishment; when contrary to all their expectations, in a high degree of Charity, he not only freely forgave him; but gave a special charge he should be set at liberty, and that no man should dare to do him the least hurt; commanding besides to give him a hundred shillings for his pains. An act that well shewed he had been at the Holy-Land, or rather indeed that he was going to it. But Polychronicon saith, that after King Richard was dead, the Duke of Brabant who was then present, caused the said Bertrad to be flayed quick, and then to be hanged. He died the sixth day of April, in 1199. when he had lived 44. years, reigned nine, and about nine months, and had his body buried at Font-Everard, by his Father: his heart at Roan, in the remembrance of the hearty love that City had alwayes borne him; and his bowels, at Chalons, for a disgrace of their unfaithfulness: others say at Carlile in England.

Men of Note in his time.

IN his time were famous, Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, who followed King Richard into the Holy-Land, and dyed there; Hubert that succeeded him; Hugh Bishop of Lincoln; William Bishop of Ely, a man equally famous and infamous; also Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, a learned Writer in Divinity; Daniel Morley, a great Mathematician; John de Herham, and Richard de Herham, two notable Historians; Guilielmus Stephanides, a Monk of Canterbury, who wrote much in the praise of Archbishop Becket; also one Richard Divisiensis, Nicholas Walkington, and Robert de Bello Foco, an excellent Philosopher. Of Martial men, Robert Earl of Leicester; Ranulph de Fulgers; two of the Bardolphs, Hugh and Henry; three Williams, Marshal, Brunel and Mandevil, with two, Roberts, Ross, and Sevevile.

The REIGN of KING JOHN.

1199. KING Richard being dead, the right of ſucceſſion remained in Arthur, Son of Geoffry Plantagenet, elder Brother to Earl John; but John as thinking the title of Arthur but a Criticiſme in State, and not for every ones capacity, at leaſt in common ſenſe not ſo plain as his own, who was the Son of a King, and Brother to a King, aſcends into the Throne as confidently as if he had no competitor: Only Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury went before, and made an Oration in his behalf, wherein ſeeking to do him a courteſie, he did him indeed a wrong; for waving his right of ſucceſſion, he inſiſted wholly upon their right of Election, whereof would follow, that as they brought him in, ſo they might caſt him out; of which error when he was told, he ſaid, he did it of purpoſe to make King John the more careful of his Government, by making him ſenſible upon what an unſure ground his Regality ſtood. King John reſented it, but ſeeing it to ſerve his turn for the preſent, he took it not ill, as knowing that his turn once ſerved, he could afterward be his own carver of what title he pleaſed; and ſo upon Aſcenſion day in the year 1199. he was Crowned King at Weſtminſter, with more ſolemnity then joy: many preſaging by their countenances and more in their mindes, that all would not long be well. It cannot be denied, but that in moral circumſtances Earl John had the advantage of his Nephew Arthur; for he was a man of years fit to govern, Arthur but a childe, not thirteen years old; he a Native, at leaſt alwayes bred up in the Kingdom, Arthur a Foreigner, and had never been here; he well known both to the Nobility and People, Arthur a ſtranger to both, as one they had never never ſeen. And beſides theſe moral advantages, he had now added one from the Politicks, that he had gotten poſſeſſion, (of more force in the practical part then all the former) and withal a greater then all theſe, if it be true which ſome write, that his Brother King Richard had aſſigned him his Succeſſour after his deceaſe. But yet knowing the Title at laſt would come to be tried in a Court, where the Sword muſt be Judge, he imployeth all his endeavours to get this Judge to be his Friend, and by all means poſſible to ſtrengthen himſelf with Arms; and thereupon going to Chinon and Roan, he ſeiſeth upon the Treaſure which his Brother had left in thoſe parts, and with it gets Friends and Souldiers, the Armour of Arms. And indeed all he could have done himſelf would have done him no good, if he had not had the help of able Aſſiſtants, who yet aſſiſted him no leſs for their own ends then for his. And theſe were chiefly his Mother Queen Eleanor, who knew if her Grand-ſon Arthur ſhould be King, that then his Mother Conſtantia would rule all, at leaſt during his Minority; and thereby her ſelf be put from the ſtage of all Authority: and the Archbiſhop Hubert, who alſo knew that if Arthur ſhould come to reign, that then the Anjouin and French ſhould have all the beſt Offices, and the Engliſh wholly be neglected, as it was in the time of King William the Conquerour. And yet a greater friend then both theſe; for coming to Roan, he uſed means, that Walter the Archbiſhop in the Cathedral Church with great pomp girt him with the Ducal Sword of Normandy, and Crowned him with a Coronet of Golden Roſes, he taking his Oath for faithful Adminiſtration in that Dukedom, and they their Oath for being Loyal Subjects.

King John is Crowned.

Why preferred before his Nephew Arthur.

Of his Troubles in Conteſtation with his Nephew Arthur.

THough King John had entred upon Normandy, and made that Province ſure unto him; yet the Province of Anjou ſtood firm for Arthur, in obſervance of their love to his Father their former Prince; which alſo King John ſoon after invading, reduceth by force of Arms to his obedience. And now Conſtantia the Mother of Prince Arthur, finding King John too powerful an adverſary, and no likelihood for her party, to be able long to ſtand out againſt him without further aſſiſtance, conceives it her beſt way to have recourſe to the King of France, and thereupon commits her Son Arthur to his tuition; who ſeemed to receive him with the tenderneſs of a Father, and promiſeth to aſſiſt him with his uttermoſt Forces, in the recovery of his Right both in France and England. Here we may obſerve upon what hinge the affections of the Kings of France were uſed to turn. For in King Henry the Second's time, King Lewis of France was ſo great a friend to his Son Richard, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Father; afterward when Richard was King, then Philip King of France was ſo great a Friend to John, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Brother: And now that John is come to be King, he is preſently grown ſo great a Friend of Arthurs, that by all means he will help him to get the Kingdom from his Uncle; and no doubt if Arthur ſhould ever have come to be King, he would haye been as ready to help any other to get the Kingdom from him; by which it appears, that it was not the perſons of Men they either hated or loved, but that they were alwayes jealous of their growing too great.

Conſtantia Prince Arthur's mother imploreth aid of the King of France.

And

And indeed this ballancing of States keeps Princes affections alwaies in ſuſpence, and never ſuffers the Glaſs of their Love or Hate, to make a true Reflexion. About this time William King of Scots came to London to viſit King John, and there did homage to him for his Kingdom of Scotland, though ſome ſay, but only for the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland: but being required aid againſt the French, he excuſed himſelf, ſaying he could not do it without conſent of his Kingdom, and ſo returned home.

The King of Scots doth homage to King John.

And now Philip King of France having undertaken the protection of the young Prince Arthur, with a mighty Army enters Normandy, takes many of the beſt Towns, and purſuing his Victories, enters the Province of Anjou alſo, and recovers it from King John, which he the year before had gotten from Prince Arthur. Upon this King John makes a journey into Normandy, accuſing King Philip for breaking the Truce, which he had formerly made with King Richard for five years. But when he ſhould come to make his Accuſation good by Arms, he falleth to Treaties, and obtaineth a new Truce for fifty daies: with which new Truce, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who had profeſſed himſelf of that ſide, was not well pleaſed; and thereupon cometh to King John to Roan, and entering a new league with him, they there conſult how to proceed, when the fifty dayes ſhould be expired. This conſultation the King of France underſtood; and thereupon both ſides prepare for war, but at the end of the Truce, both ſides ſeemed to relent, and divers meetings were had for Treaties of Peace: and in concluſion, King John more deſirous of Peace then he was for his Honour, agreed to theſe conditions, that his Neece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſus King of Caſtile by his ſiſter Eleanor, ſhould marry with Lewis King Philip's Son, who ſhould have with her in Dower, beſides thirty thouſand Marks in Money, all thoſe Cities, except only Angiers, which the French before that time had taken, which were many and very great. And this Peace thus made, he returns into England with great joy, but was not with the like joy received of the Engliſh Lords, who counted themſelves diſhonoured, in the diſhonourable conditions he had made; and Baldwin Earl of Flanders alſo, when he ſaw the poor ſpirit of King John, to deſcend to ſuch baſe conditions, left his party; and entring league with the King of France, diſpoſed himſelf for the Holy War.

1200.

The two Kings of England and France agree upon a peace.

The Engliſh Lords are diſcontented with the conditions of peace.

But King John having now gotten a Vacation, and a time of eaſe, which agreed much better with his nature then War, ſets his minde wholly upon pleaſures; and for maintaining his pleaſures, upon ſeeking after profit, which he purſues by all manner of injuſtice, under the name of Prerogative: and with ſuch violence, that when his Brother Geoffry Archbiſhop of York, in the dutifulneſs of a Counſellor, adviſed him not to take ſuch unlawful courſes, he moſt unworthily took from him all he had, and it was a years work for all the Archbiſhops friends to pacifie his anger. In the neck of this injuſtice, he commits another, he procures a divorce from his Wife Avis, the Daughter of Robert Earl of Gloceſter, only for being of kin to him in the third degree; and by advice of the King of France, marries Iſabel Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Angouleſme, Affianced before to Hugh le Brun Earl of March: and ſhortly after brings her with him into England, where he and ſhe together, are both Crowned at Canterbury. And here the Earls and Barons of the Realm, being all ſummoned to attend the King into France at Whitſuntide following, they all by a general conſent ſent him word, that unleſs he would reſtore them their Rights and Liberties, they would do him no ſervice out of the Kingdom. But what it was that made the Lords more violent in preſſing their demands at this time then before, no Writers of theſe times do ſufficiently deliver: only ſome of them ſpeak ſcatteringly of certain oppreſſions (beſides the general grievance for Exactions) lately offered to ſome of the Lords; one to the Earl of Cheſter, whom he would have baniſhed, only for adviſing him to leave his cruelty and incontinency; Another, a purſuit in Love to a Daughter of Robert Fitz-Water, called Maud the Fair, who not conſenting to the Kings luſt, a meſſenger was ſent to give her poyſon in a porched Egg, whereof ſhe died: And a third, offered to William de Brawſe and his Lady, for a raſh word ſpoken; for when the King ſent to have de Brawſe's Son delivered him for a pledge, the Lady anſwered, We ſhall do well indeed to commit our Son to his keeping, who kept ſo well his own Nephew Prince Arthur. This raſh word coſt de Brawſe his Countrey, and his Lady and their Son their lives, both of them being famiſhed to death in Priſon. For, though theſe directly were but particular grievances, yet reflecting they were general, what one ſuffered all might; but whether any of theſe, or all of theſe together, were Ingredients to make a Compound of violence in the Lords at this time, or whatſoever was the true cauſe, this was plainly the effect, that unleſs the King would reſtore their Liberties, they would not follow him out of the Kingdom. But notwithſtanding this refuſal of his Lords, he paſſeth over with his Queen into Normandy; and from thence to Paris, where the King of France receives them with all complements of Love and Amity. But now Hugh Earl of March, reſenting the injury done him by King John, in taking away his affianced Wife, joyns with Prince Arthur; and the King of France alſo, for all his fair ſhew of amity lately made, joyns with them, as having ſometime before married his youngeſt Daughter to Prince Arthur, and theſe with their Forces joyned, invade firſt the Turones, and then the Anjouins, of which Province, Queen Eleanor, the Kings Mother was left Regent: who thereupon betakes her ſelf to Mirabel the ſtrongeſt Town of thoſe parts, and ſends to her Son King John, acquainting him with the danger ſhe was in, and requiring his ſpeedy ſuccour. When in the mean time Prince Arthur takes the City, and in it his Grandmother Queen Eleanor, whom he uſed with greater reverence and reſpect then ſhe expected. But King John at the hearing hereof, was ſo moved, calling the French King ungrateful and perfidious for ſuccouring Prince Arthur, contrary to his League, that ſtudying

The Lords refuſe to do the King ſervice out of the Kingdom.

King John's unjuſt carriage for being denied his ſuit in love.

Hugh de Brun and the King of France joyn againſt King John in aſſiſting Prince Arthur.

ſtudying preſently the art of revenge, he fell upon a ſtratagem, of all other the moſt prudent againſt an Enemy. For a Surpriſe in War is like an Apoplexy in the body, which ſtrikes without giving warning for defence. And this Stratagem at this time King John put in practice; for travelling night and day with indefatigable labour, he came upon his enemies before they were aware, and ſetting upon them unprovided, it was rather an execution then a battel: and they who remained unſlain were taken priſoners, amongſt whom Prince Arthur himſelf, who committed preſently to the cuſtody of Robert de Veypont in Roan, lived not long after. Whether it were, that attempting to make eſcape, he fell down from the walls of his Priſon, and was drowned in the River Seyne, as ſome ſay: or whether it were that through anguiſh of minde he fell ſick and dyed, as others ſay: or whether indeed he were made away by King John, as the common fame went, Certain it is, that he ſurvived his impriſonment but a very few daies. But though he were gone, yet his Siſter Eleanor, a preceding Competitor to King John was ſtill remaining; Her therefore, at this time alſo King John ſeiſed upon, and commits her in ſafe cuſtody to Briſtow Caſtle, where after ſhe had lived long, ſhe died.

King John by his celerity ſurpriſeth his enemies.

Prince Arthur is taken priſoner, and ſoon after died.

Of his Troubles after the death of his Nephew Arthur.

KIng John being now freed from his Competitor, one would think he ſhould have ended all his troubles: but like a Hydra's head, they rather multiplied upon him. For they who had been ſo ready to aſſiſt Prince Arthur in his life, were now as ready to revenge his death. And firſt, Conſtance his Mother comes to King Philip, with open exclamations againſt King John, accuſing him with the murther of her Son, and with all the inſtance of Tears and Intreaties, ſolicits him to revenge it. Hereupon King Philip ſummons King John to appear at a day; and becauſe he appeared not according to the tenure of his Homage, it was decreed againſt him, that he had forfeited all the property of his Eſtate in France: and thereupon King Philip with mighty Forces invades his Territories, takes many Towns of principal conſequence, while King John lived idle at Roan, no more regarding it, then if it had not at all concerned him. And when ſome of his Lords ſeemed to marvel what he meant, to ſuffer the French to rob him of ſuch good Cities. You ſay true indeed (ſaith he) for it is but Robbery; and within a few daies you ſhall ſee, I will make him reſtore them back with uſury. In this ſlighting humour he returns into England, where he looks not after the levying of Souldiers, or the raiſing of an Army, as this caſe required, but continues his old courſe for raiſing of money, accuſing ſometimes one of his Lords, ſometimes another, as if it were their fault that he had loſt theſe Towns in France. And upon theſe accuſations made many of them pay great ſums of money, which brought him not only into hatred at home, but into contempt abroad; for the King of France underſtanding his unworthy courſes, proceeds more violently in his Invaſions then before, getting Falais, Damfront, and all the good Towns of Normandy, but only Roan. And at laſt, though Roan was a Town ſtrongly fortified with Walls, and more ſtrongly with the faithful hearts of the Inhabitants; yet finding no hope of ſuccour from King John, it was forced for want of Victuals to ſubmit it ſelf to the King of France. Whoſe example all the other Cities followed, and ſo all Normandy returned to the ſubjection of the French, after three hundred and ſixteen years that Rollo the Dane had firſt poſſeſt it Prince Arthurs Mother accuſeth King John of murthering her Son to the King of France.

King John's careleſneſs.

All Normandy loſt by King John.

It was now the year 1205. and the ſixth of King John's reign, about which time, the two props of his Eſtate, or rather indeed, the two bridles of his intemperancy died, his Mother Queen Eleanor, whoſe virtues had oftentimes qualified the vices of her Son; and Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who repented him at his death of nothing more, then that he had been an Inſtrument of bringing him to the Crown.

1205.

And now King John being a ſubſtantive of himſelf, hath a device in his head to make his Subjects as willing to give him money as he was to have it. For knowing the great diſcontentment they all had for their loſſes in France, he gives it out, that he would preſently raiſe an Army for recovery of thoſe loſſes, if he might have money to go about it: whereupon, never was money given with more alacrity. And as ſoon as he had it, he inſtantly went to Portſmouth, and there took Shipping before it was poſſible for his Lords and others to be in readineſs to accompany him; and ſailing forward ſome certain leagues into the Sea, upon a ſudden he returns back again, and then laies the fault upon his Lords, that had not followed him: and for this backwardneſs of theirs, impoſed afterwards great Fines upon them; by which means he got money no leſs by pretence of his not going, then he had done before by pretence of his going. About this time died Geoffry Fits-Peter Juſtitiar of England, who while he lived kept the King in ſome awe; in ſo much, as hearing he was dead, he ſwore by the feet of God, that now at length he was King of England, and with great rejoycing ſaid to ſome Lords about him: Now when this man comes into Hell, let him ſalute the Archbiſhop Hubert, whom certainly he ſhall finde there. But Philip King of France, intending to leave the Engliſh nothing on that ſide the Sea, invaded Chinon, and takes it; and in it the valiant Captain Roger Lacy, which had given a period to King Philip's victories, had not Guido, the husband of Conſtantia Prince Arthur's Mother, revolted to King John. Who with his aſſiſtance once again levies an Army, beſiegeth Mount Auban, a Caſtle thought impregnable; and within fifteen daies takes it, which Charles the Great could not get with his ſeven years ſiege: where ſo great a number of French Lords were taken priſoners, that King John ſent a Catalogue of their names into England, for a memorial of ſo great a victory. After this, he taketh the ſtrong Town of Angiers, and utterly defaceth it; for which afterward he was ſorry, as being the Town where he was born. But now when the two Kings were ready to meet, and to give battel, interceſſion was made by friends of both ſides, and thereupon a Peace concluded for two years, and King John returned into England.

King John's device to get money of his Subjects.

King John glad of Geoffry Fits-Peter's death

King John aſſiſted unexpectedly. He was born at Angiers in France.

A peace between the two Kings.

King

King John passeth into Ireland and reduceth it to obedience.

King John being returned, performs no leſs worthy Acts at home, then he had done in France; for firſt he invades the Borders of Scotland, and brings Alexander King of Scots to do him homage; and then underſtanding many of the Iriſh to be revolted, he paſſeth over to Dublin, and reduceth them to his obedience; and then placing John Biſhop of Norwich Governour there, he returns into England: where paſſing through Wales, he ſubdueth certain Rebels there, and takes eight and twenty children of the beſt Families for pledges of their future loyalty; but not long after, hearing they grew mutinous and rebelled again, he was ſo incenſed, that he would not go to dinner, till he had ſeen thoſe twenty eight children to be all hanged before his face. So inconſiderate a thing is the deſire of revenge, that it makes no difference between innocency and guiltineſs; though indeed a thing oftentimes muſt be done for example, which conſidered in it ſelf, would be forborne.

He ſubdueth the Welſh rebels and takes 28 pledges of them.

Upon their rebelling again he hangs up all their pledges.

It was now the year 1214. and the fourteenth of King John's reign, when he going to Angiers, ſtrongly repairs it, and the province of Poicton revolted to him: which Lewis King Philip's Son underſtanding, comes upon them with a mighty Army, and uſes much ſeverity upon the Authors of the revolt, takes priſoners, Reynolt Earl of Boloigne, and William Earl of Salisbury, with many other of King John's Captains, and defeated his whole Army. Whereof when King John was certified he grew in a manner deſperate; and as a man dejected, makes a new Truce upon any conditions with the King of France, and returns into England: where he findes a worſe buſineſs ready to entertain him. For the Lords of the Realm having often required their ancient Rights and Liberties; and finding nothing but deluſions, endure no longer to be abuſed: but meeting at St. Edmundsbury, they there confer how they may finde a remedy to redreſs this evil; and at laſt concluded to go to the King themſelves in perſon, and make their demands; whereof a Charter was produced, that had been formerly granted in King Henry the firſt's time. Whereupon coming to the King after Chriſtmas, lying then in the New Temple, and acquainting him with their Demands, he gives them this fair Anſwer, that within a few daies he would give them ſatisfaction; and cauſeth the Biſhops of Canterbury and Ely, with William Marſhal, Earl of Glocester to paſs their words for him that it ſhould be performed. But the King meaning nothing leſs then to do as he ſaid, falls preſently a levying of Souldiers, which the Lords underſtanding, they all did the like; and going to the Biſhop of Canterbury, deliver him a Copy of their Demands, and requiring the Kings Anſwer: But the Biſhop ſhewing it to the King, and humbly intreating him to give the Lords a ſatisfactory Anſwer, he ſwore a great Oath, they might as well demand the Kingdom; and that he would die before he would yield to any ſuch demands. Whereupon the Lords (knowing now what they were to truſt to) fall to beſiege Northampton, and after that, Bedford, which is yielded to them; and withall they are ſent to by the Londoners to ſignifie their readineſs to joyn with them. At this time the King was at Windſor providing an Army, but hearing

King John's Army defeated by the French, and thereupon a Truce.

The Lords require their ancient Liberties.

They deliver him a copy of their demands.

The King reſolutely refuſeth to grant them.

the Londoners were joyned with the Lords, he thought it no good way to proceed by force, but rather by fraud: and thereupon ſends to the Lords, that if they would come to him to Windſor, he would grant their demands. The Lords coming thither, but in a Military manner, (for they durſt not truſt his word) the King ſaluted them all kindly, and promiſed to give them ſatisfaction in all they demanded; and ſo in a Meadow between Windſor and Stanes, called Running mead, he freely conſented to confirm their former Liberties: and was content ſome grave perſonages ſhould be choſen to ſee it performed. But the next day, when it ſhould be done, he gets him gone to Southampton, and from thence to the Iſle of Wight; where adviſing with his Council, what in this caſe was fitteſt to be done, It was concluded he ſhould ſend to the Pope, to acquaint him with this mutiny of the Lords, and to require his help: while the King in the mean time lived skulking up and down in corners, that no man might know where to finde him: or which is worſe (as ſome write) roving about and practicing Piracy. And now the Lords begin to ſuſpect fraud, when ſhortly after the Kings meſſengers who were Walter and John, Biſhops of Worceſter and Norwich, return with the Popes Decree; which was, that the Kings grant to the Lords ſhould be void. With this Decree, the King after three moneths that he had ſtayed in the Iſle of Wight, coming back to Windſor, acquaints the Lords; but they accuſing the Meſſengers for falſe informing the Pope, and the Pope alſo for making a Decree without hearing both ſides, betake them to Arms, and ſware by the holy Altar to be revenged for this ludification and injurious dealing. The King finding the Lords nothing moved with the Popes Decree, ſends again unto him, to acquaint him with it; who mightily incenſed to have his Decree ſo ſlighted, adjudgeth then all to be held as enemies of Religion: and gives power to Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the Abbot of Reading to Excommunicate them. In the mean time the King had ſent the Biſhop of Worceſter, Chancellour of England, and others with his Seal, to hire Souldiers from the parts beyond the Seas; who returning ſhortly after, bringeth along with him out of Poicton and Gaſcony, Savery de Malcon, Geoffry and Oliver Boteville, Brothers; and under their conduct ſo great a rable, that with theſe Forces, within half a year the King had gotten all the Caſtles of the Barons, to the borders of Scotland. And now he divides his Army, committing part of it to his Brother William, Earl of Salisbury, and others to ſet upon London; and with the other part he goes himſelf into Yorkshire, where moſt of the Lords had poſſeſſion, which in moſt cruel manner he deſtroyed with fire and ſword. The Lords being thus on all ſides diſtreſſed, reſolve upon a courſe, neither honourable nor ſafe; yet ſuch as neceſſity made ſeem both: they ſend to Philip King of France, requiring him to ſend over his Son Lewis to their aid, and promiſing they would ſubmit themſelves to be governed by him, and take him for their Soveraign. To this motion of the Lords, King Philip was as forward as themſelves; which King John underſtanding, ſends

The King promiſeth to grant his Lords their demands.

He ſends to the Pope for help.

The Lords take Arms.

King John with the aid of ſtrangers gets all the Barons Caſtles.

The Lords ſend for the King of France his Son Lewis come and be their King.

ſends again to the Pope, requiring him to uſe his authority to ſtay the King of France from coming. But King Philip, though much regarding the requeſt of the Pope, yet nothing ſo much as the acqueſt of England, with all ſpeed provides an Army; and with a fleet of ſix hundred ſail, ſends over his Son Lewis: who paſſing into England, landeth at Sandwich, whither many of the Lords and others reſort unto him; and giving Oaths of Allegiance, joyns themſelves with him. King John at that time was at Dover, but not daring to ſtay there for fear of the enemy, he commits the Caſtle to Hubert Burgh, and goeth himſelf to Canterbury; and from thence to Wincheſter in the manner of a flight: which Prince Lewis underſtanding, went ſtraight to London, and by a plauſible Oration makes that City ſure unto him: and thither came to him the King of Scots with an Army of choice Souldiers, as alſo the Earls, Warren, Arundel, Salisbury, with many others. And now Prince Lewis paſſeth all the Countrey over without reſiſtance, but not without infinite outrages committed by his Souldiers, which was not in him to hinder: and then coming to Norwich, he takes that City eaſily, but Dover coſt him a longer ſiege, as being defended by the valiant and loyal Captain Hubert Burgh. In this mean while King John finding his enemies imployed in theſe difficult ſieges, ſends about and gathers a rabble of all raskal people to him; and with them runneth over all the Countrey, ſpoyling and killing in moſt barbarous manner. And now was the Kingdom made the Stage of all the miſeries of rapine and cruelty, two Armies in it on foot at once, each of them ſeeking to prey upon the other, and both of them upon the Countrey. But the King coming to Walpoole in Norfolk, where the Waſhes were to be paſſed over, he ſendeth one to ſearch where the Foord was paſſable, and there himſelf with ſome few paſſed over; but the multitude, with all the carriages, paſſing without order, they cared not where, were all drowned: with which diſaſter, the King through anguiſh of minde fell into a Feaver, whereof within a few daies he died. And here was an end of all the troubleſs of this King: In whom it is obſervable, that loving his eaſe ſo well as he did, he ſhould run voluntarily into ſuch troubles, eſpecially at home, upon ſo ſmall occaſions as he did; but it ſhould ſeem there is no greater hinderance to men for accompliſhing their will, then their own wilfulneſs.

1216.

Prince Lewis comes into England, and is received by the Lords; And by the city of London.

King John through anguiſh of minde falls ſick and dieth.

Of his Taxations.

TO ſpeak of his Taxations, it may not unproperly be ſaid that it was but one continued Taxation all his reign through; yet to divide it into two parts: his firſt was the Taxation of three ſhillings upon every Plough-land through the Kingdom, to pay the thirty thouſand Marks, for his Neece Blanches Portion; and to mend this Taxation, he ſeiſeth upon all the Temporalties of his Brother Geoffry Archbiſhop of York, for oppoſing it; and for a continuation, he makes a progreſs ſhortly after, into all the North-parts, where he exacts great Fines of offenders in his Forreſts. Very ſhortly after, ſolicited by the Popes Legate, he grants a Subſidy of the fortieth part of all his Subjects Revenues for one year, to ſuccour the Holy Land. Shortly after this, he chargeth his Earls and Barons with the loſſes he ſuſtained in France; and thereupon Fines them to pay the ſeventh part of all their Goods: neither ſpared he the Church, or the Commons in this Impoſition. Before this year is ended, another Leavy is made at a Parliament in Oxford, wherein is granted two Marks and a half of every Knights Fee, for Military aid; neither are the Clergy exempted from paying their part. And before another year is out, another Impoſition is laid of the thirteenth part of all moveables and other Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. It may be reckoned among his Taxations, that when the Monks of Canterbury had diſpleaſed him about the Election of their Archbiſhop, he ſeiſed upon all their Goods, and converted them to his own uſe: and preſently after this, upon the like diſpleaſure he deputes many Biſhopricks, Abbeys and Priories into the hands of Lay-men, and confiſcates all their Revenues. To theſe may be added, that he took eleven thouſand Marks of Silver, of the King of Scots, for granting him peace. Add to theſe alſo great ſums of money exacted and gathered from the Jews, among whom there was one that would not be ranſomed, till the King cauſed every day one of his great teeth to be pulled out by the ſpace of ſeven dayes; and then he was content to give the King ten thouſand Marks of ſilver that no more might be pulled out, for he had but one left. Add to theſe, that at his return out of Ireland, he ſummoned all the Prelates of the Kingdom to appear before him; of whom he extorted for their redemption, the ſum of an hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Add laſtly to theſe that at his return out of Wales, he exacts of every Knight that attended him not in that expedition, two Marks.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE was the firſt that appointed the Forms of Civil Government in London, and other Cities, endowing them alſo with their greateſt Franchiſes. The firſt that cauſed ſterling mony to be here coined. The firſt that ordained the honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earls. The firſt that ſettled the rates and meaſures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and ſuch other neceſſaries of Commerce. The firſt that planted Engliſh Laws and Officers in Ireland. The firſt that enlarged the Royal ſtyle with the Lord of Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdom, and faſtened Wales to the Crown of England.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

AFter the death of Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Monks of that Covent ſecretly in the night, elected one Reginald their Subprior to ſucceed him; and cauſed him to go to Rome for confirmation: but afterward doubting how the King would take it, being done without his knowledge, they crave leave of the the King to chuſe a fit man, the King is content to allow them the election, but requires himſelf to have the Nomination, and thereupon commends unto them John Grey Biſhop of Norwich, whom he ſpecially favoured, and accordingly the Monks elect him. But the matter being afterward referred to the Pope, which of theſe two elections ſhould ſtand good, after many allegations of both ſides, the Pope to ſhew himſelf indifferent to both, diſallows them both, and nominates a third man, one Stephen Langton, Cardinal of St. Chryſogone, an Engliſh man born, and a man of great learning. The Monks admit him, but the King oppoſeth it. And now as it were, a Prize began to be played between the two Swords, the Spiritual and the Temporal: but he that uſed the Spiritual Sword, proved ſo much the better Fencer, that he diſarmed the other, and took away his Temporal Sword from him. It is true, in the firſt Venue, the King gave the Pope as good as he brought; for as the Pope threatned the King to Excommunicate him, and to interdict the Kingdom: ſo the King threatned the Pope to nullifie his authority, and to baniſh the Clergy men out of the Realm. In the ſecond Venue, as the Pope acted as much as he had threatned, (for he interdicted the Kingdom:) So the King performed as much as he had ſpoken; (for he drove the Monks out of their Cloiſters) yet at laſt when Pandulphus the Popes Legate came into England, and made appear to the King in what great danger he ſtood; Firſt, of the King of France, by Invaſion; and then of his own Subjects, by Rebellion; for both which, there was no other help but reconcilement with the Pope; he ſo touched him to the quick, that he made him leave his great words, and fall to asking forgiveneſs. So as taking off the Crown from his head, he laid it down at Pandulphus feet, to be diſpoſed of, as the Pope ſhould pleaſe. And Pandulphus ſtuck not to take up his Crown, and to keep it three or four dayes in his hands before he reſtored it; and did not then neither, but upon condition that he and his Succeſſors ſhould hold the Kingdom of the See of Rome, at the annual tribute of a Thouſand Marks. And all thoſe three or four dayes, in which Pandulphus kept the Crown, it might be truly ſaid the Kingdom was without a King. And upon this, no doubt it was that Peter an Hermit in a Prophetical Rapture had given out ſome time before, that by Aſcenſion day, there ſhould be no King of England. Which though in ſome ſort it was true, yet becauſe in ſome ſort it was not true; and it was in the Prerogative of the King to make his own interpretation, it coſt the poor Hermit and his Son their lives, and they remain as a pillar of Salt, to make men take heed of Ludere cum Sanctis, and of playing the Criticks in matters of State.

Peter the Hermites prediction of no King to be in England by a certain day.

The Kingdom Interdicted ſix years together.

But by this means the Kingdom was releaſed of the Interdiction, which had continued ſix years, three months, and fourteen dayes: During all which time, there was no publique exerciſe of Religion; no Churches open, no Eccleſiaſtical Sacraments adminiſtred, but only to them that are in danger of death, and baptiſm to children, all that died were buryed like Dogs in Ditches and corners, but only ſuch as had purchaſed or procured licence from the Pope.

In this Kings reign, Saint Dominick continued his preaching ten years together againſt the Albigenſes; ſo called becauſe they began firſt in the City of Alba. Alſo in his time Saint Francis renounced the World; and when a Prieſt to whom he offered it, would not take his money, he caſt it away, and entred into a vow of perpetual poverty. Alſo in this Kings time, was held the Lateran Council, under Pope Innocent the third, in which was eſtabliſhed the Popes power over Princes, and in matters of Faith, Auricular Confeſſion, and Tranſubſtantiation.

Of his Irreligion.

I Need not relate a Speech of his, though very unchriſtian, that having been a little before reconciled to the Pope, and then taking an overthrow in France, in great anger he cryed out, that nothing had proſpered with him ſince the time he was reconciled to God and the Pope. Nor another ſpeech of his, which though ſpoken merrily, was in good earneſt very irreligious, that being on a time a hunting, at the opening of a fat Buck, he ſaid: See how this Deer hath proſpered, and how fat he is, and yet I dare ſwear he never heard Maſs: It is ſufficient to relate one act of his, (if it be true which ſome write) that being in ſome diſtreſs, he ſent Thomas Hardington and Ralph Fitz-Nichols Knights, in Embaſſage to Miramumalim King of Africk and Morocco, with offer of his Kingdom to him, upon condition he would come and aid him; and that if he prevailed, he would himſelf become a Mahometan, and renounce the Chriſtian Faith. Though ſome there be that ſay, All theſe were but falſe criminations charged upon him by Monks that did not love him. But though we believe not theſe things of him: yet to ſuffer his Kingdom to ſtand interdicted ſo many years together, upon ſo ſmall occaſion as he did, was certainly no good ſign of Religion in him. Yet one act he did, wherein he ſhewed a reſpect to Religion, by the honour he did to Religious man. For Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln, lying very ſick, he not only went to viſit him; but being dead was one of the three Kings, (the other two were William King of Scotland and the King of Southwales,) that carryed his Herſe upon their ſhoulders, till they delivered it to the Peers, and the Peers afterward to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops to carry it into the Quire.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

YEt did this King leave more works of Piety behinde him, then all his Subjects that were in his time. For he founded the Abbey of Bowley in the new Foreſt in Hampſhire: alſo an Abbey of black Monks in the City of Wincheſter, and the Monaſtery of Farindon, and the Monaſtery of Hales-Owen in Shropſhire: he re-edified Godſtow and Wroxel, and enlarged the Chappel of Knarisborough. Now for his Subjects, only Richard Prior of Bermondſey builded an Houſe againſt the wall of the ſaid houſe of Bermondſey, called Almar yor Hoſpital of Converts and Children, in honour of St. Thomas. In this Kings time St. Mary Overies in Southwark was begun to be builded, and the Stone Bridge over the Thames, was by the Merchants of London finiſhed. Alſo Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Founded a Monaſtery at Weſt Derham in Norfolk, which upon the diſſolution came to the family of the Derhams, who hold it to this day.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN this Kings time, five and thirty of the moſt ſubſtantial Citizens of London, were choſen out, and called the Council of the City, and the King gave the City liberty to alter their Maior and Sheriffs every year, which before continued during life. He cauſed the Laws of England to be executed in Ireland, and money to be coined there according to the weight of Engliſh money.

Of his Wives and Children.

KIng John lived to have three Wives. His firſt was Alice Daughter of Hubert Earl of Morton, who left him a Widower without iſſue. His ſecond was Avice Daughter and Heir of Robert Earl of Gloceſter, by whom no iſſue neither; divorced from her by reaſon of Conſanguinity in the third degree. His third Wife was Iſabel Daughter and Heir of Aymer Earl of Angouleſm, affianced before to Hugh le Brun, Earl of March. By this Wife he had two Sons, Henry and Richard, and three Daughters, Jone, Eleanor, and Iſabel: Henry ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; Richard was Earl of Cornwall, and Crowned King of the Romans, and had iſſue Henry and John, that dyed without iſſue: alſo Edward Earl of Cornwal, and others. Jone his eldeſt Daughter marryed to Alexander the ſecond, King of Scots, dyed without iſſue. Eleanor the ſecond Daughter (marryed to Simon Earl of Leiceſter) had iſſue, Henry, Simon, Almarick, Guy, Richard, and Eleanor. Henry ſlain without iſſue. Simon Earl of Bigorre, and anceſtour to a Family of the Mountfords in France. Almarick, firſt a Prieſt, after a Knight. Guy Earl of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountfords in Tuſcany, and of the Earls of the Campo Bacchi in the Kingdom of Naples. Richard, remaining privily in England, and changing his name from Mountford to Wellsbourn, was anceſtour of the Wellesbourns in England. Eleanor, born in England, brought up in France, married into Wales, to Prince Lewis ap Griffith. Iſabel, his youngeſt Daughter, marryed to the Emperour Frederick the ſecond, had iſſue, Henry, appointed to be King of Sicily, and Margaret Wife of Albert Lantgrave of Thurin. She dyed in Childbed, after ſhe had been Empereſs ſix years. He had alſo two natural Sons, Geoffry Fitz-Roy, and Richard, that married the Daughter and Heir of Fulbert de Dover, (who built Childham Caſtle) and had iſſue by her, of whom ſome Families of good account are deſcended. Alſo one baſe Daughter named Jone, married to Lewellin Prince of Wales.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of ſtature indifferent tall, and ſomething fat, of a ſowre and angry countenance; and concerning his conditions, it may be ſaid, that his Nature and his Fortune did not well agree: For naturally he loved his eaſe, yet his Fortune was to be ever in action. He won more of his enemies by ſurprizes then by battels, which ſhews that he had more of Lightning in him then of Thunder. He was never ſo true of his word as when he threatned, becauſe he meant always as cruelly as he ſpake, not alwayes as graciouſly; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to perform, muſt have looked upon his promiſes. He was neither fit for Proſperity nor Adverſity: For proſperity made him inſolent, and adverſity dejected; a mean fortune would have ſuted beſt with him. He was all that he was by Fits; Sometimes doing nothing without deliberation, and ſometimes doing all upon a ſudden: Sometimes very Religious, and ſometimes ſcarce a Chriſtian. His unſatiableneſs of money was not ſo much, as that no man knew what he did with it; gotten with much noiſe, but ſpent in ſilence: He was but intemperate in his beſt temper, but when diſtempered with ſickneſs moſt of all, as appeared at his laſt; when being in a Feaver, he would needs be eating of raw Peaches, and drinking of ſweet Ale. If we look upon his works, we muſt needs think him a worthy Prince; but if upon his actions, nothing leſs: For his works of Piety were very many, as hath been ſhewed before; but as for his actions, he neither came to the Crown by Juſtice, nor held it with honour, nor left it in Peace. Yet having had many good parts in him, and eſpecially having his Royal Poſterity continued to this day, we can do no leſs but honour his memory.

King John's intemperance.

Caſualties that happened in his time.

ONe Caſualty we might count diſaſtrous, if it had not had relation to our ſelves: for Hugh de Bones coming to aid King John with threeſcore thouſand out of Britain and Flanders, by misfortune at Sea were all drowned, to whom the King had granted Norfolk and Suffolk for the people he had brought with him to inhabit. In this Kings time were great thunders and lightnings, and ſhowers with hail-ſtones as big as Gooſe-eggs. Fiſhes of ſtrange ſhape were taken in England, armed with helmets and ſhields, and were like unto armed Knights, ſaving that they were far greater in proportion. About Maidſtone in Kent a certain Monſter was found ſtrucken with the lightning, which Monſter had a head like an Aſſe, a belly like a man, and all other parts far differing from any other creature. Alſo in Suffolk was taken a fiſh in form like to a man, and was kept ſix months upon land with raw fleſh and fiſh; and then, for that they could have no ſpeech of it, they caſt it into the Sea again.

A ſtrange Monſter.

Of his Death and Burial.

WHen Prince Lewis of France was come into England, and was received by the Lords and by the Londoners, King John with an Army went into the North-parts; and coming to Walpool, where he was to paſs over the Waſhes, he ſent one to ſearch where the water was paſſable, ſable, and there himſelf with ſome few paſſeth over, but the multitude with all his Carriages and Treaſure paſſing without order they cared not where, were all drowned. With the grief of which diſaſter, and perhaps diſtempered in his body before, he fell into a Feaver, and was let blood; but keeping an ill diet, (as indeed he never kept good) eating green Peaches, and drinking ſweet Ale, he fell into a looſenſs, and grew preſently ſo weak, that there was much ado to get him to Newark, where ſoon after he dyed. Though indeed it be diverſly related; Caxton ſaith, he was poyſoned at Swineſheads Abbey by a Monk of that Covent; the manner and cauſe this. The King being there, and hearing it ſpoken how cheap corn was, ſhould ſay, he would ere long make it dearer, and make a penny loaf be ſold for a ſhilling. At this ſpeech the Monk took ſuch indignation, that he went and put the poyſon of a Toad into a cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him there was ſuch a cup of Wine as he had never drunk in all his life: and therewithal took the aſſay of it himſelf, which made the King to drink the more boldly of it; but finding himſelf preſently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him, that he was fallen down dead; then (ſaith the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much. Others ſay the poyſon was given him in a diſh of Pears. But the Phyſitian that diſ-bowelled his body found no ſign of poyſon in it, and therefore not likely to be true. But howſoever the manner of his death be uncertain, yet this is certain, that at this time and place he dyed, on the 19 day of October, in the year 1216. when he had reigned ſeventeen years and ſix moneths; lived one and fifty. He was buryed, his bowels at Croxton Abbey, his body at Worceſter, under the High Altar, wrapped in a Monks Cowl, which the ſuperſtition of that time accounted ſacred, and a defenſative againſt all evil ſpirits.

King John thought by ſome to be poyſoned.

A monks cowl of great vertue.

Of the Prices of things in his time.

NEither is this unfit to be recorded in Chronicles, to the end compariſon may be made between the time paſt and the preſent: as in the time of King Henry the ſecond, a Quarter of Wheat was ſold for twelve pence, a Quarter of Beans or Oats for a groat. Neither is the price of ſilver it ſelf much leſs altered; for an ounce of ſilver was then valued at twenty pence, which is now valued at leaſt at five ſhillings. Whereof Philoſophers muſt tell the reaſon; for ſeeing ſcarcity makes things dear? why ſhould not plenty make them cheap?

Of Men of ſpecial Note in his time.

IN Military matters there were many famous men in his time, as Robert Fitz-Roger, and Richard Mount-Fitchet, with many others; but chiefly two, whoſe acts make them ſpecially memorable: the one was Hubert Burgh, whom King John had left Governour of Dover-Caſtle; of whom it is related, that when Prince Lewis of France came to take the Town, and found it difficult to be taken by force, he ſent to Hubert, whoſe Brother Thomas he had taken Priſoner a little before; that unleſs he would ſurrender the Caſtle, he ſhould preſently ſee his Brother Thomas be put to death with exquiſite torments before his eyes: but this threatning moved not Hubert at all, who more regarded his own loyalty, then his Brothers life. Then Prince Lewis ſent again, offering him a great ſum of money; but neither did this move but he kept his loyalty as inexpugnable as his Caſtle. The other was Robert Fitz-Water, of whom it is related, that King John being with an Army in France, one of his Knights in a great bravery, would needs make a challenge to any of the French Camp, that durſt encounter him in a Combat; when preſently comes forth this Robert Fitz-Water, and in the encounter threw Horſe and Man down to the ground: whereof when King John heard, By Gods tooth (ſaith he) he were a King indeed that had ſuch a Champion; whereupon ſome that ſtood by, ſaying to him, He is Sir, a ſervant of your own, it is Robert Fitz-Water, whom you have baniſhed. Whereupon his ſentence of baniſhment was preſently reverſed, and the King received him, as he well deſerved, into ſpecial favour. In matter of Literature alſo there lived many famous men in this Kigns reign; as Geoffry Vineſauſe, Simon Fraxinus, aliàs Aſh, Adam Dorenſis, John de Oxford, Colman ſurnamed the Wiſe, Richard Canonicus, William Peregrine; Alane Tewksbury, Gervaſius Dorobernenſis, John Hanwill, Nigel Worker, Gilbert Holland, Benet de Peterborough, William Parvus a Monk of Newburgh, Roger Hoveden, Hubert Walter Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander Theologus, Gervaſius Tilburienſis, Gyraldus Cambrenſis, Johannes Devonius, Walter Mapis, Radulphus de Diceto, Gilbert Legly, Mauricius Morganius, John de Fordeham, William Leiceſter, Joceline Brakeland, Roger of Crowland, Hugh White, alias Candidus, who wrote an Hiſtory, intituled, Hiſtoria Petroburgenſis? John de Saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray, an Hiſtoriographer, and Biſhop of Norwich, Walter of Coventry, Radulphus Niger, and laſtly Simon Thurvay, who for his pride in Learning, but more for his blaſphemies againſt Moſes and Chriſt, became at laſt ſo utterly ignorant, that hardly he could read a letter of the Book. One yet remains that muſt not be forgotten, Hugo Carthuſianus Biſhop of Lincoln, whoſe Miracles, as Matthew Pariſ. writes, made him famous in thoſe dayes: and the Works he hath left behind him, famous in theſe.

To this time the City of London had been governed by two Bailiffs, but the King in his tenth year taking diſpleaſure againſt them for denying his Purveyers wheat, cauſed them to be impriſoned, till 35 of the chief Citizens repaired to him, and acquainting him what ſmall ſtore the City had, how the Commons were ready to make inſurrection about it, he was then ſatisfied; and moreover at their ſuit, granted them to have a Maior and two Sheriffs to be yearly choſen nine dayes before Michaelmas; which Order hath continued, though with ſome alteration in the time of their Election, to this day. THE

The LIFE and REIGN of KING HENRY THE THIRD.

Of his coming to the Crown, and of Acts done in his Minority.

An. Dom. 1216.

KING John being dead, his eldeſt Son Henry was next to ſucceed: who being but nine years old, though he were capable of having his Right; yet he was ſcarce capable of underſtanding his right; eſpecially there being another at that time, to whom a great part of the Kingdom had ſworn Allegiance. But thoſe Lords who had been conſtant to the Father, notwithſtanding his faults, were more tender of the Son, who was altogether innocent, and whoſe gracious aſpect gave no ſmall hope of a better diſpoſition. Amongſt all which Lords, there was none ſo eminent in worthineſs, none ſo near him in Alliance, as William Marſhal, Earl of Pembroke, who had married his Aunt; and he drawing the reſt of the Lords together, with a ſolemn Oration, in behalf of the young Prince, ſo confirmed them, and ſo ordered the matter, that on the twenty eighth day of October, in the year 1216. he was Crowned at Gloceſter, by Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Joceline Biſhop of Bathe, in the preſence of Gualo the Popes Legate, and many Lords and Biſhops. Where beſides the Oath uſually taken by all Kings at their Coronation, to bear reverence and honour to God, and to his holy Church, and to do right and juſtice to all his people, he did homage beſides to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for his Kingdom of England and Ireland; and took his Oath for the true payment of the thouſand Marks which his Father had granted to the Church of Rome. This done, William Earl of Pembroke, by a general conſent was aſſigned Protector of the Realm during the Kings minority. In which place, the firſt thing he did, was to give notice of the new Kings Coronation to all the Countries round about; and proclaim pardon to all offenders that within a time limited ſhould come and ſubmit themſelves to him. In the mean time Prince Lewis of France, who at his hearing of King John's death, thought himſelf then ſure of enjoying the Kingdom quietly, and that he ſhould need to fear no more oppoſition; now that he hears of the new Kings Crowning, and that ſo ſolemnly, and with ſo unanimous a conſent, he begins to think himſelf in worſe caſe then before: and to grow jealous of the Engliſh Lords that had adhered to him, what they would do in this new world. And indeed a conflict was already grown in their mindes, which of the two obligations ſhould be the greater; either that of their Oath to Prince Lewis: or that of their Allegiance to King Henry. They could not but think it extream ungratefulneſs to forſake Prince Lewis, whom they had themſelves invited to come; and they could not but think it extream undutifulneſs to ſtand out in oppoſition againſt King Henry their natural Sovereign. And that which added no ſmall weight to this ſcale, was a diſcovery lately made by the Viſcount Melon a French Lord, at the time of his death, who confeſſed, as a matter of conſcience, that Prince Lewis had vowed, if once he got the Kingdom, utterly to extirpate all the Engliſh Nobility, and to admit none but French to any place of Dignity. Neither was it perhaps the leaſt cauſe that moved many to leave the party of Prince Lewis, that Gualo the Popes Legat had threatned to Excommunicate him, and as many as ſhould adhere unto him. But whether any of theſe reaſons, or any other were their motives, certain it is, that many of them, of whom were principal, the Earls of Arundel, Warren, Salisbury, and William the eldeſt Son of the Protector, ſhrunk from Prince Lewis, and went to King Henry, as thinking no obligation ſo great as Allegiance: And many again continued conſtant to Prince Lewis, as thinking no obligation ſo great as an Oath. And now Prince Lewis, to caſt the dice of fortune, before his Enemies, though they had gotten them a Head, ſhould gather to a head, and draw more forces together, ſtaying himſelf at London, ſent his Lieutenants with an Army of twenty thouſand, to take in as many Towns as they could; and many they took with ſmall oppoſition: but coming to Lincoln, where though they had the Town it ſelf, yet the Caſtle ſtood out, and had been defended by a Noble Lady a whole year before, they found ſuch reſiſtance, that their proceeding was there arreſted. For thither came preſently William the Protector, with his Son William, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Salisbury, and Cheſter; the Earls of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Albemarle, William de Albinet, William de Cantilup, Faucaſius, Thomas Baſſet, Robert Vipont, Brent de Liſle, Geoffry Lacy, and many other Barons, with all the power of the young King; who with wonderful violence aſſault the City. At which time it was propounded by the French, to ſally forth and give them Battel, but conceiving their Army to be greater then indeed it was (for the Engliſh had ſet double Enſigns to every Company, which which made a ſhew of twice as many as they were) they forbear that courſe, and kept themſelves within the Town: by which means being cooped up, and ſtraitned in place, ſo as they could not make uſe of their Forces, as otherwiſe they might, they were in concluſion all defeated; and all the principal men of the Engliſh that had adhered to Prince Lewis, were taken Priſoners: as namely, Saer, Earl of Winchester, Henry de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt, lately made Earl of Lincoln, by Prince Lewis; Robert Fitz-Water, Richard Mount Fitchet, William Mowbray, William Beauchamp; Williams Mandet, Oliver Harcourt, Roger de Creſſey, William Colvile, William de Ros, Robert de Ropeſley, Ralph Chenduit, Barons; beſides four hundred Knights, or men at Arms. Only the Earl of Perch their General, being compaſſed about, and willed to render himſelf, ſwore he would never become a priſoner to any Engliſh: and thereupon was run through the ſight of his Helmet into the Brains, and inſtantly died. This was a main blow to Prince Lewis, and the laſt of his Battels in England; and becauſe the City was very rich in Merchandiſe, the Engliſh in deriſion called it Lewis Fair. But Prince Lewis was not yet diſcouraged, for he had ſent to King Philip his Father to ſend him new ſupplies out of France; and new ſupplies were indeed ſent: but Hubert de Burgh, Governour of Dover, being as vigilant as he was valiant, watched their coming, and in a Sea-fight defeated them all, of whom but few eſcaped. And now this blow at Sea was ſo much greater then that at Land; that where that made him only doubt, this made him deſpair, at leaſt made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by compoſition. Whereupon it was at laſt concluded, that Prince Lewis ſhould have fifteen thouſand Marks for the charges he had been at, and abjure his claim to any intereſt in the Kingdome; and withal to work his Father for reſtitution of ſuch Provinces in France as appertained to this Crown: and that when himſelf ſhould be King, he ſhould reſign them in a peaceable manner. On the other part, King Henry takes his Oath; and from him the Legate Guallo, and the Protector, to reſtore unto the Barons of the Realm, and other his Subjects of all their Rights and Priviledges, for which the diſcord began between the late King and his People. After this Prince Lewis is honourably attended to Dover, and departs out of England about Michaelmas, above two years after his firſt arrival.

And now the Kingdom is come to unity within it ſelf, one King and one People; and for a year or two there was but little to be done, only ſome few there were, whom the corruption of the times had engendred, and who being born in a ſtorm, could not live in a calm; of whom the principal were the Earl of Albemarle, Robert de Vipount, Fowke de Brent, Brian de Liſle, and Hugh de Baliol. Who buſtling about, got poſſeſſion of Caſtles: with what intention all men knew, but with what hope of effecting their intention, no man could imagine: for being but a handful of men to the Body of the Realm, they were eaſily ſuppreſſed; and either brought to acknowledge their faults, or elſe puniſhed for not acknowledging them. It was now the fourth year of King Henry's Reign; at which time William Earl of Pembroke, Protector of the Realm died, and was buried in the new Temple at London, in whoſe place came the Biſhop of Wincheſter. And now was the King the ſecond time Crowned, and had granted him by Parliament for Eſcuage, two Marks of Silver, of every Knights Fee, for the Affairs of the Kingdom, and recovery of his Tranſmarine Dominions which is now deſigned: and Malleon de Saveroy, the Poictovin, with William Long-Sword, Earl of Salisbury, ſent over to try the affections of that people, whom they finde for the moſt part inclinable to the obedience of this Crown: but the King of France being required peaceably to deliver them, made anſwer, that having gotten them by the Sword, by the Sword he would hold them. But now the King being come to ſome years of underſtanding, was in a Parliament holden at London, put in minde by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, of the Oath he had taken for confirmation of the Liberties of the Kingdom; which though oppugned by ſome (and eſpecially by William Brewer, and Hubert de Burgh, whom the King had now made his chief Juſticiar) as having been an Act of conſtraint: yet the King then again ratified, and twelve Knights or other Legat men of every Shire, by Writs, were charged to examine what the Laws and Liberties were, which the Kingdom enjoyed under his Grandfather, and that they ſhould return them by a certain day: and here the King by Parliament reſumeth into his hands ſuch Alienations as had been made by his Anceſtors of any Crown Land. The next year after, another Parliament is held at Weſtminſter, wherein is required the fiftieth part of all the Moveables, both of the Clergy and Laity, for the recovery of thoſe parts in France, with-held from the Crown by Lewis, now King, contrary to his Oath and Promiſe made here in England at his departure; which though it concerned the Honour and Dignity of the Kingdom, and the Eſtates of moſt of the Nobility; yet would it be yielded to, but upon confirmation of their Liberties, which in the end was obtained, in the ſame words and form as King John had granted them in the two Charters before: and twelve Knights are choſen in every Shire to diſpart the old Foreſts from the new, and the new to be laid open and ploughed, and improved, to the great comfort and benefit of the Subject; and two years they were accordingly enjoyed.

An. Reg. 4. 1220.

The Protector dieth.

In his place the Biſhop of Wincheſter is choſen.

King Henry is the ſecond time Crowned.

King Henry confirms the Liberties of the Kingdom.

He reſumeth crown Land.

An. Reg. 9. 1225.

He confirms the two Chatters granted by King John, Magna Charta, and Charta Foreſtæ.

Of his Acts after he came to be of age.

Some Lords ſtand out ſtill.

IT was now the tenth year of King Henry's Reign, and being about nineteen years of age, he claimed to take the government of the Kingdom into his own hands, and no longer to be under a Protector; and now will preſently appear the difference between a Prince that is ruled by good Counſel, and a Prince that will do all of himſelf, and take no advice. For thirteen years he was ruled by a Protector, all paſſed as it were in a calm, without noiſe or clamour; but as ſoon as he took upon him the Government himſelf, there grew preſently ſtorms an dtumults; no quietneſs either to the Subject or

An. Re. 10. 1146.

He takes the Government upon himſelf.

or to himself: nothing but grievances all the long time of his Reign. For at the Parliament now holden at Oxford, as soon as he was Crowned again, he presently cancels and annuls the Charter of the Forests, as granted in his Nonage; and therefore he not bound to observe it: and then not using any longer the Seal which the Protector had used, he makes a new, and causeth Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would enjoy any benefit of Grants under his Seal, should come and have them signed by his new Seal; by which course he drew much money from many: and this was the first grievance.

He annuls the Charters which he had granted before.

He makes a new Seal.

Shortly after, he commits the keeping of Barkhamstead Castle, to one Walleran a Dutchman, which Castle belonged to his Brother Richard of Cornwal; but when Earl Richard required to have the possession, as of right he ought, it was then plotted by Hubert Burgh Chief Justice, and the Kings chief Counsellour, to commit him to prison; which the Earl understanding, or at least suspecting, flies presently to Marlborough, where he findes William Earl Marshal his vowed Friend, with whom he hastens to Stamford, and there meets with the Earls of Chester, Gloucester, Warren, Hereford, Ferrers, Warwick, and divers other Barons; who all confederate together, and send to the King, that unless he restore the Castle to his Brother, and to them the Liberties of Forests, which he had lately cancelled at Oxford, they would seek to recover them by the Sword. Hereupon King Henry to pacifie his Brother, not only renders the Castle to him, but gives him besides all that his Mother had in Dower; and also great possessions which the Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Boleign lately deceased, had in England: but to the Petition of the Lords he makes a dilatory answer: and this was another grievance.

The Lords confederate against K. Henry, and why.

Not long after King Henry is perswaded by Hugh le Brun, Earl of March, who had married his Mother, to make a Journey into France, for recovery of his right there: but the Earl perswaded it for ends of his own, which to have discovered, had been no way to compass them: He must therefore lay some colours upon his work; and it was colour enough that the action would be of great benefit to the King, if it might succeed; and the likelihood of succeeding was most apparent, by reason of the great inclination of the people to King Henry, and their great averseness from King Lewis. Upon these colours King Henry undertaking the action, raiseth great sums of money from the Clergy, and from the Londoners, for redemption of their Liberties, and takes the third part of all the Goods of the Jews: but when he returned home a year after, without having done any thing but spent his treasure and his time; and that which was more worth then both these, the lives of many Noble men and others; this was another grievance.

K. Henry makes a journey into France, but without success.

And now King Henry bringing many Poictovins over with him, who had served him in his Wars, he was to reward them here; which he could not do, but by displacing and spoil of his Officers. First therefore he calleth Ralph Breton Treasurer of his Chamber to account, and grievously fines him for defrauding him in his Office. Then likewise is Hubert de Burgh, chief Justitiar, and his chief Counsellour, called to account for such treasure as passed his Office; who being further charged with crimes of Treason, flies to the Church of Merton for sanctuary: from whence when the King commanded him to be drawn out by violence, the Bishop of London hearing of it, commanded him to be returned back to Sanctuary, upon pain of Excommunication: but the King commanding him to be kept from sustenance, hunger at last enforced him to render himself to the Kings mercy: all his goods which were very great, confiscate. Also Walter Bishop of Carlile is thrust out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Rodon Knight, from his place of Marshal of the Kings House; and all the chief Counsellors, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom are removed as distrusted; and only strangers preferred to their rooms. Of which course, Peter de Rupibus a Poictovin, Bishop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis, the Kings special Favourite, were said to be the Authors: and this was another grievance.

He displaceth many of his great Officers.

Poictovins placed in their rooms.

Nine years had thus passed, with divers grievances in his Government; and being now about eight or nine and twenty years old, a Consultation was had for a fit Wife for him. There was propounded a Sister of Alexander King of Scots, but it was not thought fit the King should marry the younger Sister, when Hubert de Burgh had married the elder: he therefore takes one of his own choosing, and marries Eleanor, daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence; by which match he neither had portion by his Wife, nor strength of alliance by Friends; or if any were, it was all made vain by distance; only he had by her a number of poor Kindred, who to his great cost lay hanging upon him: yet was the Marriage solemnized with as great charges as if he had been to have Mountains with her: and this was another grievance.

An. Reg. 19. 1235.

K. Henry marries to more charge then benefit.

And now is the score of these grievances called upon to be paid; for the Lords could no longer endure so many indignities, to see themselves slighted, and only strangers advanced, as Foulk de Brent, who held the Earldoms of Nottingham, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, and others the like: and to see their persons exposed to danger, and their estates to ruine; for which no remedy could be, but only the Kings confirming their Charter of Liberties: wherein it is strange to observe upon what different grounds the King and the Lords went. It seems the King thought that to confirm that Charter, were to make himself to be less then a King; and the Lords thought, that as long as it was denied, they were no better then slaves: and as the King could endure no diminution, so the Lords could endure no slavery; but the King might keep his own with sitting still, the Lords could not recover their own but by motion. And seeing their strength must be in their number, by commotion, hereupon they confederate together; and of his confederacy, Richard now Earl Marshal, upon the death of his Brother William, is chief; who repair to the King, and boldly shew him his errour, and require satisfaction. Hereupon the King sends presently

The Lords confederate again for their Charters.

The Lords ſummoned to a Parliament refuſe to come.

ſently over for whole Legions of Poictovins, and withal ſummons a Parliament at Oxford, whither the Lords refuſe to come. After this a Parliament is called at Weſtminſter, whither likewiſe they refuſe to come, unleſs the King would remove the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Poictovins from the Court: and more then this, they ſend him word, that unleſs he did this, they would expel both himſelf and his evil Counſellours out of the Land, and create a new King. Upon this threatning, Pledges are required of the Nobility for ſecuring their Allegiance, and Writs are ſent out to all who held by Knights-ſervice to repair to the King at Gloceſter by a certain day; which the Earl Marſhal and his aſſociates refuſing, the King without the judgement of his Court and their Peers, cauſeth them to be proclaimed Out-Laws, ſeiſeth upon all their Lands, which he gives to his Poictovins; and directs out Writs to attach their bodies whereſoever in the Kingdom. But now of theſe confederate Lords the Biſhop of Wincheſter won the Earls of Cheſter and Lincoln with a thouſand Marks; and the King had ſo pleaſed his Brother the Earl of Cornwal, that he likewiſe left them. Whereupon they withdrew into Wales, and confederate with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whither alſo came Hubert de Burgh, eſcaped out of Priſon, and joyns with them; taking intermutual Oaths, that no one without other ſhould make their accord. Hereupon the King goeth himſelf in perſon into Wales, where not prevailing, he returns to Gloceſter, implores new Forces of ſtrangers, but all without ſucceſs. At laſt a Frier is imployed to perſwade the Earl Marſhal to ſubmit himſelf to the King, but all in vain; till at length a train is laid to draw him over into Ireland, to defend his ſtate there, being ſeiſed upon by the King; where by treachery circumvented he loſt his life, Militiæ flos temporum modernorum, ſaith Matthew Paris. Yet the King diſavows the ſending of any ſuch Commiſſion into Ireland, proteſting he never knew thereof; and layes the fault upon his Officers. An eaſie way for Princes, never to be found in any fault.

They threaten to chuſe a new King.

The Lords proclaimed Out-laws, and their Eſtates ſeiſed.

Richard Earl Marſhal, by a train drawn into Ireland, is there by treachery ſlain.

After two years affliction, a Parliament is aſſembled at Weſtminſter, wherein the Biſhops admoniſh the King by his Fathers example, to be at unity with his people, and to remove from him ſtrangers, and to govern the Kingdom by Natives of the Realm, and by the Laws: otherwiſe they would proceed by Eccleſiaſtical cenſure, both againſt his Counſellours and himſelf. The King ſeeing no way to ſubſiſt but by temporizing, conſents to call home thoſe Lords out of Wales; reſtores them to their places and poſſeſſions; removes all ſtrangers from about him; and calls his new Officers to account. Hereupon the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Seagrave take Sanctuary; but afterward by mediation they obtained with great Fines their Liberty, dearly paying for their two years greatneſs. After this a Parliament is again called, which the King would have to be kept in the Tower, whither the Lords refuſing to come, another place of more freedom is appointed; in which Parliament, order is taken for removing all Sheriffs from their places, upon complaint of corruption: and here the King diſplaceth his Steward, and offers to take from the Biſhop of Chicheſter, then Chancellour, the great Seal, which he refuſeth to deliver, as having received it by the Common-Council of the Kingdom; and now Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Seagrave, are received again into grace, by which may appear the viciſſitude of fortune in Princes favours. After this, in the one and twentieth year of his Reign, another Parliament is held at London, where the King requires the thirteenth part of all the moveables as well of the Clergy as Laity; which being directly oppoſed, the King promiſeth by Oath, never more to injure the Nobility, ſo they would but relieve him at that preſent. After four dayes Conſultation, the King promiſing to uſe only the Counſel of his natural Subjects, and proteſting againſt the Revocation lately propounded, and freely granting the inviolable obſervation of their Liberties, under pain of Excommunication, a Subſidy is granted him; but ſo, that four Knights be appointed in every Shire to receive and deliver the ſame, either to ſome Abbey or Caſtle, where it may be ſafely kept; that if the King fail in performance of his Grants, it may be reſtored to the Countrey from whence it was collected. And now the King to make a ſhew of true reconciliation for his part, ſuddenly cauſes the Earls Warren and Ferrers, with John Fitz-Geoffry to be ſworn his Counſellours: yet was neither of the points either for removing of ſtrangers, or for diſpoſing the money obſerved afterward by the King; for the money he made bold to take at his pleaſure: and for ſtrangers they were ſo far from removing, that they were drawn nearer to him. For now William Valentine, Uncle to the Queen, is grown the moſt inward man with him, and nothing done but by his counſel; alſo the Earl of Provence, the young Queens Father, a poor Prince, had a good ſhare of the money that was collected: and Simon de Mountford, a French man born, is entertained by the King, and preferred ſecretly in marriage to Eleanor the Kings Siſter, widow of William Earl of Pembroke, the great Marſhal, and is made Earl of Leiceſter, by right of his Mother Avice, daughter of Blanchman Earl of Leiceſter: Which courſes ſo incenſe the Nobility, that it put them out into a new commotion; and Richard the Kings Brother becomes one of the party, whom the other Lords make their ſpokeſman to the King, to aggravate his breach of promiſe, and to acquaint him with all the diſorders of the Kingdom; with whoſe remonſtrance the King is ſo moved, that after he had tried the Londoners, and found them alſo to partake with the Lords, he calls a Parliament at London, whither the Lords came armed for their own ſafety: Where after long debating, the King taking his Oath to refer the matter to certain grave men of the Kingdom, Articles are drawn, ſealed, and publickly ſet up to the view of all, with the Seals of the Legate, and divers great men: but before it came to be effected, the Earl of Cornwal, by the working of Simon Mountford, hath his edge rebated, and is brought to be unwilling to meddle in the matter any more; which the other Lords ſeeing

The Biſhops threaten to excommunicate the King.

The King calls home the Lords and removes ſtrangers.

The Chancellour refuſeth to deliver the Seal.

Anno Dom. 1237. An. Reg. 21.

The King grants their Liberties, and thereupon hath a Subſidy granted, but with conditions.

But the conditions not performed.

The Lords thereupon confederate again.

They come armed to the Parliament.

ing, they alſo grew cold, and ſo for that time it reſted, and no more was done in it. About this time, a certain fanatick fellow, had got into the Kings Chamber in the night, having a naked knife in his hand, with a reſolved purpoſe to kill him: but finding him not there, (for the King lay that night with the Queen) he then went looking about to finde him out: but being taken and confeſſing, who were his complices, he was afterward drawn in pieces with wilde Horſes. So provident a care hath God to protect his Anointed.

An. Re. 22. 1238. The King oppreſſeth the Lords.

And now is the Kings turn to play his part in uſing his Authority, which he fails not to do to the uttermoſt; for upon a ſmall occaſion he cauſeth the Gates of Gilbert now Earl of Pembroke (the third ſon of William the great Marſhal) to be ſhut againſt him at Wincheſter: whereupon the Earl retires into the North. Alſo Simon Norman, Maſter of the Kings Seal, and his greateſt Favourite, is thrown out with diſgrace, and his Brother Geoffry a Knight Templar, is put out of the Council; both of them for not yielding to paſs a Grant from the King made unto Thomas Earl of Flanders, the Queens Uncle, of four pence upon every ſack of Wool. And now that load enough is laid upon thoſe of the Laity, comes a new load to be laid upon the Clergy. For the Pope nothing dainty to make uſe of the Power he had in the King, ſends over three hundred Romans, requiring to have the firſt Benefices that ſhould be vacant, beſtowed upon them: which ſeemed ſo unreaſonable a requeſt, and to the Clergy of England ſo damageable, that it made Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury to give over all, and betake himſelf to a voluntary exile in the Abbey of Pontiniac in France; yet to ſhew his reſpect to the Pope, gave him eight hundred Marks before his departure. And to lay more weight upon the Clergy, great ſums are alſo required of them for maintenance of the Popes Warre againſt the Emperour; which though the Clergy oppoſed, and ſhewed many good reaſons of their oppoſition both to the King and the Legat: yet by promiſes or threatnings, they were won or forced to yield unto it. And now comes the Earl of March, and once again ſolicits the King to make another journey into France; which being yielded to by the King, and aſſented to in Parliament, an aid preſently was demanded towards it: but this demand was not only oppoſed, but all the Kings Taxations and Aids before granted, were now repealed; and thereupon an abſolute denial to grant any more. Upon this, the King comes to the Parliament himſelf in perſon; earneſtly, and indeed, humbly craving their aid for this once: but all prevailed not, they had made a vow to the contrary; and the King is driven to get what he could of particular men, of whom partly by gift, and partly by loan, he gets ſo much, that he carries over with him thirty Barrels of Sterling money. This expedition had no better ſucceſs then the former; for after a whole years ſtay, the King was driven to make a diſhonourable Truce with the King of France, and return home. At his return he put the Jews to another redemption, and the Londoners to another exaction; and to help on his charge,

The Pope ſends over 300 Romans to have the the firſt Benefices vacant.

The King once again makes a Journey into France.

He comes to the Parliament to demand a Subſidy, but is denyed.

He returns out of France without ſucceſs.

his Wives Mother, the Counteſs of Provence, comes now to viſit him, who bringing her Daughter Zanchia with her, a marriage is ſolemnized between her and Richard Earl of Cornwal, whoſe Wife was lately dead, and he returned from the Holy Wars. The old Counteſs at her return, is preſented with many rich gifts, having beſides received an annual penſion of four thouſand Marks out of England, for five years paſt, in conſideration of a pact made, that King Henry after her deceaſe ſhould have the Earldom of Provence: but ſhortly after her return, ſhe diſappoints him of that, and beſtows it upon her youngeſt Daughter Beatrix, married to Charles the French Kings Brother, who was after King of Naples and Sicilie: ſo as this Counteſs lived to ſee all her four Daughters Queens: Richard Earl of Cornwal, coming after to be elected King of the Romans. Upon theſe profuſions, a conſultation is had for new ſupplies, and no way thought ſo fit as by Parliament; hereupon a Parliament is again aſſembled at Weſtminſter, whither the King comes again himſelf in perſon, urging his neceſſities; yet nothing would be granted without the aſſurance of reformation and due execution of the Laws. And here they deſire to have it ordained, that four of the moſt grave and diſcreet Peers ſhould be choſen as Conſervators of the Kingdom, and ſworn of the Kings Council, both to ſee Juſtice adminiſtred, and the treaſure iſſued; and theſe or two of them at leaſt, ſhould ever attend about the King. Alſo that the Lord Chief Juſticiar, and the Lord Chancellour ſhould be choſen by the general voices of the States aſſembled, or elſe be one of the number of thoſe four. Beſides they propound, that there might be two Juſtices of the Benches, two Barons of the Exchequer, and one Juſtice for the Jews; and thoſe likewiſe to be choſen by Parliament. But while theſe things were in debating, comes one Martin, a new Legat from the Pope, with a larger Commiſſion then ever any before, to exact upon the State; but at the ſame time, Letters coming from the Emperour Frederick, to entreat that the Pope might have no more ſupplies out of England, The Popes Mandate is rejected, and his Agent Martin diſgracefully ſent home. This buſineſs took up ſo much time, that nothing elſe was done in this Parliament, but only an aid granted to the King for the marriage of his Daughter to Alexander King of Scots; twenty ſhillings of every Knights Fee, and that with much ado, and repetition of his former aids.

The King again in perſon demands a Subſidy, but is denied, without granting the Lords demands.

That the Chief Juſtice and Lord Chancellour ſhould be choſen by the Parliament.

The Popes Legate for money rejected.

Aid to marry the Kings daughter granted.

The Winter following he aſſembles another Parliament, wherein he moves for an aid upon a deſign he had upon Wales, and to pay his debts, which were urged to be ſo great that he could not appear out of his Chamber for the infinite clamour of ſuch, to whom he owed for his Wine, Wax, and other neceſſaries of houſe; but they all to his face, refuſed to grant him any thing. Whereupon other violent courſes are taken, an ancient quarrel is found out againſt the City of London, for which they are commanded to pay fifteen thouſand Marks; and Paſſeleve the Clerk is imployed, with others, in a moſt peremptory Commiſſion, to enquire of all ſuch Lands as had been inforeſted, and either to fine the occupiers thereof at their pleaſure, or elſe to take it from them and ſell the ſame to others; wherein ſuch rigour was uſed, that multitudes of people were undone. But now to ſhew the King the eſtate of his Kingdom, and the oppreſſion of Popes, inquiry was made of the Revenues which the Romans and Italians had in England; which were found to be annually ſixty thouſand Marks; being more then the yearly Revenues of the Crown. Which ſo moved the King, that he cauſed the ſame to be notified, with all other exactions, to the General Council now aſſembled at Lions. And this (with the ill uſage of his Agent Martin) ſo vexed the Pope, that he is ſaid to have uttered theſe words, It is time to make an end with the Emperour, that we may cruſh theſe petty Kings; for the Dragon once appeaſed, or deſtroyed, theſe leſſer Snakes will ſoon be trodden down. But upon the Popes rejecting the conſideration of theſe grievances of England, and deſpiſing the Kings meſſage (who he ſaid began to Frederize) it was abſolutely here ordained, under great penalty, that no contribution of money ſhould be given to the Pope by any Subject of England: And the King for a time aſſents unto it. But being of an irreſolute and wavering nature, and afraid of threats, he ſoon gave over what he undertook, ſo as the Pope continued his former rapine; and though he had promiſed never to ſend any more Legates into England, yet ſent he other Miniſters under the title of Clerks, that had as great power as Legats, and effected as much.

The King aſſents that no more contribution be given to the Pope.

But ſoon revokes.

And now for the other part of the State, new occaſions alſo of complaint were offered. Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond, comes into England, bringing with him certain maids to be married to young Noblemen of this Countrey, the Kings Wards, of whom Edmund Earl of Lincoln hath one, and Richard de Burgh another; and the ſame year three of the Kings Brothers by the Mother, Guy de Luſignan, William de Valence, and Athelmar Clark, are ſent over to be provided of Eſtates in England. Alſo Thomas of Savoy (ſometimes Earl of Flanders, by right of his Wife) comes with his Siſter Beatrix, Counteſs of Provence, the Queens Mother, who are again feaſted, and gifted; for whom the King is taxed the next Parliament in Candlemas Term, and beſides ſharply reprehended for his breach of promiſe, having Vowed and Declared by his Charter never more to injure the State in that kinde: alſo for his violent taking up of Proviſion of Wax, Silk, Robes, and eſpecially of Wine, contrary to the will of the ſellers, and many other grievances they complain of. All which the King patiently hears, in hope to obtain his deſire; but yet nothing is effected: and the Parliament being prorogued till Midſummer following, and the King growing more obdurate then before, it afterward brake up in diſcontent. But the Parliament not ſupplying him, he is adviſed to furniſh his wants with ſale of his Plate, and Jewels of the Crown, being told, that though they were ſold, yet they would revert again unto him; and having with great loſs received money for them, he asks who had bought them: anſwer is made, the City of London. That City (ſaid he) is an inexhauſtible Gulph, If Octavius Treaſure were to be ſold, they ſurely would buy it. In his two and fortieth year, a Parliament was held, which by ſome was called, Inſanum Parliamentum, the mad Parliament; for that, at this Parliament (to which the Lords came with great retinues of armed men) many things were enacted contrary to the Kings pleaſure, and his Royal Prerogative.

The King furniſheth his wants with ſale of his Plate and Jewels.

And now to vex them, he appoints a Fair to be kept at Weſtminſter, forbidding under great penalty, all exerciſe of Merchandize within London, for fifteen dayes, and all other Fairs in England; and namely that of Ely: but this Novelty came to nothing; the inconvenience of the place, as it was then, and the foulneſs of the weather, brought more affliction then benefit to the Traders. That Chriſtmas alſo he requires New-years-Gifts of the Londoners, and ſhortly after writes unto them his Letters imperiouſly deprecatory to aid him with money; and thereby gets of them twenty thouſand pounds, for which the next year after he craves pardon of them. And notwithſtanding his continual taking up all Proviſions for his houſe, yet he leſſons his houſe-keeping in no honourable manner. And then ſeeing he could get nothing of the States together, he calls unto him, or writes unto every Nobleman apart, declaring his poverty; and how he was bound by Charter in a debt of thirty thouſand pounds to thoſe of Burdeaux, and his Gaſcoyns (who otherwiſe would not have ſuffered him to depart home) at his laſt being in France: but failing herein of Temporal Lords, he addreſſeth his Letters to the Prelates, of whom he findes as little relief; by much importunity and his own preſence, he got of the Abbot of Ramſey a hundred pound, but the Abbot of Burrough had the face to deny him, though the King told him, it was more Alms to give money to him, then to a Beggar that went from door to door. The Abbot of Saint Albans yet was more kinde, and gave him threeſcore Marks. To ſuch lowneſs did the neceſſity of this indigent King (through his profuſion) bring him. The Jews ever expoſed to his will, feel the weight of theſe his wants. One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeems himſelf for ſeven hundred Marks, and Aaron another Jew proteſts, the King had ſince his laſt being in France taken from him at times, thirty thouſand Marks of Silver, beſides two hundred Marks of Gold given to the Queen.

He tries to get money of particular men.

But fails in it.

The Jews moſt of all taxed.

But now the Lords aſſemble again at London, and preſs him with his promiſe made unto them, that the Chief Juſticiar, Chancellour and Treaſurer ſhould be appointed by the General Council of the Kingdom; but by the abſence of Richard Earl of Cornwal, (which was thought to be done of purpoſe) they return fruſtrate of their deſire. And now the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter falling void, the King ſends preſently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church, to elect his Brother Athelmar; and becauſe he would not be denied, he goes thither himſelf in perſon, and there enters the Chapter houſe as a Biſhop or Prior, gets up into the Preſidents Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes his Text, Juſtice and Peace have kiſſed each other; and thereupon uſeth theſe words: To me and other Kings

Kings who are to govern the People, belongs the rigour of Judgement and Juſtice; to you who are men of Quiet and Religion, Peace and Tranquility; and this day I hear you have (for your own good) been favourable to my requeſt, with many ſuch like words; whereby the Monks finding the earneſtneſs of his deſire, held it in vain to deny him, and Athelmar is elected: but with this reſervation, if the Pope allow it. Shortly after follows the memorable Caſe of Sir Henry de Bathe, a Juſticiar of the Kingdom, and a ſpecial Counſellor to the King, who by corruption had attained to a mighty Eſtate, and is ſaid, in one Circuit to have gotten two hundred pound land per annum. He is accuſed by Sir Philip Darcy of falſhood in the Kings Court; and the King is ſo incenſed againſt him, that in the Parliament at this time holden in London, Proclamation is made, that whoſoever had any Action or Complaint againſt Henry de Bathe, ſhould come and be heard. One of his Juſticiars accuſed him of acquitting a Malefactor for a bribe. The King ſeeing Henry de Bathe's friends to be many and ſtrong, breaks out into a rage, proteſting, that whoſoever would kill Henry de Bathe, ſhould be acquitted for the deed. But afterward by interceſſion of the Earl of Cornwal, and the Biſhop of London, the King becomes pacified, and Sir Henry is releaſed, paying two thouſand Marks; and after is reſtored to his former place and favour. The King keeping his Chriſtmas at York, the marriage is ſolemnized between Alexander King of Scots, and Margaret his Daughter; to the Feaſt of which ſolemnity it is ſaid the Archbiſhop gave ſix hundred fat Oxen, which were all ſpent at one meal: and beſides, the Feaſt coſt him four thouſand Marks.

Henry de Bathe chief Juſtice fined for corruption.

Yet afterward reſtored to his place.

A bountiful Feaſt.

About this time the Pope ſolicits King Henry to undertake the Croſs, and ſo doth Alphonſus King of Caſtile, offering to accompany him in Perſon, to reſcue the King of France, who was now held Priſoner by the Souldan; and becauſe a ranſome collected for him in France was by tempeſt caſt away at Sea, the Captive King offers to reſtore Normandy to the King of England, ſo he would come to his reſcue. Upon this ſolicitation of the Pope, and the grant of a tenth of the Clergy and Laity for three years to come, the King undertakes the Croſs; rather it ſeems, to get the money, then with any purpoſe to perform the Journey: which had it been collected (ſaith Paris) would have amounted to ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to utter the impoveriſhing of the Kingdom. And now the King by Proclamation calls the Londoners to Weſtminſter, and there cauſeth the Biſhops of Worceſter and Chicheſter to declare his intentions, and to exhort the people to undertake the Croſs and attend him: but few are are moved by their perſwaſions, only three Knights of ſmall note, whom thereupon the King in open view, imbraceth, kiſſeth, and calls his Brethren, checking the Londoners as ignoble Mercenaries; and there himſelf takes his Oath for performing it, and to ſet forth upon Midſummer day next. In taking his Oath, he layes his right hand on his breaſt, according to the manner of a Prieſt; and after on the Book, and kiſt it as a Layman. About this tenth (granted by the Pope, but not by the People) a Parliament is called is called at London, where the Biſhops are firſt dealt withal, (as being a work of piety) and they abſolutely refuſe it; then the Temporal Lords are ſet upon, and they anſwer as the Biſhops, which put the King into ſo great a rage, that he drove out all that were in his Chamber, as if he had been mad. Then he falls to perſwade them apart, ſending firſt for the Biſhop of Ely, and deals with him in all kinde manner, recounting the many favours he had done him. The Biſhop replies, diſſwading him from the Journey by Example of the King of France; and to that purpoſe uſeth many good reaſons: which the King hearing, in great paſſion commanded his Servants to thruſt him out of door, perceiving by this what was to be expected of the reſt, and thereupon falls upon his former violent courſes. And firſt the City of London is compelled to the Contribution of a thouſand Marks; and the Gaſcoyners being upon revolt, unleſs ſpeedy ſuccour be ſent them, general Muſters are made, and commandement given, that whoſoever could diſpend thirteen pounds per annum, ſhould furniſh out a horſeman. This occaſions another Parliament, wherein it ſeems, the State began wiſely to conſider, that all their oppoſitions did no good, the Kings turn muſt be ſerved one way or other. Therefore they agreed to relieve him rather by the uſual way, then force him to thoſe extravagant courſes which he took; but yet ſo, as the Reformation of the Government, and the ratification of their Laws and Liberties, might once again be ſolemnly confirmed. And after fifteen dayes conſultation, to ſatisfie the Kings deſire for his holy Expedition, a Tenth is granted by the Clergy, and Scutage, three Marks of every Knights Fee by the Laity; and thereupon thoſe often confirmed Charters are again ratified: and that in the moſt ſolemn and ceremonial manner, that State and Religion could poſſibly deviſe. The King with all the great Nobility of England, all the Biſhops in their reverent Ornaments with burning Candles in their hands, aſſemble to hear the terrible ſentence of Excommunication againſt the infringers of the ſame. And at the lighting of thoſe Candles the King having received one in his hand, gives it to the Prelate that ſtood by, ſaying, It becomes not me, being no Prieſt, to hold this Candle, my heart ſhall be a greater teſtimony; and withal laid his hand ſpread upon his Breaſt all the time the ſentence was read: which was thus pronounced, Authoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. Which done, he cauſeth the Charter of King John his Father, granted by his free conſent, to be openly read. In the end, having thrown away their Candles, which lay ſmoaking on the ground, they cried out, So let them who incur this Sentence, be extinct, and have no better favour then theſe ſnuffs: and the King with a loud voice ſaid, As God help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Chriſtian, a Knight, a King Crowned and Anointed, inviolably obſerve all theſe things: and therewithal the Bells rung out, and the people ſhouted for joy.

King Henry undertakes the Croſs.

But can get no money.

Thereupon falls again to violent courſes.

For preventing whereof the Parliament grants him a Subſidy.

But upon condition to confirm their Charters.

Which are confirmed with the greateſt ſolemnity that could be deviſed.

Yet was not all ſo quieted by this Grant, but that there were grievances ſtill, whereof the firſt falls upon his Brother Richard, Earl of Cornwal: for the King having ſeven and twenty years before given him the Province of Gascoine, now that he had a Son of his own, he would take it from his Brother, and give it to his Son; and the Earl refusing to deliver his Charter, it is plotted to imprison him; but he escaping out of Burdeaux, comes over into England. The King to win the Nobility of Gascoine to turn him, promiseth them thirty thousand Marks, which they accept, so as he bindeth himself by his Oath and Charter to perform it. This distress of theirs the King takes in ill part, and thereupon sends Simon Mountford Earl of Leicester, a stern man, to be their Governour, who with his insolent Government, so discontents them, that after three years suffering, they send the Archbishop of Burdeaux, with other great men, to complain of his Insolencies. Whereupon Mountford is sent for, and because the Lords took part with him, the King takes part with the Gascoiners; which Mountford took so ill, that he upbraids the King with breaking his promise: to whom the King in great rage replied, that no promise was to be kept with an unworthy Traitor. At which word Mountford riseth up, protesting that he lyed; and were he not protected by his Royal Dignity, he would would make him repent those words. The King commands his Servants to lay hold on him, but the Lords would not permit it. Yet after this great affront to the King, is Mountford sent over again into Gascoine, though with a more limited Authority; and shortly after the King with a Fleet of three hundred Ships goes thither himself, and soon composeth all differences in the Countrey.

Mountford giveth King Henry the lye to his face.

Yet soon reconciled.

Bnt now the King of Spain pretends a title to Aquitane; and to take him off, King Henry sends to treat of a marriage between Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor: which being accepted by the King of Spain, the Marriage is solemnized at Burgos, where the King of Spain Knights the Prince, and quits his claim to Aquitane for him and his Successors for ever: and King Henry invests the Prince and Wife in it, and gives unto him besides Ireland, Wales, Bristow, Stamford, and Grantham: and from hence it came that ever after this, the Kings eldest Son was immediately upon his birth Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester. After this King Henry prepares to return home, and well he might, having spent in this and his former Journeys into those parts, the sum of seven and twenty hundred thousand pounds; more then all the Lands if they had been sold, were worth: which when the King was told, he is desired there might be no words made of it for his credit. And now being to return, he is desirous, with the King of France's leave to pass through France: and coming to Paris with a thousand Horse, where he stayed eight dayes, is there most royally feasted by the King of France; and he as royally feasts the King of France again. But it is the Londoners and the Jews that are like to pay for all. For coming home about Christmas, when the Londoners presented him with a hundred pounds in money, and afterwards with two hundred pounds in plate, it was so slighted, and so ill taken, that a hole was presently found in their coat, for an escape of a Prisoner, which cost them three thousand Marks: Yet was not this enough, King Henry's eldest Son Edward marries Eleanor the K. of Spain's Sister.

The King's eldest Son immediately Prince of Wales from this time.

K. Henry spent seven and twenty hundred thousand pounds in his Journey to France.

but he takes good Fleeces from the Jews, and then lets them out to Farm, to his Brother Richard, for a great sum of money, and he to make what more of them he could.

The King lets the Jews out to Farm.

Yet after all this he complains of his Debts, which he saith are at least three hundred thousand Marks, which must needs be the heavier to him, because he had diminished his own means, by the allowance of fifteen thousand Marks per annum to his Son the Prince. The only hope is in the Parliament, but a Parliament being called, they fall presently upon their old grievances, complaining upon the King for breach of Charters, and renewing their claim, to have the chief Justiciar, the Chancellour, and Treasurer, to be chosen by themselves: so nothing was done for the King at this time, and the Parliament being prorogued till Michaelmas after, as little then, by reason many of the Peers came not, as not being summoned according to the tenor of Magna Charta. And now while the King was using means to winde himself out of debt, there happened occasions to put him further in; for now Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queens Brother being at war with the City of Thurin, must be supplied with money towards it, by the King of England. Now the Elect Bishop of Toledo, the King of Spain's Brother, comes into England, and must be sumptuously Feasted, and have great gifts presented him. Now Eleanor the Princes Wife, arrives with a multitude of Spaniards, and must all be entertained at the Kings charge, and have no small presents given them at their departure. Now comes Rustandus from the Pope, with power to collect the Tenth of the Clergy, for the Popes use and the Kings, and to absolve him from his Oath of the Holy War, so he would come to destroy Manfred, Son to the Emperour Frederick, now in possession of the Kingdom of Sicilie, and Apulia. And this man likewise hath great gifts bestowed upon him, besides a rich Prebend in York: but the Pope by too much seeking his profit, loseth credit and all; for the Clergy slights him, and will give him nothing: and when he would have borrowed of the Earl of Cornwal five hundred Marks, the Earl answered, He liked not to lend his money to one, upon whom he could not distrain. But King Henry's greatest charge was his purchasing a Kingdom for his Son Edmund; for now comes the Bishop of Bononia from the Pope, with a ring of Investiture to Prince Edmund, in the Kingdom of Sicilie, which he pretends to be at his disposing; and King Henry takes it in so good earnest, that after this he calls his Son Edmund by no other name then King of Sicilie. But all this was done by the Pope, but to angle away King Henry's money, as indeed upon this hope he had drawn the King into the engagement of an hundred and fifty thousand Marks. For to draw the King on, it was given out, that the Pope had defeated all Manfred's Forces, and was thereby in possession of the Kingdom; when the truth was, that Manfred had defeated the Popes Forces, and was thereby himself established in the Kingdom.

The Parliament requires to have the chooSing of the chief Justice, Chancellour, and Treasurer.

The Earl of Cornwal likes not to lend the Pope mony, and why.

The Pope promiseth to make the Kings younger son King of Sicilie.

The year 1257. the King keeps his Christmas at Winchester, where new grievances arise. The Merchants of Gascoine, having their Wines taken from them by the Kings Officers without out ſatisfaction, complain to their Lord the Prince, he to his Father; and his Father having been informed before-hand by his Officers, that their clamour was unjuſt, as relying upon the Princes favour, he falls into a great rage with the Prince, and breaks out into theſe words. See! now my blood, and my Bowels impugn me: but afterwards pacified, he gives order the injuries ſhould be redreſſed. And now the Princes followers themſelves come to be a grievance, who relying upon their Maſter, commit many outrages, and ſpoil and wrong men at their pleaſure; and the Prince himſelf is not altogether free, of whom it is ſaid, that meeting a young man travelling by the way, he cauſed one of his ears to be cut off, and one of his eyes to be put out. And many ſuch pranks plaid by him and his followers in Wales, made the Welſh break out into open Rebellion, which the Prince would fain have ſuppreſſed, but there was no money to be had towards the doing it. And now the King falls to ſhifts, he comes into the Chequer himſelf, and there laies penalties upon Sheriffs, that return not their moneys in due time; then he falls upon meaſures of Wine and Ale, upon Buſhels and Weights, and ſomething he gets; but London is his beſt Chequer, and every year commonly, he hath one quarrel or other to the Londoners, and they are ſure to pay. And now falls out an accident, ſeeming of great honour, but certainly of no profit to the Kingdom. Richard Earl of Cornwal the Kings brother is elected King of the Romans; for although Alphonſus King of Spain, the great Mathematician were his Competitor, yet Earl Richard's money wrought more then his learning, and the Archbiſhop of Colen comes over to fetch him, and Crowned he is at Aquiſgrane. This Earl of Cornwal is reported able to diſpend a hundred Marks a day, for ten years, beſides his Revenues in England. But now as a man that paies dear for an Office, looks that his Office ſhould pay him again: ſo Earl Richard having given infinitely to compaſs his advancement, looked to help himſelf again by the place; and this, and the deſire he had to revenge himſelf upon thoſe that had oppoſed his Election, made him take ſuch violent courſes that he came ſoon to be diſpoſſeſſed, forſaken, and forced to return into England, a poorer King then he went out an Earl.

Diſorders committed by the Prince and his followers.

The Earl of Cornwal is choſen King of the Romans.

The Earl of Cornwal's great eſtate.

He returns into England in a poor eſtate.

Acts done in the contention between the King and his Barons.

NOw King Henry very proud to have his younger ſon a King as well as his brother, calls a Parliament, wherein he brings his ſon Edmund clad in Sicily habit; and tells the Parliament, that for advancing this ſon of his to the Kingdom of Sicilie, he had bound himſelf under a covenant of loſing his Kingdom, in the ſum of an hundred and forty thouſand Marks: and hoped they would not think much to aid him with money for ſo great an advancement. But the Parliament ſtood firm to their uſual condition of Magna Charta; ſo as that might be confirmed, they were content to give two and fifty thouſand Marks: but this gave the King no ſatisfaction. The year after, another Parliament is holden at London, wherein upon the Kings preſſing them again for means to pay his debts to the Pope, the Lords tell him plainly, they will not yield to give him any thing for any ſuch purpoſe; and give their reaſons, and withall repeat their own grievances, his breach of promiſe, the inſolency of his brothers, and eſpecially William de Valence, who had given the lye to the Earl of Leiceſter, and no right done him in it; and many ſuch things. Which the King hearing, and not able to deny, humbles himſelf, and tells them how he had often by ill counſel been ſeduced; but promiſeth by his Oath which he took on the Tomb of S. Edward, to reform all thoſe errours. But the Lords not well knowing how to deal in this buſineſs, as being divided between a deſire to ſatisfie the King, and a deſire to be ſatisfied themſelves; and knowing withal the variableneſs of the Kings nature, they get the Parliament to be adjourned to S. Barnabies day, and then to aſſemble at Oxford. In which mean time the Earls, Gloceſter, Leiceſter, Hereford, the Earl Marſhal, Bigot, Spencer, and other great men, confederate, and provide by arms to effect their deſire; and here is the foundation laid of thoſe bloody wars that enſued between King Henry, and his Barons.

The Lords confederate again.

King Henry uſeth ſhifts to get money.

And now the King being put to his ſhifts for money, gets the Abbot of Weſtminſter to put his Seal, and that of his Covent to a Deed Obligatory, as a ſurety for two hundred Marks, making account, that by his example, others would be drawn to do the like; but his truſty ſervant Simon Paſſeleve, being imployed to other Monaſteries, and telling them amongſt other reaſons, to perſwade them, that the King was Lord of all they had; they only anſwered, they acknowledged indeed the King to be Lord of all they had, but yet ſo, as to defend, not to deſtroy the ſame; and this was all he could get of them. The Prince alſo in no leſs want then his Father, is driven to morgage his Town of Stamford, Brahan, and many other things, to William de Valence, a Poictovin, whereby appeared the diſorder of the time, when the Prince was in want, and ſtrangers had ſuch plenty. And now is the Parliament aſſembled at Oxford, whither the Lords come attended with large trains; and here they begin with the expoſtulation of the former Liberties, requiring that the chief Juſticiar, the Chancellour, and Treaſurer may be ordained by publick choice; and that the twenty four Conſervators of the Kingdom may be confirmed, twelve by the election of the Lords, and twelve by the King: ſome write there were but twelve in all, and were called, The Douze Peers, the twelve Peers, who ruled all things at their pleaſure without controlment. The King, ſeeing their ſtrength, and in what manner they required theſe things, ſwears ſolemnly again to the confirmation of them; and cauſeth the Prince to take the ſame Oath. But the Lords left not here, the Kings Brethren, the Poictovins, and other ſtrangers muſt preſently be removed: and this alſo, though with ſome little oppoſition, was at laſt concluded: and thereupon the Kings brethren and their followers are deſpoiled of all their fortunes, and exiled by proſcription under the the Kings own hand, directed to the Earls of Hereford, and Surrey. But now ſickneſs and mortality happening to many great ones, it is imputed to poyſons, ſuppoſed to have been prepared by thoſe ſtrangers proſcribed. The Earl of Gloceſter in a ſickneſs ſuddenly loſt his hair, his teeth, his nails; and his Brother hardly eſcaped death: which made many to ſuſpect their neareſt ſervants, and their Cooks. Walter Scoyny the Earls Steward, is ſtrictly examined, committed to Priſon, and afterward without confeſſion, is upon preſumptions, only executed at Wincheſter. Elias a converted Jew, is ſaid to have confeſſed, that in his houſe the poyſon was confected; but it was when he was a Jew, and not a Chriſtian. Every man that had received any wrong by thoſe ſtrangers, now put up their complaints, and are heard. Guido de Rochfort, a Poictovin, to whom the King had given the Caſtle of Rocheſter, is baniſhed, and all his Goods confiſcate. William Buſſey, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and moſt reproachfully uſed. Richard Grey, whom the Lords had made Captain of Dover Caſtle, is ſent to intercept whatſoever the Poictovins conveyed that way out of England: and much treaſure of theirs, and of the Elect of Wincheſter is by him taken, beſides great ſums committed to the new Temple are found out, and ſeiſed for the King.

And now the chief Juſticiar Hugh Bigot, brother to the Earl Marſhal (choſen this laſt Parliament by publick voice) procures that four Knights in every Shire ſhould enquire of the oppreſſions of the poor, done by great men: and certifie the ſame, that redreſs might be made. Alſo order was taken againſt corrupting of Juſtice: when yet notwithſtanding this pretended care of the publick, it is noted by the Writers and Records of that time, how the Lords were themſelves but as totidem tyranni, enforcing the ſervices of the Kings Tenants that dwelt near them. But to make their cauſe the more popular, it was rumoured that the King ſtood upon it, that his neceſſity might be ſupplyed out of the Eſtates of his people, whether they would or no: which the King hearing, ſends forth Proclamation, declaring how certain malitious perſons had falſly and ſeditiouſly reported, that he ment unlawfully to charge his Subjects, and ſubvert the Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom, and by theſe falſe ſuggeſtions averted the hearts of his people from him: and therefore deſires them not to give credit to ſuch perturbers; for that he was ready to defend all Right, and Cuſtomes due unto them: and that they might reſt of this ſecured, he cauſed his Letters to be made Patents. But now Montford, Gloceſter, and Spencer, inforce the King to call a Parliament at London, where they get the authority of the twenty four to be eſtated wholly upon themſelves, and they alone to diſpoſe of the cuſtody of the Caſtles, and other buſineſſes of the Kingdom: and here they bind the King to loſe to their Legal obedience whenſoever he infringed this Charter.

The Lords themſelves tyrannize.

The Liberty of the Subject.

Four and twenty choſen to be Governours of the Kingdom; but Montford and Gloceſter get all the authority to themſelves.

At this time intelligence was given to the Lords, that Richard King of the Romans had a purpoſe to come into England, and the Lords ſuſpecting he would come with power to aid the King his Brother, take order for guarding the Ports, which intend to hinder his landing: but finding his train to be but ſmall, accompanyed only with his Queen, two German Earls and eight Knights, upon his promiſe to take their propounded Oath, they admit him to Land, but would neither permit the King (who came thither to meet him) nor himſelf to enter into Dover Caſtle. At Canterbury they bring him into the Chapter houſe, where the Earl of Gloceſter ſtanding forth in the midſt, calls out the Earl, not by the name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwal; who in reverent manner coming forth, taketh his Oath in theſe words. Hear all men, that I Richard, Earl of Cornwal, do here ſwear upon the holy Evangeliſts, that I ſhall be faithful and diligent to reform with you the Kingdom of England, and be an effectual Coadjutor to expel all Rebels and diſturbers of the ſame; and this Oath will inviolably obſerve, under pain of loſing all the Land I have in England: So help me God. But though this Earl came home both weak and poor, yet upon his return the King takes heart, and ſeeks all means to vindicate his power, and firſt ſends meſſengers ſecretly to Rome, to be abſolved from his enforced Oath. And to have the more aſſurance from the King of France, he makes an abſolute reſignation of all his Right to the Dutchy of Normandy, and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poictou, Tourene and Main; in regard whereof the King of France gives him three hundred thouſand pounds (ſome ſay Crowns) of Anjovin money, and grants him to enjoy all Guyen, beyond the River Garoune, all the Countrey of Xaintoigne to the River of Charente, the Countrey of Limouſin and Quercie, for him and his ſucceſſours, doing their homage to the Crown of France, as Duke of Aquitain.

ſwears to aſſiſt the Lords.

King Henry ſends to Rome to be abſolved of his oath.

He reſigns his Right in Normandy for a ſum of money.

And now was the King of France made arbiter of the difference between King Henry and his Barons, who gives ſentence againſt the Barons concerning the Proviſions at Oxford; but of their ſide concerning King John's Charter: by which nice diſtinction, though he did but leave the matter as he found it: (for thoſe Proviſions as the Lords pretended, were grounded upon that Charter) yet did his ſentence draw many away from the party of the Barons, amongſt whom was Henry ſon to the Earl of Cornwal, Roger Clifford, Roger de L'eisbourn, Haimo, L'eſtrange, and many others. But the Earl of Leiceſter, notwithſtanding this revolt, recovers the Town and Caſtle of Gloceſter, conſtrains the Citizens to pay a thouſand pounds for their redemption, goes with an Army to Worceſter, poſſeſſeth himſelf of the Caſtle, thence to Shrewsbury, and comes about to the Iſle of Ely, ſubdues the ſame, and grows exceeding powerful. The King doubting his approach to London, falls to treat of a Peace, and a Peace is concluded upon theſe conditions; that all the Caſtles of the King ſhould be delivered to the keeping of the Barons; the Proviſions of Oxford ſhould inviolably be kept; all ſtrangers by a certain time ſhould avoid the Kingdom, except only ſuch as were licenſed to ſtay. The Prince had fortified Windſor Caſtle; but Leiceſter coming to beſiege it, he treats with him for Peace, which which is refuſed, and the Caſtle is rendred to him.

Many Lords return to the King for peace but are denyed.

The King at this time, to win time, convokes another Parliament at London, wherein he won many Lords to take his part; as namely the Prince Richard his Brother, Henry his Son, William Valence, with the reſt of his Brothers lately returned; and with them the King marcheth to Oxford, whither divers Lords of Scotland repair to him, as John Commin, John Baliol, Lords of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others: alſo many Barons of the North; Clifford, Piercy, Baſſet, and others. From Oxford he goes to Northampton, where he took Priſoners, Simon Montfort the younger, with fourteen other principal men; thence to Nottingham, making ſpoils of ſuch poſſeſſions as pertained to the Barons in thoſe parts. And now the Kings ſide grows ſtrong, which the Earls of Leiceſter and Glocester ſeeing, they write to the King, proteſting their Loyalty; and how they oppoſed only ſuch as were enemies to him and the Kingdom, and had belyed them. The King returns anſwer that themſelves were the perturbers of him and his State, and ſought his and the Kingdoms deſtruction; and therefore defies them. The Prince likewiſe, and the Earl of Cornwal ſend Letters of defiance to them. Yet the Barons continue to mediate a Peace, and ſend the Biſhops of London and Worceſter, with offer of thirty thouſand Marks to the King, for the damages done in theſe wars, ſo as the Statutes of Oxford may be obſerved; but this offer is not accepted. The Earl ſeeing no remedy, but it muſt be put to a day, takes his time to be earlyer ready then was expected; and ſupplies his want of ſtrength with policy, placing on the one ſide of a hill near Lewis, where the battel was fought, certain Enſigns without men, in ſuch ſort, as they might ſeem afar off to be ſquadrons of ſuccours to ſecond thoſe he brought to the encounter: whom he cauſed all to wear white Croſſes, both for their own notice, and the ſignification of his cauſe, which he would have to be thought for Juſtice. Here the fortune of the day was his, the King, the Prince, the Earl of Cornwal, and his ſon Henry, the Earls of Arundel and Hereford, with all the Scottiſh Lords, are taken priſoners; and of the Engliſh, five and twenty Barons and Bannerets: only the Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Luſignan, the Kings Brother, with Hugh Bigot Earl Marſhal, ſave themſelves by flight: five thouſand (ſome ſay twenty thouſand) are ſlain in the battel. A year and half is Simon Montford in poſſeſſion of his priſoner, carrying the King about with him to countenance his actions, till he had gotten all the ſtrongeſt Caſtles in the Kingdom.

The Earl of Leiceſter's ſtratagem.

The Earl of Leiceſter takes the King, the Prince, and divers other Lords priſoners.

Variance between the Earls of Leiceſter, and Glocester.

Glocester joyns with Prince.

And now comes Erinnys and ſets debate between the two great Earls of Leiceſter and Glocester, about their Dividend. Leiceſter is taxed to do more for his own particular then the common good; his ſons alſo preſuming upon his greatneſs, grew inſolent: whereupon Glocester diſcontented forſakes that ſide, and betakes him to the Prince, who lately eſcaping out of the Caſtle of Hereford, had gotten a power about him to try the fortune of another battel. The revolt of this Earl being great in it ſelf, was greater by its example; for now many others revolted likewiſe; and the Earl of Leiceſter, ſeeing the improvement of the Princes Forces, who was now with his Army about Worceſter, though he ſaw his own diſadvantage, yet imbattels in a Plain near Eveſham to encounter him; and noting the manner of the approach of the Princes Army, ſaid to thoſe about him, Theſe men come bravely on, they learn it not of themſelves, but of me. And ſeeing himſelf likely to be beſet, and overlaid with multitude, he adviſed his friends Hugh Spencer, Ralph Baſſet, and others to ſhift for themſelves; which when they refuſed to do, then (ſaith he) let us commend our ſouls to God, for our bodies are theirs: and ſo undertaking the main weight of the battel, periſhed under it, and with him are ſlain his ſon Henry, eleven Barons, with many thouſands of common Souldiers. And thus ended Montford the great Earl of Leiceſter, highly honoured in his life, and more highly ſhould have been after his death, if the people might have had their will, who talkt of miracles enough to make him a Saint.

Montford the great Earl of Leiceſter ſlain.

Miracles reported of him being dead.

And now is King Henry by this victory of his ſon, at liberty; who together repair to Wincheſter, where a Parliament is convoked, and all who adhered to Earl Montford, are diſinherited, and their eſtates conferred on others, at the Kings pleaſure; the Londoners alſo have their Liberties taken from them. But though the death of Montford gave a great wound to the party of the Barons: yet it was not mortal, at leaſt not mortal preſently; for there remained reliques that kept it alive a good while after. Simon and Guy de Montford ſons of the Earl of Leiceſter, and other of the Barons, take and defend the Iſle of Ely. The Caſtle of Killingworth held out half a year, till their victuals failed; and then yielded upon conditions to have their lives and goods ſaved: and many others there were, reſolute and deſperate perſons, ſtrongly knit and faſtned together, though now ſhortly upon diſſolving. For after the Parliament at Weſtminſter, the King with an Army going againſt them, and being at Northampton, Simon and Guy de Montford ſubmit themſelves to him: but when the Earl of Glocester oppoſed the reſtoring them to their eſtates, they were fain to flie the Kingdom, and make their fortunes in other Countreys, as indeed they did; the younger in Italy, the elder in France, where they were propagators of two great Families. Their Mother was baniſht ſhortly after the battel of Eveſham. A Lady of eminent note, as being the Daughter and Siſter of a King, and yet of more note for her patient bearing of adverſity, or rather for her making a benefit of adverſity; for by this means ſhe took her ſelf to the veil of Piety, and died a Nun at Montarges in France. About this time a great ſlaughter was made of Jews in London: and the quarrel was, becauſe a Jew would have forced a Chriſtian to give him more then two pence a week for the uſe of twenty ſhillings; two pence only being then allowed by the Law.

Montford's ſons flie the Kingdom.

Three years after this, the diſinherited Barons held out, till at length, conditions of render are propounded, but here the Council are divided in opinion: Mortimer and others ſtated in the poſſeſſions of the diſinherited, are againſt reſtauration, alledging it were injuſtice to take take from them the rewards of their ſervice. Gloceſter and twelve ordained to deal for the peace of the State, are earneſt for reſtauration; alledging, it were hard meaſure to grant them their lives, and not their livelyhoods: but not prevailing, in great diſcontentment Gloceſter retires from Court, ſends Meſſengers to warn the King to remove ſtrangers from his Council, and obſerves the Proviſions at Oxford, as he promiſed at Eveſham: otherwiſe that he ſhould not marvel if himſelf did what he thought fit. Hereupon John de Warren, Earl of Surrey, and William de Valentia, are ſent to the Earl of Gloceſter; who though they could not perſwade him to ſubmit to the King: yet thus much they got of him under his hand and Seal, that he would never bear arms againſt the King, or his ſon Edward, but only defend himſelf and purſue Roger Mortimer, and his other enemies. And now a Parliament is convoked at Bury, wherein many demands are made by the King and the Legat, and all for money from the Clergy; but all denied, that nothing but denials are done in this Parliament. After this, the Legat imploys Solicitors to perſwade the diſinherited Lords which held the Iſle of Ely, to return to the faith and unity of the Church, and to the Peace of the King, according to the form propounded at Coventry: to which the Lords make anſwer, that they never oppoſed the unity of the Church, but the avarice of Church-men that were put in authority; and that they never oppoſed the King, but for the good of the Kingdom: and then required, that the Proviſions at Oxford might be obſerved, and pledges be given them for their ſecurity. Hereupon the year after, the King prepares a mighty Army, and Prince Edward with Bridges entring the Iſle of Ely, ſhuts them up ſo, that he conſtrains them at laſt to yield. Alſo the Earl of Gloceſter coming to London with an Army, is by the Legat once again perſwaded to render himſelf to the King; and upon forfeiture of twelve thouſand Marks, if ever he ſhould raiſe any commotion again, is reconciled. Now remains Lewellin and the Welſh to be chaſtened for aiding of Simon Mountford; but the King going againſt them with an Army, they give him two and thirty pounds ſterling, and ſo make their peace; and here was an end of the firſt wars between the Kings of England and their Barons.

The Kings ſons, Edward and Edmund, undertake the Holy War.

The next year after the Popes Legat Othobon, ſigns with the Croyſado both the Kings ſons, Edward and Edmund, the Earl of Gloceſter, and divers Noble men induced to undertake the Holy war by the ſollicitation of him and the King of France; who notwithſtanding his former calamities endured in that action, would once again adventure it. And becauſe Prince Edward wanted means to furniſh himſelf out, the King of France lends him thirty thouſand Marks upon a mortgage of Gaſcoyn. And now whileſt this preparation is in hand, King Henry labours to eſtabliſh the Peace of the Kingdom, and to reform the exceſſes which the war had bred: and the ſame year aſſembles his laſt Parliament at Marleborough, where the Statutes of that Title were enacted. Near two years it ſeems to have been after the undertaking the Croſs, before Prince Edward ſet forth; but then taking his wife Eleanor with him, though young with childe, he ſet forward, and in the voyage, when many of his people ſeemed deſirous to leave him, and return home, he is ſaid to have ſtrucken his breſt, and ſworn; that if all his followers forſook him, he would yet enter Acon, or Ptolemais, though but only with his horſe-keeper Fowin. Shortly after Richard King of the Romans died, and the year following King Henry.

Of his Taxations and wayes for raiſing of money.

NEver ſon was more like a Father in any thing, then King Henry was like his Father King John, in this point, for raiſing of Money; for he trod directly in all his ſteps, if he added not ſomething of his own. King John had great Subſidies granted him by Parliament, for any great action he undertook, ſo had King Henry. King John reſumed the Lands aliened from the Crown, ſo did King Henry. King John made benefit of the vacancy of Biſhopricks, and Abbeys, ſo did King Henry. King John took great Fines of many for crimes not proved, but only ſuppoſed, ſo did King Henry. And John made benefit of a new Seal, ſo did King Henry. King John extorted great ſums from the Jews, ſo did King Henry. And one way more he had to get money, which perhaps his father had not; and that was by begging, as he told the Abbot of Borough, It was more Alms to give money to him, then to the Beggar that went from door to door. Indeed Taxations in this Kings Reign may be reckoned amongſt his annual Revenues, for ſcarce any year paſſed without a Parliament; and ſeldom any Parliament without a Tax: or if any ſometimes without, it was then cauſe of the greater Taxation ſome other way; as when he took of the Londoners for having aided the Barons, twenty thouſand Mark.

King Henry gets money by begging.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN this Kings Reign were ratified and confirmed the two great Charters of Magna Charta and Charta de Foreſta. Alſo in his time were enacted the Statutes called of Merton, of Oxford and of Marleborough. Alſo ſtealing of cattel, which before was but pecuniary, he made capital: and the firſt ſuffered for the ſame, was one of Dunſtable, who having ſtoln twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colne, and being purſued to Redburn, was by a Bayliff of St. Albans, according to the Kings Proclamation, condemned and beheaded. And it may ſeem ſtrange, that in theſe times ſo much blood ſhould be ſhed in the field, and none upon the Scaffold; for till the twenty ſixth year of this King, that one William Maraiſc, the ſon of Geoffry Maraiſc, a Noble man of Ireland, being condemned for Piracy and Treaſon, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered, there is no example of that kinde of puniſhment to be found in our Hiſtories. Particularly in this Kings Reign was made that Statute, by which the Ward and marriage of the Heirs of Barons within age is given to the King. Alſo in this Kings Reign the Pleas of the Crown were pleaded in the Tower of London. All Wears in the Thames are in this Kings time ordained to be pluckt up and deſtroyed. Alſo the Citizens Wardſhips of Barons given to King Henry.

Citizens of London are allowed by Charter, to pass Toll-free through all England, and to have free Warren about London: also to have and use a common Seal. Also it is ordained that no Sheriff of London should continue in his Office longer then one year, which they did before for many. In the five and twentieth year of this King, were Aldermen first chosen within the City of London, which then had the rule of the City, and of the Wards of the same, and were then yearly changed, as now the Sheriffs are. It was in this Kings time allowed to the City of London to present their Mayor to the Barons of the Exchequer to be sworn: which before was to be presented to the King, wheresoever he were. In his time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up by the King in his grants and writings. Also in this Kings time, William Bishop of Salisbury, first caused that custome to be received for a Law, whereby the Tenants of every Lordship are bound to owe their suit to the Lords Court, of whom they hold their Tenements. Also in the 32 year of this Kings Reign, the Wharf of London called Queen-Hithe, was let to farm to the Citizens for fifty pounds the year, which is since grown scarce worth fifteen. In this Kings time a Proclamation was set forth, that all such as might dispend fifteen pound in Land, should receiue the Order of Knight-hood; and those that would not, or could not, should pay their Fines.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

AFfairs of the Church for matter of Doctrine, were never more quiet then in this Kings Reign; for now all Heresies accounted of the time, especially the Albigenses, were in a manner suppressed by the Arms of the King of France, not without the vote of the King of England, who forbore to make war upon them in tenderness to his service. But for matter of manners they were never more turbulent; for now Abbeys were fleeced, Sanctuaries violated, Clergy-men outraged, Bishops themselvs not spared: and all for greedines of money, or for revenge.

Othabone the Popes Legat in fear at Oxford.

Othabone, the Popes Legat here in England, lying at the Abbey at Oseney, there happened a difference between his servants and the Scholars at Oxford; in which contention a brother of his was slain, and the Legat himself fain to flie into the Steeple for the safeguard of his life. Whereupon afterward being gotten thence by the Kings safe conduct, he thundered out curses against the Scholars, and interdicted the University; so as the Colledges grew desolate, and the Students were dispersed abroad into other places, for the space of half a year: till the Monk of Oseney, and the Regent Masters of Oxford were fain to go bare-footed and bare-headed through London, as far as Durham house, where the Legate lay, and there upon their humble submission, and great Mens intercession, they were absolved, and the University restored to its former estate. But of this Othobone, it may not be impertinent to relate a little further: that going afterward out of England, he came by degrees, after the death of Innocent the fifth, to be Pope of Rome himself, by the name of Adrian the fifth, and dyed within fifty dayes after his election. Amongst the affairs of the Church may be reckoned the Ulcers of any member of the Church: such as one as in this Kings time broak out most loathsome: For one procuring five wounds to be made in his body, in resemblance to five wounds in Christ's body, took upon him to be Christ; and had gotten a Woman, that took upon her to be the Virgin Mary: who continuing obstinate in their madnes, were adjudged to be immured and shut up between two walls, to the end (no doubt) the contagion of their filthines should spread no further. In this Kings time a little novelty was brought in by Pope Innocent the fourth, who ordained that Cardinals should wear red Hats: something perhaps for mystery, and something for distinction. Also in this Kings time, the Grecians forsook their obedience to the Church of Rome; and the Archbishop of Antioch claims to have precedence and authority above the Bishop of Rome, because the Apostle Peter had first governed the Church of Antioch seven years together. Also in the fifth year of this King, the Friers Minors (as some write) came first into England; but it is not like they came so soon, for they were Gray Friers of the order of St. Francis: and St. Francis had no grace till Pope Honorius the third, which was some years after. And it is miraculous which is related here of St. Francis, that fifteen dayes before his death appeared wounds in his hands and feet, like to those which Christ received there upon the Cross; and that as soon as he was dead, there remained not so much as any marks of the said wounds upon him.

One takes upon him to be Christ.

THis King caused a chest of Gold to be made for laying up the Reliques of King Edward the Confessour, in the Church of Westminster. He builded a Church for converted Jews in London: also an Hospital at Oxford, for Passengers, and diseased persons: also the new Conventual Church and the Chappel of our Lady at Westminster, whereof he laid himself the first stone: also the house of Black-Friers in Canterbury. In his time, Elo Countes of Salisbury founded the Abbey of Lacock in Wiltshire: Richard Earl of Cornwal, founded Hails, a Monastery of Cistercian Monks near to Winchcomb in Glocestershire: Reginald de Moun, Earl of Somerset, and Lord of Dunster, founded the Abbey of Newham in Devonshire: Randulph the third Earl of Chester, and Lord of little Britain, builded the Castles of Chartley, Beston, and the Abbey of De la Cross: Sir John Mansel the Kings Chaplain, founded a house of Regular Canons near to Rumney in Kent: William de Albineto Earl of Arundel, founded the Priory of Wimondham: William Brune, a Citizen of London, and Rosia his Wife, founded the Hospital of our Lady without Bishopsgate in London: And Isabel Countes of Arundel founded the Nunnery of Marran, near to Linne. Friers Minors first arrived at Dover, nine in number; whereof five remained at Canterbury, and there builded the first Covent of Friers Minors, that ever was in England: the other four came to London, who encreasing in number, had a place assigned them in Saint Nicholas Shambles; which John Iwyn, Mercer of London, appropriated to the use of the ſaid Friers, and became himſelf a Lay-brother. Alſo in this Kings time the new work of Saint Paul's Church in London was begun. If it were piety in the Jew, who falling into a Privy upon a Saturday, would not be taken out that day, becauſe it was the Jews Sabbath: it was as much piety in the Earl of Gloceſter, that would not ſuffer him to be taken out the next day, becauſe it was the Chriſtian Sabbath; and when the third day was come, he was taken out dead. Whoſe piety was the greater? A ſtrange accident upon an act of piety, is related in this Kings time; which if true, is a Miracle; if not true, is yet a Legend, and not unworthy to be read: that in a time of dearth, one man in a certain Pariſh, who allowed poor people to relieve themſelves with taking corn upon his ground, had at Harveſt a plentiful crop; where others that denyed them had their corn all blaſted, and nothing worth. In this Kings time alſo, Hugh Balſamus Biſhop of Ely founded Saint Peter's Colledge in Cambridge. Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent, was buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers in London, to which Church he gave his Palace at Weſtminſter, which afterward the Archbiſhop of York bought, and made it his Inn; ſince commonly called York-place, now White-Hall.

Caſualties happening in his time.

AT one time there fell no Rain in England, from the firſt of March to the Aſſumption of our Lady; and at another time there fell ſo much Rain, that Holland and Holdernes in Lincolnſhire were overflowed and drowned. In the 17. year of his reign, were ſeen, 5 Suns at one time together; after which followed ſo great a dearth, that people were conſtrained to eat Horſe-fleſh, and barks of Trees: and in London twenty thouſand were ſtarved for want of food. Alſo in his time the Church of Saint Mildred in Canterbury, and a great part of the City was burnt. Alſo the Town of Newcaſtle upon Tine was burnt, Bridge and all. And though it may ſeem no fit place to tell it, yet here or no where it muſt be told; that in this Kings time there was ſent by the King of France, the firſt Elephant that ever was ſeen in England. In this Kings time, Matthew Paris relates of a maid in Leiceſterſhire, that being exactly watched, was found in ſeven years together, neither to eat nor drink, but only that on Sundays ſhe received the Communion, and yet continued fat and in good liking: which if it be true, we may well believe that in the Reſurrection, our life may be maintained without meat or drink. Alſo in this Kings time, there was found a plentiful Mine of Tinne in Germany, which before this time was never known to be any where found but only in Cornwal; which much abated the price of Tinne in England. In his time alſo the Sea by the ſpace of four or five dayes, flowed not up to her uſual height, which was never known to happen at any time before. Alſo in his time a childe was born in Kent, that at two years old cured all diſeaſes. Alſo in his 56. year a Lamb was yeaned at Greenwich beſide London, that had two perfect bodies and but one head. Alſo in his time a childe was born in the Iſle of Wight, who at 18 years old, was ſcarce grown to be three foot high; and therefore brought to the Queen, ſhe carryed him about with her as a Monſter of Nature.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE marryed Eleanor, the ſecond of the five daughters of Raymond Earl of Provence, who lived his Wife thirty ſeven years, his Widow nineteen, dyed a Nun at Aimsbury, and was buryed in her Monaſtery. By her he had ſix ſons and three daughters: of his ſons, the four youngeſt dyed young, and were buryed, three of them at Weſtminſter, and the fourth in the New Temple by Fleetſtreet. His eldeſt ſon Edward, ſurnamed Longſhanke, of his tall and ſlender body, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. His ſecond ſon Edmund, ſurnamed Crouchback, of bowing in his back, (as ſome ſay) but more likely of wearing the ſign of the Croſs, (anciently called a Crouch) upon his back, which was uſually worn of ſuch as had vowed voyages to Hieruſalem, as he had done. He was inveſted titular King of Sicilie and Apulia, and created Earl of Lancaſter; on whoſe perſon originally the great contention of Lancaſter and York was founded. He had two wives, the firſt was Avelin daughter and heir of William Earl of Albemarle, by whom he left no iſſue. The ſecond was Queen Blanch, daughter of Robert Earl of Artois, (brother of St. Lewis King of France) widow of Henry of Champaigne King of Navarre: by her he had iſſue three ſons and one daughter. His eldeſt ſon Thomas, who after his father was Earl of Lancaſter, and having marryed Alice daughter and heir of Henry Lacie Earl of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pomfret without iſſue. His ſecond ſon Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earl of Lancaſter, and father of Henry the firſt Duke of Lancaſter: his third ſon John, who dyed unmarryed. His daughter Mary marryed to Henry Lord Piercie, mother of Henry the firſt Earl of Northumberland. This Edmund dyed at Bay in Gaſcoin, in the year 1296. when he had lived fifty years, whoſe body half a year after his death, was brought over into England, and entombed at Weſtminſter. Of King Henries three daughters, the eldeſt Margaret was marryed to Alexander the third, King of Scotland, by whom ſhe had iſſue, two ſons, Alexander and David, who dyed both before their father, without iſſue; and one daughter Margaret Queen of Norway, wife of King Ericke, and mother of Margaret the heir of Scotland and Norway, that dyed unmarryed; The ſecond daughter of King Henry was Beatrice, born at Burdeaux, marryed to John the firſt Duke of Britain, and had iſſue by him, Arthur Duke of Britain, John Earl of Richmont, Peter, and Blanch marryed to Philip ſon of Robert Earl of Artois, Eleanor a Nun at Aimsbury, and Mary marryed to Guy, Earl of St. Paul, ſhe deceaſed in Britain, and was buryed at London, in the Quire of the Gray-Fryers within Newgate. The third daughter of King Henry, named Katherine, dyed young, and lies buried at Weſtminſter, in the ſpace between the Chappels of King Edward and Saint Benet.

Of

of his eye-lids hanging down, and almoſt covering the black of his eye. For his inward indowments, it may be ſaid, he was wiſer for a man, then for a Prince; for he knew better how to govern his life then his Subjects. He was rather Pious then Devout, as taking more pleaſure in hearing Maſſes then Sermons, as he ſaid to the King of France, He had rather ſee his friend once, then hear from him often. His minde ſeemed not to ſtand firm upon its Baſis, for every ſudden accident put him into paſſion. He was neither conſtant in his love, nor in his hate; for he never had ſo great a Favourite whom he caſt not into diſgrace, nor ſo great an Enemy whom he received not into favour. An example of both which qualities was ſeen in his carriage towards Hubert de Burgh, who was for a time the greateſt Favourite, yet caſt out afterward in miſerable diſgrace; and then no man held in greater hatred; yet received afterward into grace again. And it is memorable to hear with what crimes this Hubert was charged at his arraignment, and ſpecially one: That to diſſwade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had ſaid, the King was a ſquint-eyed Fool, and a kinde of Leaper, deceitful, perjured, more faint-hearted then a Woman, and utterly unfit for any Ladies company. For which, and other crimes laid to his charge in the Kings Bench, where the King himſelf was preſent, he was adjudged to have his Lands confiſcate, and to be deprived of his Title of Earl; yet after all this was reſtored to his eſtate again, and ſuffered to live in quiet. He was more deſirous of money then of honour, for elſe he would never have ſold his Right to the two great Dukedoms of Normandy and Anjou to the King of France for a ſum of money. Yet he was more deſirous of honour, then of quietneſs; for elſe he would never have contended ſo long with his Barons about their Charter of Liberty, which was upon the matter but a point of honour. His moſt eminent vertue, and that which made him the more eminent, as being rare in Princes, was his continency; for there is nothing read, either of any baſe children he had, or of any Concubine he kept.

A ſtrange affront to a King.

Of his Death and Burial.

THough he had lived a troubleſome life, yet he died a quiet death; for he had ſetled Peace in his Kingdom, and in his conſcience. For being at Saint Edmunds Bury, and finding himſelf not well at eaſe, he made the more haſte to London, where calling before him his Lords, and ſpecially Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloceſter, he exhorted them to be true and faithful to his ſon Prince Edward, who was at that time far from home; and therefore had the more need of their care, which conſiſted chiefly in their agreement one with another. And then his ſickneſs increaſing, he yielded up his ſoul to God, on the ſixteenth day of November, in the year 1272. when he had lived threeſcore and five years, reigned ſix and fifty; and was buried at Weſtminſter, which he had newly builded.

Of men of Note in his time.

OF Martial men famous in his time there were many, but three ſpecially who obſcured the reſt: the firſt was William Marſhal, Earl of Pembroke, memorable for the great care he had of King Henry in his minority, and more memorable for the little care that Deſtinie had of his poſterity; for leaving his five Sons behinde him, they all lived to be Earls ſucceſſively, yet all died without iſſue: So as the great Name and numerous Family of the Marſhalls come wholly to be extinct in that Generation. And this happened (if we may believe Matthew Paris), by reaſon of a curſe of an Iriſh Biſhop, from whom he had taken two Manors belonging to his Biſhoprick; and neither he, nor all his ſons, upon any intreaties would be gotten to reſtore them. The ſecond was Richard de Clare Earl of Gloceſter who in a Battel againſt Baldwyn de Giſnes, a valiant Flemming, imployed by King Henry, himſelf alone encountred twelve of his enemies; and having his horſe ſlain under him, he pitcht one of them by the leg out of the ſaddle, and leapt into it himſelf, and continued the fight without giving ground, till his Army came to reſcue him. An act, that may ſeem fitter to be placed among the Fictions of Knights Errant, then in a true Narration. The third was Simon Montford, a man of ſo audacious a Spirit, that he gave King Henry the lie to his face; and that in preſence of all his Lords, and of whom it ſeems, the King ſtood in no ſmall fear. For paſſing one time upon the Thames, and ſuddenly taken with a terrible ſtorm of Thunder and Lightning, he commanded to be ſet on ſhore at the next ſtairs, which happened to be at Durham Houſe, where Montford then lay; who coming down to meet the King, and perceiving him ſomewhat frighted with the Thunder, ſaid unto him, Your Majeſty need not fear the Thunder, the danger is now paſt: No Montford (ſaid the King) I fear not the Thunder ſo much as I fear thee. Of men famous for ſanctity of life, there were likewiſe many in his time, but three moreeminent then the reſt, Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Richard Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Thomas Arch-Deacon of Hereford; all three either Canonized, or at leaſt thought worthy to be Canonized for Saints. To theſe may be added Robert Groſs-head Biſhop of Lincoln, who tranſlated the Teſtaments of the twelve Patriarch, out of Greek into Latine; which through envy of the Jews, never came to the knowledge of Saint Hierome, wherein are many Propheſies of our Saviour Chriſt. Of men famous for Learning, there were likewiſe many in his time; of whom ſome left works behind them for Teſtimonies of their knowledge in divers kinds, as Alexander Hales, a Frier minor, who wrote many Treatiſes in Divinity; Ralph Coggeſhall, who wrote the Appendix to the Chronicle of Ralph Niger; Randolph Glanvile, the Earl of Cheſter, the third and laſt of that name, who compiled a book of the Laws of England; Henry Bracton, who wrote the book commonly called by his name, de Conſuetudinibus Anglicanis: and beſides theſe, Hugh Kirkſtead, Richard of Ely, Peter Henham, John Gyles,

THE

The LIFE and REIGN of KING EDWARD THE FIRST, Surnamed of WINCHESTER.

Of his coming to the Crown.

AS ſoon as King Henry was dead and buried, the great Lords of the Land cauſed his eldeſt Son Prince Edward to be proclaimed King: and aſſembling at the new Temple in London, they there took order for the quiet Governing of the Kingdom till he ſhould come home. For at this time he was abſent in the Holy Land, and had been there above a year when his Father died. But we cannot bring him home without telling what he did, and what he ſuffered in all that time, and in his return. For at his firſt coming thither he reſcued the Great City of Acon from being ſurrendred to the Souldan; after which out of envy to his Valour, one Anzazim a deſperate Saracen, who had often been employed to him from their General, being one time, upon pretence of ſome ſecret meſſage admitted alone into the Chamber, with a poiſoned Knife gave him three wounds in the body, two in the arm, and one near the arm-pit, which were thought to be mortal, and had perhaps been mortal, if out of unſpeakable love the Lady Eleanor his Wife had not ſuckt out the poiſon of his wounds with her mouth; and thereby effecting a cure, which otherwiſe had been incurable. It is no wonder, that love ſhould do wonders, which is it ſelf a wonder. And now being diſappointed of aids that were promiſed to be ſent him, and leaving Garriſons in fit places for defence of the Countrey, he with his Wife Eleanor takes his journey homewards. And firſt paſſing by Sicilie, was there moſt kindely received by Charles, King of that Iſland, where he firſt heard of his Fathers death; which he took more heavily far, then he had taken the death of his young Son Henry, whereof he had heard a little before. At which when King Charles marvelled, he anſwered, that other Sons might be had, but another Father could never be had. From hence he paſſeth through Italy, where much honour is done him both by the Pope, and other Princes; and then deſcends into Burgoigne, where by the Earl of Challoun, a ſtout man at arms, he is challenged at a Turnament, with a pretence to ſolemnize his preſence: but with a purpoſe indeed to diſgrace his perſon. And though Prince Edward in many reſpects might juſtly have refuſed it; yet the nobleneſs of his minde would not ſuffer him to paſs by any occaſion of ſhewing his Valour: and in this encounter he ſo foiled the Earl, as he made it appear, that Fame had been no lyar in the report it had made of him. And here a great part of his Engliſh Nobility met him, from whence he paſſed into France, where the King Philip his near Couſin (as being Siſters Sons) entertains him with great ſolemnity; and graceth his ſolemnity with ſo much courteſie, that it won Prince Edward voluntarily to do him homage for the Territories he held in France: and this voluntarineſs in Prince Edward won the King of France again to grant quietly unto him all the Lands in France that belonged to him; and ſo theſe two great Kings by reciprocal courteſie, effected that which their Predeceſſours by force could never effect. From hence he paſſeth through Aquitain, and having there taken homage of his Subjects, and ſet all things in order, he ſet ſail and arrived in England, above a year after the death of his Father; a long time for plotting of miſchief, and a ſtrong temptation to plotters of miſchief, if all cauſes of quietneſs had not concurred: but ſuch was the worthineſs of Prince Edward's perſon, and ſuch the undoubtedneſs of his Title; that as there could be no Competitor, ſo there would be no oppugner. And indeed the Divine Providence had ſhewed a ſpecial care over him from his Childehood; whereof one or two Examples will not be unfit to be related. One was this, that being yet but young, and playing one time at Cheſs with a Friend, in the midſt of his Game, without any apparent occaſion, he removed himſelf from the place where he ſate, when ſuddenly there fell from the roof of the houſe, a great ſtone, which if he had ſtayed in the place but never ſo little, had beaten out his brains. Another example of the Divine Providence over him, (though it happened afterwards) was this: Having prepared a great Fleet of Ships for a Journey into Flanders, and being at Winchelſey, where the Ships were to meet; it happened, that riding about the Harbour, his horſe frighted with the noiſe of a Wind-mill, which the winde drove violently about, ſcrambled up and leapt over the Mud-wall of the Town, ſo as neither the King nor the Horſe was to be ſeen, but every one judged the King could not chuſe but be thrown and killed: yet ſuch was the Divine Providence over him, that the Horſe lighted lighted upon his feet, and the King keeping the Saddle returned safe. And under the wing of this Divine Providence, he had now passed all the dangers of this tedious Journey; and being safely come to London, was on the fifteenth day of August in the year 1274. Crowned at Westminster, together with his Wife Queen Eleanor, by Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury, where five hundred great Horses were let loose for any that could take them; and yet the outward solemnity was not more great then the inward joy was universal; every man rejoycing, not only at a change, which of it self is pleasing: but at a change so much for the better, as this was like to be.

He is Crowned.

Of his Acts done after he was Crowned.

THE Acts of this King after he was Crowned, may not unfitly be divided into five parts: His Acts with his Temporal Lords; His Acts with his Clergy; then with Wales; then his Acts with Scotland: and lastly with France. And first concerning his Lords, he gave them good contentment in the beginning of his reign by enlarging their liberties, and granting them easier Laws; for which purpose he called a Parliament, wherein were made the Statutes called of Westminster the first: so as he had no difference with them, till toward the end of his Reign, as shall be shewed hereafter. In the next place, concerning his Acts with his Clergy, he began with them betimes; for having lived to be of good age, three or four and thirty years old, in his fathers reign, he observed in that time, that their power was too predominant, and therefore thought fit to clip their wings; at least to keep them farther from growing: which he did by these means. First, in the sixth year of his Reign, he deprived many chief Monasteries of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Covent of Westminster, the return of Writs granted them by the Charter of his Father, King Henry the third. The next year after he got to be enacted the Statute of Mortmain, to hinder the increase of their Temporal possessions. In the second Statute of Westminster, he defaulked the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Judges; and grewing more upon on them, he required the moiety of all their Goods, as well Temporal as Spiritual, for one year. Then calls he a Parliament of his Nobles at Salisbury, without admission of any Churchmen in it. And it is worth the noting, that Marchian his Treasurer, acquainting him that in Churches and Religious Houses, there was much Treasure to be had, if it might be taken, he made no scruple of it, but caused it to be taken and brought into his Exchequer. But finding his Prelates not well contented with it, to please them again, he bids them ask something of him, wherein they should see how much he favoured them. And they asking of him to repeal the Statute of Mortmain, that had been made so much to their hinderance, He answered, that this was a Statute made by the whole body of the Realm; and therefore was not in his power, who was but one Member of that Body, to undo that which all the Members together had done. And perhaps whatsoever they should have asked else, he would have had an answer to redeem his offer. And thus much concerning his Clergy.

He gives contentment to his Lords.

He abates the power of the Clergy.

In the next place are the Welsh, who had themselves begun with the King. For their Prince Leolyn being summoned to attend at his Coronation, refused to come; and afterwards at more leasure, being required to come and do him homage, he stood upon terms of safe conduct, pretending doubt to be used, as his Father Griffin had been: who upon hard usage in the Tower, seeking to make escape, fell from the Walls and brake his neck. But indeed it was alwayes a custom with this Nation, at every change of Princes in England, to try conclusions, hoping at one time or other, to have a day of it; and to change their yoke of Bondage into Liberty: for which they were never better provided then now, (especially which is the greatest matter in War) having a valiant Prince to their Leader. But there happened an accident which took off their edge at this time. For the Lady Eleanor, a Daughter of the late Earl Simon Montford, whom Prince Leolyn extreamly loved, passing out of France into Wales, was by the way upon the Sea taken by English Ships, and brought to King Edward; and for the love of her Prince, Leolyn was content to submit himself to any conditions; which besides subjection of his State, was to pay fifty thousand pounds sterling, and a thousand pounds per annum during his life. And upon these conditions the marriage with his beloved Lady was granted him, and was solemnized here in England; whereat the King and Queen were themselves present. Three years Leolyn continued Loyal, and within the bounds of obedience; in which time David, one of his Brothers, staying here in England, and found by the King to be of a stirring spirit, was much honoured by him, Knighted and matched to a rich widow, daughter of the Earl of Derby; and had given him by the King besides, the Castle of Denbigh, with a thousand pounds per annum: though (as it was afterwards found) he lived here but in the nature of a spy. For when Prince Leolyn's Lady was afterward dead, and that he (contrary to his Conditions formerly made) brake out into Rebellion, then goes his Brother David to him, notwithstanding all these favours of the King; and they together enter the English Borders, surprize the Castles of Flint and Rutland, with the person of the Lord Clifford, sent Justiciar into those parts: and in a great Battel overthrew the Earls of Northumberland, and Surrey, with the slaughter of Sir William Lindsey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many others. King Edward advertised of this Revolt and Overthrow, being then at the Vyzes in Wiltshire, prepares an Army to repress it; but before his setting forth, goes privately to his Mother Queen Eleanor, lying at the Nunnery of Aimsbury, with whom whilst he conferred, there was one brought into the Chamber, who feigned himself (being blinde) to have received his sight at the Tomb of King Henry the third. Assoon as the King saw the man, he remembred he had seen him before, and knew him to be a most notorious lying Villain, and wished his Mother in no case to believe him: but his Mother, who much rejoyced to hear of this Miracle, for the glory of her Husband, finding her Son unwilling that his Father ſhould be a Saint, grew ſuddenly into ſuch a rage againſt him, that ſhe commanded him to avoid her Chamber: which the King obeys; and going forth, meets with a Clergy-man, to whom he tells the ſtory of this Impoſtor, and merrily ſaid, He knew the juſtice of his Father to be ſuch, that he would rather pull out the eyes (being whole) of ſuch a wicked wretch, then reſtore them to their ſight. In this mean time the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had gone of himſelf to Prince Leolyn, and had laboured to bring him and his Brother David to a re-ſubmiſſion, but could effect nothing; for beſides other reaſons that ſwayed Prince Leolyn, the conceit of a Propheſie of Merlin, that he ſhould ſhortly be Crowned with the Diadem of Brute, ſo over-weighed him, that he had no ear for peace, and ſhortly after no head. For after the Earl of Pembroke had taken Bere Caſtle, which was the ſeat of Prince Leolyn, he was himſelf ſlain in Battel; and his head cut off by a common Souldier, was ſent to King Edward, who cauſed the ſame to be crowned with Ivy, and to be ſet upon the Tower of London. And this was the end of Leolyn, the laſt of the Welſh Princes, betrayed (as ſome write) by the men of Buelth. Not long after his Brother David alſo is taken in Wales, and judged in England to an ignominious death; firſt drawn at a Horſe tail about the City of Shrewsbury; then beheaded, the trunk of his Body divided, his heart and bowels burnt, his head ſent to accompany his Brother's on the Tower of London, his four quarters to four Cities, Briſtol, Northampton, York, and Wincheſter. A manifold Execution, and the firſt ſhewed in that kinde to this Kingdom, in the perſon of the Son of a Prince, or any other Noble-man that we read of in our Hiſtory. It is perhaps ſomething which ſome here obſerve, that at the ſealing of this Conqueſt, King Edward loſt his eldeſt Son Alphonſus, of the age of 12. years, (a Prince of great hope) and had only left to ſucceed him, his Son Edward lately born at Carnarvan, and the firſt of the Engliſh, intituled Prince of Wales, but no Prince worthy of either Wales or England. And thus came Wales to be united to the Crown of England, in the eleventh year of this King Edward's Reign; who thereupon eſtabliſhed the Government thereof, according to the Laws of England, as as may be ſeen by the Statute of Rutland, in the twelfth year of his Reign.

Prince Leolyn delayes to do his homage.

Wales united to the Crown of England.

The work of Wales being ſettled, King Edward paſſeth over into France, upon notice of the death of Philip the Hardie, to renew and confirm ſuch conditions as his ſtate in thoſe parts required, with the new King Philip the fourth, intituled the Fair; to whom he doth homage for Aquitain, having before quitted his claim to Normandy for ever. After three years and a half, being away in France, he returns into England; and now in the next place comes the buſineſs with Scotland, and will hold him work at times as long as he lives, and his Son after him. Alexander the third, King of Scots, as he was running his Horſe, fell Horſe and Man to the ground, and brake his neck, and died immediately; by reaſon whereof (he leaving no iſſue, but only a Daughter of his Daughter Margaret, who died alſo ſoon after, there fell out preſently great contention about ſucceſſion. Ten Competitors pretend Title, namely, Erick King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, Robert Bruce, Earl of Anandale, John de Baliol Lord of Galloway, John de Haſtings, Lord of Abergavenny, John Cummin Lord of Badenaw, Patrick de Dunbarre, Earl of March, John de Veſcie, Nicholas de Sules, William de Roſs; all or moſt of them deſcending from David Earl of Huntington, younger Brother to William King of Scots, and great Uncle to the late King Alexander. This title King Edward takes upon him to decide, pretending a Right of Superiority from his Anceſtors, over that Kingdom, and proving it by authority of old Chronicles, as Marianus Scotus, William of Malmsbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and others; which though the Scottiſh Lords who ſwayed the Inter-regnum oppoſed, yet are they conſtrained for avoiding of further inconveniences, to make him Arbiter thereof, and the ten Competitors bound to ſtand to his award. Two are eſpecially found, between whom the right lay, John de Baliol, Lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruce; the one deſcended from an elder Daughter: the other from a Son of a younger daughter of Alan, who had married the eldeſt Daughter of this David, brother to King William. The controverſie held long. Twelve of either Kingdom learned in the Laws, are elected to debate the ſame at Berwick, all the beſt Civilians in the Univerſities of France are ſolicited to give their opinions; all which brought forth rather doubts then reſolutions. Whereupon King Edward the better to ſway this buſineſs by his preſence, takes a journey Northward; where being come as far as Lincolnſhire, he loſt his beloved Wife Queen Eleanor, and thereupon going back to ſee her Funeral performed at Weſtminſter. That done he returns preſently to his Scottiſh buſineſs. And now ſix years were paſſed ſince the death of King Alexander, and yet nothing concluded in this controverſie; whereupon King Edward deals privately with Bruce, (who had the weaker title, but the more friends) and promiſeth him if he would ſwear fealty and homage to the Crown of England, he would inveſt him in that of Scotland. But Bruce anſwers, he was not ſo deſirous to rule, as thereby to infringe the liberties of his Countrey. Whereupon with the like offers he ſets upon Baliol, who having better right, but leſs leſs love of the people, and more greedy of a Kingdom then Honour, accepts the condition; and thereupon is Crowned King at Scone; hath fealty done him by all the chief Nobility, except Bruce; comes to New-Caſtle upon Tine, where King Edward then lay; and there with many of his Nobles, ſwears fealty, and doth homage to him as his Sovereign Lord. Which act done to ſecure him, overthrew him; for being little beloved before, hereby he became leſs. Such as ſtood for Bruce, and others of the Nobility (tender of the preſervation of their Countreys Liberty) took ſtomack againſt him; and not only for this, but ſhortly after for his injuſtice in the caſe of the Earl of Fife, one of the ſix Governours in the time of the Inter-regnum, regnum, who had been ſlain by the Family of Alberneth; the Brother of which Earl proſecuting Law before King Baliol, in his High Court of Parliament, and having no right done him (King Baliol giving judgement of the ſide of the Albernethe) he appeals to the Court of the King of England. Whereupon Baliol is ſummoned, appears, ſits with King Edward in his Parliament, till his cauſe was to be heard, and then is cited by an Officer to ariſe, and to ſtand in the place appointed for pleading; then he craves to anſwer by a Procurator, but is denied, and thereupon deſcends to the ordinary place, and defends his cauſe himſelf. Which indignity (as he took it) ſo incenſeth him, that he returns home with a breſt full charged with indignation, meditates revenge, renues the ancient league with France, confirms it with marriage of his ſon Edward to a daughter of Charles brother to King Philip, glad in regard of late offences taken againſt the King of England, to embrace the ſame: which done, Baliol defies King Edward, renounceth his Allegiance, as unlawfully done, being not in his power, without conſent of the State, to do any ſuch act. Hereupon brake out the mortal diſſention between the two Nations, which conſumed more Chriſtian blood, and continued longer then ever quarrel we read of did, between any two people in the world. For he that began it could not end it, but it laſted almoſt three hundred years, and was never throughly aboliſhed, till the late bleſſed union wrought by him, in whom Wiſdom and Vertue, Right and Power concurred all to make it firm. And now the fatal Chair in which the Kings of Scotland uſed to be inaugurated, ſeems to recover its ſecret operation according to ancient Propheſie, that whitherſoever that Chair ſhould be removed, the Kingdom ſhould be removed with it: and this Chair King Edward cauſed to be brought out of Scotland to Weſtminſter, and to be placed there amongſt the Monuments, where it ſtill continues. But now King Baliol being ſummoned to appear at New-Caſtle, and refuſing to come; King Edward enters Scotland with an Army conſiſting of four thouſand horſe, and thirty thouſand foot, beſides five hundred horſe and one thouſand foot of the Biſhop of Durham. Berwick is firſt won, with the ſlaughter of fifteen thouſand Scots, (our Writers ſay more) and after that, the Caſtles of Dunbar, Roxborough, Edenburgh, Sterling, and Saint Johns-Town: and King Baliol ſues for Peace, ſubmits himſelf, takes again his Oath of Fealty to King Edward as his Sovereign Lord. Which done, a Parliament for Scotland is held at Berwick, where the Nobility likewiſe did homage to him, confirming the ſame by their Charter, under their hand and ſeals; only William Douglaſs refuſeth, content rather to endure the miſery of a Priſon, then yield to the ſubjection of the King of England. But King Baliol notwithſtanding his ſubmiſſion, is ſent Priſoner into England after his four years reign in Scotland; and King Edward returns home, leaving John Warren Earl of Suſſex and Surrey, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Creſſingham Treaſurer, and Ormeſley Chief Juſtice, with Commiſſion to take in his name, the Homages and Fealties of all ſuch as held lands of that Crown. But this continued not long, for King Edward being abſent in France, the Scots fell upon the Officers he had left, ſlew Sir Hugh Creſſingham with ſix thouſand Engliſh, recovered many Caſtles, and regained the Town of Berwick; and all by the animation and conduct of one William Walleys, a poor private Gentleman, (though Nobly deſcended) Who ſeeing his Countrey without a Head, and thereby without a Heart (all the great men either in captivity, or ſubjection) aſſembles certain of as poor and deſperate eſtate as himſelf, and leads them to attempt upon whatſoever advantages they could finde to annoy the Engliſh, and having therein good ſucceſs, it ſo increaſed both his courage and company, that he afterward came to be the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom: and was in poſſibility to have abſolutely redeemed his Countrey from the ſubjection of the Engliſh, if the ſpeedy coming of King Edward had not prevented him. For now King Edward, to bring his work near together, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Juſtice to York, where they continued above ſix years; and thither he calls a Parliament, requiring all his Subjects that held of him by Knights ſervice, to be ready at Roxborough by a peremptory day: where there aſſemble three thouſand men at Arms on barded horſes, and four thouſand other armed men on horſe without bards, with an Army of Foot anſwerable, conſiſting moſt of Welſh and Iriſh, beſides five hundred men at Arms out of Gaſcoign. And with his power he makes his ſecond expedition into Scotland; the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Vaunt-guard at the famous battel of Fonkirk, where the ſhouts of the Scots were ſo great, that King Edward's horſe frighted withal, caſt him off, and brake two of his ribs, which notwithſtanding he gets up again, goes on, and gets victory; wherein are reported to be ſlain two hundred Knights, and forty thouſand foot of the Scots: but William Walleys, with ſome few, eſcaped to make more work. And here again that Kingdom might ſeem as if quite overthrown. Moſt of the eſtates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their titles) that had ſtood out, were beſtowed on the Engliſh; and a Parliament is called at Saint Andrews, where all the great men of that Kingdom, except only Walleys, once again ſwear Fealty to the King of England. It ſeems ſwearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a ceremony without ſubſtance, as good as nothing; for this is now the third time they ſwore Fealty to King Edward: yet all did not ſerve to make them loyal. For not long after comes the news of a new King made and Crowned in Scotland, Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, ſon to that Bruce who was competitor with Baliol, eſcaping out of England, becomes Head to the confuſed Body of that Kingdom; and perceiving John Cummyn (who had a title himſelf) to go about to bewray his intentions to King Edward, he finding him at Dunfrays, ſets upon him, and murthers him in the Church. Whereof as ſoon as King Edward heard, he ſends Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, and the Lords Clifford and Piercy, with a ſtrong power to revenge the death of Cummyn, and to relieve his Wardens of Scotland; who upon Bruce's revolt, were all retired to Berwick, whilſt himſelf prepares an army to follow: wherein to be the more nobly attended, he cauſed Proclamation to be Hereupon three hundred young Gentlemen, all the sons of Earls, Barons, and Knights, assemble at the day appointed, and receive Purples, Silks, Sindons, Scarfs, wrought with Gold or Silver, according to every mans Estate. For which train (because the Kings house was too little, by reason a part of it had been lately burnt) room is made, and the Apple-trees cut down at the new Temple for their Tents, where they attire themselves, and keep their Vigile. The Prince (whom the King then likewise Knighted, and gave him the Dutchy of Aquitain) kept his Vigile with his Train at Westminster; and the next day he girded these three hundred Knights with the Military Belt, in such manner as he himself had received it: Which done, the King before them all, makes a Vow, that alive or dead, he would revenge the death of Cummyn upon Bruce, and the perjured Scots; Adjuring his Son and all the Nobles about him, upon their Fealty, that if he died in this journey, they should carry his corps with them about Scotland, and not suffer it to be interred, till they had vanquished the Usurper, and absolutely brought the Countrey to subjection. The Prince and all the Nobles promise upon their faith, to imploy their utmost power to perform his Vow: and herewithal he sets forth with a potent Army, presently after Whitsuntide, and makes his last expedition into Scotland, in the four and thirtieth year of his reign; at which time he made above two hundred Knights.

King Edward makes a journey into Scotland to revenge the death of Cummyn.

1306. He treats the Scottish Army.

The Earl of Pembroke, with that power sent before, and aid of the Scottish party, had before the King arrived in Scotland, defeated in a battel near St. Johns-Town, the whole Army of the new King, and narrowly missed the taking of his person; but he escaping in disguise, and sheltring himself in obscure places, was reserved for greater Battels: his Brothers Nigel, Bruce and shortly after, Thomas, and Alexander a Priest, were taken and executed after the manner of Traytors at Berwick. And now King Edward had done for fighting, all was now for Executions; and indeed his desire of revenge made him inexorable, and vow to spare none of what degree soever. The Earl of Athol (though of Royal Blood, and allied unto him) was sent to London, where all his preferment was, to have a higher pair of Gallows then the rest. The wife of Robert Bruce, taken by the Lord Ross, is sent prisoner to London, and his daughter to a Monastery in Lindsey. The Countess of Boughan, who had been aiding at Bruce's Coronation, is put into a wooden Cage, and hung out upon the Wall of Berwick for people to gaze on. But though Bruce's party was thus dejected, and himself at this time appeared not, but shifted privily from place to place in a distressed manner, (attended only with two Noble Gentlemen, who never forsook him in his misfortunes, the Earl of Lenox and Gilbert Hay) yet gives he not over, but gathers new Forces, with which he suddenly assails the Earl of Pembroke at unawares, gives him a great defeat, and within three dayes after chaseth the Earl of Gloucester, into the Castle of Aire, where he besieged him, till by the Kings forces he was driven again to his former retire. Whereupon King Edward who had spent his Winter at Carlile, in July following, with a fresh Army enters Scotland himself; but falling into a Dysentery or Bloody Flux at Borough upon the Sands he ended his life. And thus ended King Edward's troubles with Scotland, but not Englands troubles, which are more to come then yet are past.

The Countess of Boughan's ignominious punishment.

King Edward enters Scotland, and there dieth.

But though this busines of Scotland never left King Edward till his dying day, yet it had been upon him but as an ague, sometimes putting him into violent heats, and sometimes leaving him in a quiet temper with such a vicissitude, that when he had quietness with Scotland, he had troubles with France, whereof the time is now to speak. It is well known that Philip King of France, father of the present King, and Edward King of England were near Cousins, the sons of two sisters; and it hath been shewed before at King Edward's returning from the Holy-Land, and passing through France, what extraordinary kindeness and mutual courtesie, passed between them, that one would have thought neither they nor theirs should ever have fallen out; and perhaps never should, if they had been private men, and not Princes. For private men may easily continue friends, as having none to consider but themselves; but Princes hardly, as having besides themselves, their Subjects to consider. And though they be the Subjects oftentimes that make the quarrel, yet they are the Princes that must maintain it. And besides, between Princes there can never be but jealousies, and where jealousies are, every trifle makes a quarrel. And this was the case of these two Kings. Certain of the King of England's Subjects had upon the Coast of Normandy, done spoil to some Subjects of the King of France: and this difference of the Subjects made a difference between the Kings, while each of them standing in defence of his own, fall out themselves; and for a beginning the King of France summons King Edward, as owing homage to that Crown, to appear and answer it in his Court. And King Edward, though voluntarily before he had done it in a way of courtesie, yet being now imperiously commanded, he refuseth it; upon which refusal, all his Territories in France are condemned to be forfeited, and an Army is presently sent to seise upon the same, led by Charles de Valois, and Arnold de Neel, Constable of France. Burdeaux with divers other pieces of importance, are taken from him. And now King Edward well knowing what danger it was to have so powerful an adversary, endeavours first to strengthen himself with friends abroad, seeks to match his son Edward with a daughter of Guy Earl of Flanders; marries one of his daughters to the Duke of Barre, who pretended title to Champaign; another to John Duke of Brabant; sends fifteen thousand pound sterling to Adolph de Nassaw, the Emperour, for recovery of certain Lands which he claimed in France; and with all these and many other confining Princes, he sets upon the King of France, and then sends over his brother Edmund Earl of Lancaster, the Earls of Lincoln, and Richmond, with eight and twenty Banners, seven hundred men at Arms, and a Navy of three hundred and ſixty ſail. In the mean time the King of France having had intelligence of the intended alliance between King Edward, and Guy Earl of Flanders, ſends for the ſaid Earl (as if knowing nothing thereof) to come with his Wife and Daughter, to make merry with him at Paris; where inſtead of feaſting him, he makes him Priſoner, and takes from him his Daughter, in regard he ſought (being his Vaſſal) to match her with his capital Enemy. The Earl excuſeth it the beſt he could; and by much mediation is releaſed himſelf, but not his Daughter. Whereupon the Earl, preſuming upon aid from King Edward, takes Arms and defies the King of France. Who thereupon comes with an Army of ſixty thouſand againſt him; which cauſed King Edward with all ſpeed poſſibly to relieve this diſtreſſed Earl: and ſo leaving the Government of the Kingdom in his abſence, to the Biſhop of London, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lords Raynold, Gray, and Clifford, with five hundred ſail, and eighteen thouſand men at Arms he paſſeth over into France. But finding the Countrey diſtracted into many popular factions, and the King of France daily getting upon them (having already won Lile, Doway, Courtray, Burges, and Dam) and the Emperour Adolph failing to ſend him aid as he had promiſed, he fell into great perplexity; and having ſtayed the whole Winter at Gaunt, where by reaſon of many outrages committed by his Souldiers, he was ſo affronted by the Gauntois, that his own perſon was not without ſome danger. He thereupon in the Spring of the year concludes a Truce with the King of France for two years, takes his ſiſter Margaret to wife, and affianceth the daughter of the ſame King to his ſon Prince Edward; and ſo returns into England. And theſe were all the troubles King Edward had with France.

A truce is concluded between them. King Edward marries his ſon Edward to a daughter of the King of France.

But now muſt ſomething be ſpoken of the troubles with his Lords at home, whereof this was the beginning. In a Parliament at Salisbury, the five and twentieth year of his reign, the King requires certain of his Lords to go to the Wars in Gaſcoin; which needed a preſent ſupply, by reaſon of the death of his Brother Edmund: but the Lords make all their excuſes, every man for himſelf: Whereupon the King in great rage threatned they ſhould either go, or he would give their Lands to others that ſhould. Upon this Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, High Conſtable, and Roger Bigot Earl of Norfolk, Marſhal of England, make their Declaration; that if the King went in perſon they would attend him, otherwiſe not. Which anſwer offended the King more, and being urged again, the Earl Marſhal proteſted he would willingly go thither with the King, and march before him in the Vant-guard, as by right of inheritance he ought to do: But the King told him plainly, he ſhould go with any other, though he went not himſelf in perſon. I am not ſo bound (ſaith the Earl) neither will I take that journey without you. The King ſwore by God, Sir Earl, you ſhall either go or hang: And I ſwear by the ſame Oath (ſaid the Earl) I will neither go nor hang; and ſo without leave departs. Shortly after the two Earls aſſemble many Noblemen, and other their friends to the number of thirty Bannerets; ſo as they were fifteen hundred men at Arms, well appointed, and ſtood upon their guard. The King like a prudent Prince, who knew his times, proſecutes them not as then; but lets the matter paſs, in regard that his buſineſs called him preſently into Flanders. When being ready to take ſhip, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and the Commons, ſend him a Roll of the grievances of his Subjects, concerning his Taxes, Subſidies, and other Impoſitions, with his ſeeking to force their ſervices by unlawful courſes: to which the King ſends anſwer, that he could not alter any thing without the advice of his Council, who were not now about him; and therefore required them, ſeeing they would not attend him in his journey, (which they abſolutely refuſed to do, though he went in perſon, unleſs he had gone into France or Scotland) that they would yet do nothing in his abſence prejudicial to the peace of the Kingdom: and that at his return, he would ſet all things in good order to their contentment. But having taken his journey, and being held there with long delayes, to his exceeding great expenſes, he was forced to ſend over for more ſupply of Treaſure; and thereupon gave order for a Parliament to be held at York, by the Prince, and (becauſe of his minority, for he was then but ſixteen years of age) by ſuch as had the managing of the Kingdom in his abſence: and to the end he would not be diſappointed of aid, he condeſcends to all ſuch Articles as were demanded, concerning the great Charter: promiſing from thenceforth never to charge his Subjects otherwiſe then by their conſents in Parliament, and to pardon all ſuch as had denied to attend him in this Journey. After this, in the 27. year of his Reign, a Parliament is called at Weſtminſter, wherein the promiſed confirmation of the two Charters, and the allowance of what diſafforeſtation had heretofore been made, was earneſtly urged, and in the end much ado granted; and that with omiſſion of the clauſe, Salvo Jure Coronæ noſtræ, which the King laboured to have inſerted, but the people by no means would agree; and the perambulation of the Foreſts of England was then committed to three Biſhops, three Earls, and three Barons. But ſome years after, in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Edward began to ſhew his reſentment of the ſtubborn behaviour of his Nobles towards him in times paſt; and ſo terrifies Roger Bigot, Earl Marſhal, that to recover his favour the Earl made him his Heir, in poſſeſſion; (though he had a Brother of his own, living) reſerving only to himſelf a thouſand pounds per annum, during his life. Of others likewiſe he got great ſums for the ſame offence. The Earl of Hereford eſcaped his fine by death; but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (whom he accuſed to have diſturbed his Peace in his abſence) he ſends over to Pope Clement the fifth, (who ſucceeded Boniface) that he might be cruſht with a double power. This Pope was Native of Burdeaux, and ſo the more regardful of the Kings deſire, and the King the more confident of his favour; which to entertain and increaſe, King Edward ſends him a whole furniſh of all Veſſels for his Chamber of clean Gold: which great gift ſo wrought with the Pope, that he untied the King from the Covenant made with his Subjects concerning their Charters,

His Taxations and wayes for raiſing of Money.

IF Taxations may ſuffer degrees of compariſon, it may not unfitly be ſaid of theſe three laſt Kings, that King John was in the Poſitive; his Son Henry the Third, in the Comparative; and this King Edward in the Superlative: For not only he far exceeded the two former, but he hath left a ſpell to all that come after, for ever coming near him: But then under the name of Taxations, we muſt include the wayes he took for raiſing of profit: but firſt in the way of Parliament. In the firſt year of his Reign was granted him a tenth of the Clergy for two years, beſides a fifteenth of them and the Temporalty. In his fifth year, a twentieth of their goods towards the Welſh Wars. In his ſeventh the old money was called in, and new coined; in regard it had been much defaced by the Jews, for which 297. were at one time executed in London: and this brought in profit of no ſmall value. In his eleventh year, he had a thirtieth of the Temporalty, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for his Wars in Wales. In the thirteenth, Eſcuage, forty ſhillings of every Knights Fee. In his fourteenth year he had a thouſand Marks of certain Merchants fined for falſe weights. In his nineteenth, the eleventh part of all moveables of the Clergy, and ſhortly after a tenth for ſix years. In his twentieth, William Marchian, then Lord Treaſurer of England, perceiving great riches to be in Churches and Religious Houſes, put it ſo into the Kings head, that they were all brought into the Kings Treaſury. In the eight year of his Reign he ſent out his Writ Quo Warranto, to examine by what Title men held their Lands, which brought him in much Money; till John Earl of Warren, being called to ſhew his Title, drew out an old ruſty Sword, and then ſaid he held his Land by that, and by that would hold it to death: which though it made the King deſiſt from his project, yet he obtained at that time a fifteenth part of the Clergy. In his ſeventeenth year he fined all his Judges for corruption: Sir Ralph Hengham, Chief Juſtice of the higher Bench, in ſeven thouſand Marks; Sir John Loveton, Juſtice of the lower Bench, in three thouſand Marks: Sir William Brompton, in ſix thouſand Marks: Sir Solomon Rocheſter, in four thouſand Marks: Sir Richard Boyland, in four thouſand: Sir Walter Hopton in two thouſand: Sir William Saham, in three thouſand: Robert Lithbury Maſter of the Rolls, in one thouſand: Roger Leiceſter, in one thouſand: Henry Bray, Eſcheator, and Judge for the Jews, in one thouſand: but Sir Adam Stratton chief Baron of the Exchequer, in four and thirty thouſand: and Thomas Wayland (found the greateſt Delinquent, and of the greateſt ſubſtance) had all his Goods and whole Eſtate confiſcated to the King, and himſelf baniſhed out of the Kingdom. In his eighteenth year he baniſhed the Jews; of whom there was at that time above fifteen thouſand in the Kingdom, who had all their Goods confiſcate, leaving them only means to bear their charges in going away.

In his four and twentieth year, he commanded a Subſidy to be levied upon all ſarplars of Wool going out of England; as likewiſe with Fells and Hides. In his five and twentieth year he calls a Parliament at St. Edmundsbury, where is granted the eight part of the Goods of good Towns, and all other people the twelfth. As for the Clergy they deſire to be excuſed, and refuſe to contribute, in regard of their many late payments; as in the two and twentieth year of his Reign they payed the moiety of their Goods. And in his three and twentieth year he ſeiſed into his hands all Priories, Aliens, and their Goods; beſides he had a loan of the Clergy, which amounted to a hundred thouſand pounds: but notwithſtanding upon this refuſal of the Clergy, the King puts all Clergy-men out of his Protection, whereby they were to have no Juſtice in any of his Courts; (A ſtrain of State beyond any of his Predeceſſors) which ſo amazed them, that in the end, the Archbiſhop of York, with the Biſhops of Durham, Ely, Saliſbury, and Lincoln, yielded to lay down in their Churches, the fifth part of all their goods towards the maintainance of the Kings Wars; whereby they appeaſed his wrath, and were received into grace. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by whoſe animation the reſt ſtood out, had all his goods ſeized on, and all the Monaſteries within his Dioceſs, taken into the Kings hands; and Wardens appointed to miniſter only neceſſaries to the Monks, converting the reſt to the Kings uſe: at length by much ſuit, the Abbots and Prieſts giving the fourth part of their goods, redeem themſelves, and the Kings favour. In the ſix and twentieth year of his Reign, at a Parliament holden at York, is granted him the ninth penny of the goods of the Temporalty: the tenth penny of the Clergy of the Dioceſs of Canterbury, and of York the fifth; and in this year alſo he raiſed the Impoſition upon every ſack of Wool, from a Noble to forty ſhillings. In his two and thirtieth year he ſends out a new Writ of Inquiſition, called Trailbaſton, for intruders on other mens Lands; who to oppreſs the right owner, would make over their Land to great men; for Batterers hired to beat men, for Breakers of Peace, for Raviſhers, Incendiaries, Murtherers, Fighters, falſe Aſſiſours, and other ſuch Malefactors: which Inquiſition was ſo ſtrictly executed, and ſuch Fines taken, that it brought in exceeding much treaſure to the King. As likewiſe did another Commiſſion at the ſame time, ſent forth to examine the behaviour of Officers, and Miniſters of Juſtice; wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. At this time alſo he called his Lords to account for their ſtubbornneſs ſome years before, in denying to attend him into Flanders; which brought him in profit anſwerable to their greatneſs that were called. After all this, in his four and thirtieth year, there is granted him the thirtieth penny of both Clergy and Laity, and the twentieth of all Merchants towards his journey into Scotland. And this may be ſufficient to ſhew his

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN the firſt year of his reign were made the Statutes called of Weſtminſter the firſt. In his twelfth year were made the Statutes of Acton Burnel. In the fourteenth year of his Reign were made Statutes called Additamenta Gloceſtriæ. He ordained ſuch men to be Sheriffs in every County, as were of the ſame County where they were to be Sheriffs. He ordained that Jews ſhould wear a cogniſance upon their upper garment, whereby to be known, and reſtrained their exceſſive taking of Uſury. In his time was alſo enacted the Statute of Mortmain. In his twelfth year, in the Quindenes of Saint Michael, the Juſtices Itinerants began to go their general Circuits. In his time new pieces of money were coined, and half pence of Silver, which were before of baſe mettal. In his time, three men for reſcuing of a Priſoner, arreſted by an Officer, had their right hands cut off by the wriſts. In his time all Jews were baniſhed out of the Realm. This King by Proclamation prohibited the burning of Sea-Coal in London and the Suburbs, for avoiding the noiſome ſmoak. In his eleventh years the Bakers of London were firſt drawn upon Hurdles, by Henry Walleys, Mayor, and Corn was then firſt ſold by weight. In this Kings time the Title of Baron which had before been promiſcuous to men of eſtate, was firſt confined to ſuch only as by the King were called to have voice in Parliament. In the ſixth year of this King, Michaelmas term was kept at Shrewsbury. In his twelfth, he divided Wales into Shires, and ordained Sheriffs there as are uſed in England.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN his time, at a Synod holden at Reading by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, it was ordained according to the Conſtitutions of the General Council, that no Eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhould have more then one Benefice, to whom belonged the Cure of Souls: and that every perſon promoted to any Eccleſiaſtical living, ſhould take the order of Prieſthood within one year after. In his time lived and died Pope Boniface the 8. of whom his Predeceſſor had propheſied: Aſcendes ut Vulpes, regnabis ut Leo, morieris ut Canis.

No Eccleſiaſtical perſon to have more then one Benefice

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

THis King founded the Abbey of the Vale-Royal in Cheſhire, of the Ciſteaux Order. In his time John Baliol King of Scots, builded Baliol Colledge in Oxford: alſo in his time, Walter Merton Lord Chancellour of England, and after Biſhop of Rocheſter, founded Merton Colledge in Oxford, who was drowned paſſing over the water at Rocheſter, there being at that time no Bridge, as now there is. In his time was finiſhed the new Work of the Church at Weſtminſter, which had been threeſcore and ſix years in building. In his time was laid the foundation of the Black-Friers beſides Ludgate, by Robert Kilwarby, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of Baynards-Caſtle: alſo in his time, his ſecond wife Queen Margaret began to build the Quire of the Grey-Friers in London. In his time was begun to be made the great Conduit in London, ſtanding againſt the Church called Acres in Cheap. In his time Henry Walleys, Mayor of London, cauſed the Ton upon Cornhil, to be a Priſon for night-walkers; and alſo builded a houſe called the Stocks, for a Market of fiſh and fleſh, in the midſt of the City. In this Kings time, Edmund Earl of Leiceſter, the Kings Brother, founded the Minories, a Nunnery without Algate. This King builded the Caſtle of Flint in Wales, and the Caſtle of Beaumaris in the Iſle of Angleſey, and the Caſtle of Carnarvan by Snowdon. Alſo in this Kings time, John Peckham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, founded a Colledge of Canons at Wingham in Kent.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN the ſecond year of this Kings Reign, there happened the greateſt rot of Sheep in England that ever was known, which continued five and twenty years; and came (as was thought) by one infected ſheep of incredible greatneſs, brought out of Spain by a French Merchant into Northumberland. In the fifteenth year of this Kings Reign, Wheat was ſold for ten groats a Quarter; where the next year after there was ſo great a dearth, that it was ſold for eighteen pence the Buſhel. In the ſeventeenth year of his Reign, there fell ſo much rain, that Wheat was raiſed from three pence the Buſhel, to ſixteen pence; and ſo increaſed yearly, till at laſt it was ſold for twenty ſhillings the Quarter. And this year the City of Carlile, and the Abbey with all the Houſes belonging to the Fryers Minors, was conſumed with fire. In his one and twentieth year a great part of the Town of Cambridge, with the Church of our Lady was alſo burnt. In the ſeven and twentieth year of his Reign his Palace at Weſtminſter, and the Monaſtery adjoyning were conſumed with fire. The Monaſtery of Gloceſter alſo was burnt to the ground. In this year alſo an Act of Common-Council by conſent of the King, was made concerning Victuals, a fat Cock to be ſold for three half pence, two Pullets for three half pence, a fat Capon for two pence half penny, a Gooſe four pence, a Mallard three half pence, a Partridge three half pence, a Pheaſant four pence, a Heron ſix pence, a Plover one penny, a Swan three ſhillings, a Crane twelve pence, two Woodcocks three half pence, a fat Lamb from Chriſtmas to Shrovetide, ſixteen pence, and all the year after for four pence; and Wheat was this year ſo plentiful, that a Quarter was ſold for ten groats. In his ſixteenth year it chanced ced in Gaſcoin, that as the King and Queen ſate in their Chamber, upon a Bed talking together, a Thunderbolt coming in at the Window behinde them, paſſed betwixt them, and ſlew two of their Gentlemen, that ſtood before them.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE had two Wives, his firſt was Eleanor Daughter to Ferdinand the third King of Spain,

Spain; and was married to him at Bures in Spain; who having lived with him ſix and thirty years, in a Journey with him towards Scotland, at Herdeby in Lincolnſhire ſhe dyed. In whoſe memory, and as monuments of her vertue, and his affection, King Edward cauſed Croſſes with her Statue to be erected in all chief places, where her Corps in carrying to Weſtminſter, reſted: as at Stamford, Dunſtable, St. Albans, Waltham, Cheapſide; and laſtly at the place called Charing-Croſs. She was buried in Weſtminſter, at the feet of King Henry the third, under a fair Marble Tomb, adorned with her Pourtraicture of Copper gilt. By this Wife King Edward had four ſons, and nine daughters; his eldeſt ſon, John; his ſecond, Henry; his third, Alphonſus; died all young in their Fathers time: his fourth ſon, Edward, called of Carnarvan, becauſe born there, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. Of his daughters, the eldeſt named Eleanor was firſt married by Proxy to Alphonſus King of Arragon; but he dying before the marriage ſolemnized, ſhe was afterward married at Briſtow to Henry Earl of Bary in France; by whom ſhe had iſſue ſons and daughters. Joan the ſecond daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, born at Acon in the Holy-Land, and thereof called Joan de Acres, was married to Gillert Clare, called the Red Earl of Gloceſter and Hereford, by whom ſhe had iſſue ſons and daughters. She ſurvived her husband, and was re-married to the Lord Ralph Monthermere; Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, from whom the now Vicount Montacute is deſcended. Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, was married to John Duke of Brabant: Berenger and Alice, their fourth and fifth daughters, dying young and unmarried. Mary their ſixth daughter, at ten years of age, was made a Nun in the Monaſtery of Aimsbury in Wiltſhire, at the inſtance of Queen Eleanor her Grandmother, who lived there. Elizabeth their ſeventh daughter, was firſt married to John Earl of Holland, Zealand, and Lord of Freezeland; he dying within two years, ſhe was afterward married to Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Brecknock, and High Conſtable of England, by whom ſhe had iſſue, ſons and daughters. Beatrice and Blanch, their eighth and ninth daughters, died young and unmarried. King Edward's ſecond wife was Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Philip King of France, called the Hardy, and ſiſter to Philip called the Fair. At eighteen years old ſhe was married to King Edward, being above threeſcore; yet at theſe unequal years ſhe had iſſue by him, two ſons and a daughter. Their eldeſt ſon was born at a little Village in Yorkſhire called Brotherton, and was thereof called Thomas of Brotherton. He was created Earl of Norfolk, and Earl Marſhal of England, after Roger Bigot, who died without iſſue. Their ſecond ſon Edmund was born at Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire, and of the place was ſo called. He was created Earl of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of John, and ſiſter and ſole Heir of Thomas Lord Wakes of Lydel in the County of Northampton; by whom he had iſſue two ſons and one daughter. His ſons Edmund and John died without iſſue. His daughter Jone for her beauty called the fair Maid of Kent, was married firſt to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury; and from him divorced, was re-married to Sir Thomas Holland, in her Right Earl of Kent, and Father of Thomas and John Holland, Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Huntington: and laſtly, ſhe was the Wife of Edward of Woodſtock, the Black Prince of Wales; and by him Mother of King Richard the ſecond. This Earl Edmund was beheaded at Wincheſter, in the fourth year of King Edward his Nephew. Eleanor the daughter of King Edward by his ſecond Wife Margaret, died in her childhood.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

King Edward called Longſhank, and why.

HE was tall of ſtature, higher then ordinary men by head and ſhoulders, and thereof called Longſhank; of a ſwarthy complexion, ſtrong of body, but lean; of a comely favour; his eyes in his anger ſparkling like fire; the hair of his head black and curled. Concerning his conditions, as he was in War peaceful; ſo in Peace he was warlike, delighting ſpecially in that kinde of hunting, which is to kill Staggs or other wilde Beaſts with Spears. In continency of life, he was equal to his Father; in acts of valour, far beyond him. He had in him the two Wiſdoms, not often found in any, ſingle; both together, ſeldom or never: An ability of judgement in himſelf, and a readineſs to hear the judgement of others. He ſeemed to be a great obſerver of opportunity (a great point of wiſdom in any, in Princes greateſt) and that he could bear an injury long, without ſeeking to revenge it; as appeared by his carriage toward the Earl Roger Bigot: whom when he ſaw his time, he called to account for an affront he had offered him divers years before. He was not eaſily provoked into paſſion, but once in paſſion, not eaſily appeaſed; as was ſeen by his dealing with the Scots, towards whom he ſhewed at firſt patience, and at laſt ſeverity. If he be cenſured for his many Taxations, he may be juſtified by his well beſtowing them; for never Prince laid out his money to more honour of himſelf, or good of his Kingdom. His greateſt unfortunateneſs was in his greateſt bleſſing; for of four ſons which he had by his Wife Queen Eleanor, three of them died in his own life time, who were worthy to have out-lived him: and the fourth out-lived him, who was worthy never to have been born.

Of his Death and Burial.

King Edward's admonition to his ſon.

IN his laſt expedition into Scotland, being at Carlile, he fell ſick; and lying in his deathbed, he ſent for his ſon Edward: to whom, beſides many admonitions to piety, he commended three things ſpecially; that he ſhould carry his bones about with him through Scotland, till he had ſubdued it; that he ſhould ſend his heart into the Holy Land, with ſevenſcore Knights to that War, and the two and thirty thouſand pounds, he had provided for thas purpoſe; and that he ſhould never recal Gaveſton from baniſhment: and ſoon after of a dyſentery or Bloody-Flux he died at Borough upon the Sands, 1307. Sands, the ſeventh of July, in the year 1307. when he had reigned four and thirty years, and ſeven months, lived threeſcore and eight years. Being dead, his Corps was brought to Waltham Abbey, and there kept the ſpace of ſixteen weeks, and after on Simon and Jude's day buried at Weſtminſter.

Men of Note in his time.

OF Martial men there were many, theſe eſpecially: John Earl of Warren, who oppoſed the Kings Inquiſition by Quo Warranto: and Roger Bigot, who gave the King an affront to his face. Of learned men alſo many, eſpecially theſe; John Breton Biſhop of Hereford, who compiled a Book of the Laws of England, called le Breton. Thomas Spot a Chronographer: John Everſden a Writer of Annals, and of this Kings Reign: Gregory Cairugent a Monk of Gloceſter, and a Writer alſo of Annals. John Peckham a Franciſcan Frier made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who writ many excellent works: John Reed an Hiſtoriographer: Thomas Bungey a Frier Minor, an excellent Mathematician: Roger Bacon a Franciſcan Frier, an excellent Philoſopher and Mathematician: Robert Kilwarby Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and after made a Cardinal: alſo Ralph Baldock Biſhop of London, who writ a Chronicle of England in the Latine Tongue: But above them all, though of another Countrey, Thomas Aquinas, born of a Noble Family, whoſe works are too famous to be ſpoken of; who going to the Councel holden at Lyons by Pope Gregory the tenth, died by the way.

Breton who made a Book of the Law.

THE

The LIFE and REIGN of KING EDWARD THE SECOND.

Of his Acts before, and at his Coronation.

1307. EDWARD of Carnarvan, eldeſt Son of King Edward the firſt, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, and never did Prince come to a Crown with more applauſe of Nobility and People: and there was good cauſe for it; for he had been trained up in all good courſes for Piety and Learning; he had ſeen the Government of his Father, from whoſe Example he could not but have learned many good Leſſons; he had been initiated in the wayes of State, having been left Governour of the Realm, and preſiding in Parliament in his Fathers abſence; and he was now three and twenty years old, a fit age for bearing the weight of a Scepter. And yet for all theſe advantages, there wanted not fears of him in the mindes of many, who could not but remember what pranks he had played not long before; how he had broken the Biſhop of Cheſter's Park, and in moſt diſorderly manner had killed his Deer, for which both himſelf had been committed to Priſon, and his friend Pierce Gaveſton baniſhed the Realm: and if he did ſuch things being but Prince, what might not be feared of him coming to be King? For ſeldom doth advancement in honour alter men to the better; to the worſe often, and commonly then when it is joyned with an authority that ſets them above controulment. Neither yet was their fear more out of what they had ſeen, then out of what they ſaw; for where he ſhould have endeavoured to accompliſh the charge his Father had given him on his death-bed, he ſeemed to intend nothing leſs, nothing more then wholly to break it; for he preſently called home Pierce Gaveſton from baniſhment: and the two and thirty thouſand pounds, which his Father had ſpecially appointed for the Holy War; either all or the moſt of it he beſtowed upon Gaveſton: And for carrying his Fathers bones with him about Scotland, it had been well if he had ſuffered them quietly to be laid at reſt in England. For after the corps had been kept above ground, ſixteen weeks in the Abbey of Waltham, and that the Biſhop of Cheſter, Walter Langton, the then Lord Treaſurer, and the Executor of his Fathers Will, was buſie in preparing for his Funeral, he ſent the Conſtable of the Tower to arreſt him, and impriſon him at Wallingford, ſeiſing upon all his Goods, and giving them to Gaveſton; and all for old grudges. And (that which ſeemed a high ſtrain of incongruity) before he had ſeen performed his Fathers Funerals, which was not till the 27. of October following, he entred into a Treaty of his own Nuptials; for going over to Boloigne, on the two and twentieth of January, he married Iſabel, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France: which marriage was honoured with the preſence of four Kings, the King of France himſelf, the King of Navarre his Son, the King of the Romans, and the King of Sicilie: and three Queens beſides the Bride, Mary Queen of France, Margaret the Dowager Queen of England, and the Queen of Navarre: and yet did Gaveſton exceed them all in bravery. This was obſerved by the Lords of England; and thereupon when his Queen and he came afterward to be Crowned, they went unto him, ſignifying what a hainous tranſgreſſion of his Fathers will it was to call home Gaveſton: and ſeeing the charge was no leſs given to them then to him, if he did not perform it they would; and therefore unleſs he would remove Gaveſton from the Court and Kingdom, they would hinder his Coronation from proceeding, which ſtruck ſuch a damp to Prince Edward's ſpirits, to think what a diſgrace it would be to him, if ſo many of his great friends being preſent, Charles of Valois the King of France's Brother, the Dukes of Britain and Brabant, the Count of Luxemburg, who was afterward Emperour, the Duke of Savoy, the two Dutcheſſes of Brabant and Artois, with many other Princes and great Ladies, if now his Coronation ſhould be called in queſtion, that he ſolemnly ſwore he would do what they deſired in the next Parliament, ſo they would be quiet now. And thereupon on the 24. day of February, in the year 1307. his Queen and he were both Crowned at Weſtminſter, by the hands of Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, by Commiſſion from Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being then in exile, and out of the Kingdom: At which ſolemnity there was ſo great a preſs of people, that Sir John Blackwel Knight was crowded to death. And now in the very act of his Coronation, there was given another provocation to the Lords againſt Gaveſton; for the King had appointed him to carry the Crown of Saint Edward before him, (the greateſt honour could be done to a Subject) which added to the other honours the King had done him, (for he had made him Earl of Cornwal, Lord of Man, and Lord Chamberlain) ſo incenſed the Lords, that they entred into conſultation how to ſuppreſs this violence of the King's affection; which ſhortly after they put in execution. Portion in money, King Edward had none with his Wife:

The diſorders of King Edward when he was Prince.

He breaks his Fathers admoniti-ons in all things.

He marries Iſabel the King of France's Daughter.

The Lords threaten to hinder his Coronation, unleſs he baniſhed Gaveſton.

1307.

He and his Queen are Crowned.

To carry Saint Edward's Crown at the Coronation, the greateſt honour a Subject could have done him.

Gaveſton's advancement in honours.

but the King of France gave him the Dutchy of Guyenne, which he had ſeiſed upon before, as confiſcate to him; and thereupon King Edward did him Homage for that Dutchy, and for the County of Ponthieu.

Of his differences with his Lords about Gaveſton.

WE ſhall have here no Quinquennium Neronis, No ſuch five years, as Nero afforded in the beginning of his Reign; but this King at the firſt entrance will ſhew what he is, and what he will continue to be as long as he lives; for though he took ſome great and grave men to be of his Council, yet (as appeared afterward) he did it rather to the end they ſhould be pliant to him, then that he had any meaning to apply himſelf to them. For let them ſay what they would, Gaveſton muſt be the Oracle; all the Kings actions were but Gaveſton's impreſſions. And now Gaveſton preſently after the Coronation, to let the world be a witneſs of his worthineſs, and that the King had not beſtowed his favours upon him without cauſe, cauſed to be publiſhed a Turnament at Wallingford; whither came all the great Lords of the Kingdom, as Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, Humphrey Earl of Hereford, Aymer Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Warren, with many others, all valiant men at Arms: yet none had the honour of the day like to Gaveſton. And thus far he did well, if he could have ſtayed here, if having gotten true glory, he had not fallen into vain-glory. For the Lords envied him not ſo much for his advancement in honours, as they hated him for his inſolency in Manners; for in a ſcornful pride he would be caſting ſcoffs upon them all, calling Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, the Stage-Player; the Earl of Lincoln Burſten-belly; Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, Joſeph the Jew; and Guy Earl of Warwick the black Dog of Ardern. Which ſcoffs together with his other inſolencies, drew ſuch a party upon him, that in the next Parliament, the whole Aſſembly obtains of the King to draw Articles of their grievances, of which the chief were; that the great Charter of Magna Charta ſhould be obſerved; that all ſtrangers ſhould be baniſhed the Court and Kingdom; that the buſineſſes of the State ſhould be treated of by the Counſel of the Clergy and the Nobles; and that the King ſhould not begin any War, nor go out of the Kingdom without conſent of the Parliament. Which Articles though ſeeming harſh to the King, yet for avoiding of further inconvenience, he yields unto them; and ſpecially to the baniſhment of his minion Gaveſton, as hoping that would excuſe him for all the reſt: and Robert of Winchelſey, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, lately called home from exile, pronounceth excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhould oppoſe the Articles. Hereupon Gaveſton is ſent away into Ireland, where he lived a while, not as a baniſht man, but as Lieutenant rather of the Countrey; and indeed not unworthily. For in the time of his being there, he is ſaid to have made a journey into the Mountains of Dublin, and to have broken and ſubdued the Rebels there; built New-Caſtle in the Kerns Countrey, repaired the Caſtle of Kevyn, and paſſed up to Munſter and Thoumond, performing every where much ſervice, with great valour and worthineſs, that if he had ſtayed there but a while longer, he might perhaps by his deſerts in Ireland have redeemed his defects in England: but the King impatient of his abſence, and asking advice what means might be uſed to recal him, It was told him, that if he could but match him with the Earl of Glocester's Siſter, a man of ſuch greatneſs, and ſo beloved of the people, for his ſake certainly no man would grudge at his coming home. Hereupon the King ſends for Gaveſton, and makes up the Match between them; and married they were at Barkamſtead. But this did no good, for Gaveſton ſtill working upon the King in ſuch manner, that he ſcarce left him means to ſuſtain himſelf, and as little to maintain the Queen, nothing being done, but as Gaveſton would have it, put the Lords into a new diſcontentment: who thereupon went again to the King and told him plainly, that unleſs he would put Gaveſton out of the Court and Kingdom, they would riſe up in arms againſt him as a perjured King. This put the King into a great ſtrait: loth he was to leave Gaveſton, and fearful he was to provoke the Lords; in the end his fear prevailing over his love, he was content he ſhould be baniſhed; and in ſuch ſort baniſhed, that if ever he returned, or were found in the Kingdom, he ſhould be held and proceeded againſt as an enemy of the State. So once again is Gaveſton ſent packing out of the Kingdom, and goes into France, but found no ſafe harbouring there; For the King of France hearing of it, gave a ſtrait charge, if he were found in his Dominions to apprehend him. Then he paſſeth into Flanders, but is no ſafer there then in France. After, waving about, and finding no place to reſt in ſafety, he returns ſecretly into England, relying upon the Kings love, and the Duke of Glocester's favour. The King receives him as an Angel ſent from heaven; and to be out of the Lords eye, goes a journey to York, taking Gaveſton along with him: and there thinks to be in quiet. But the Lords hearing of it, follow him thither, chuſing for their General Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, a man poſſeſs'd of five Earldoms, Lancaſter, Leiceſter, Ferrers, Lincoln, and Saliſbury, beſides the Liberties of Pickering, and the honour of Cockermore, and other Lands in Wales; and there was not a man of the whole Nobility that was not of the Party, but only Gilbert Earl of Glocester, the Kings ſiſters Son. Theſe Lords ſent to the King, either to deliver Gaveſton into their hands, or at leaſt to ſend him peremptorily out of the Kingdom. But the King led by ill counſel, and little regarding the Lords meſſage, takes Gaveſton with him to New-Caſtle upon Tine, thence to Tinmouth, where the Queen then lay, (who though great with Childe, and entreating the King with tears to ſtay with her) yet ſuch was his deſire to ſee Gaveſton put into ſome place of ſecurity, that hearing of the Lords approaching, he took a Ship, and paſſed with Gaveſton to Scarborough; and leaving him there in a ſtrong Caſtle, not eaſie to be won, he went himſelf into Warwickſhire, perhaps that the Lords might ſee he had not Gaveſton with him. But the Lords hearing where Gaveſton gets the prize in a publick Turnament.

He caſts ſcoffs upon all the Lords.

Articles required by the Lords of the King.

Gaveſton is baniſhed into Ireland, where he doth many good ſervices.

Gaveſton is ſent back, and marries the Earl of Glocester's ſiſter.

The Lords require Gaveſton's baniſhment.

So once again he is baniſhed.

1310.

But ſoon returns again.

The King ſeeks to ſhelter him.

Gaveſton is taken by the Lords.

where Gaveſton was, aſſaulted the Caſtle with ſuch violence, that Gaveſton ſeeing no means to eſcape, was content to render himſelf: requeſting only that he might but once be allowed to ſee the Kings face; and the King hearing he was taken, deſired as much. To which the Earl of Pembroke conſented; and taking Gaveſton into his cuſtody, promiſed upon Forfeiture of all he had, to have him forth coming: but deſiring to be with his Wife that night, who lay not far off, at Dedington, he delivers him to his ſervants to carry to Wallingford; from whom as they paſſed by Warwick, the Earl of that place hearing of it, took him forcibly from his Keepers, and brought him to his own Caſtle. Where after long deliberation, whether it were wiſdom to ſuffer Gaveſton to ſpeak with the King or no, it was at laſt concluded to take off his head; which at a place thereby called Blacklow, was preſently put in execution. His corps was carried to Oxford, and kept there two years, till the King cauſed it to be brought to Langley, and there builded a Monaſtery of purpoſe, where his ſoul ſhould be prayed for.

1311.

Is beheaded at Blacklow.

The King builds a Monaſtery of purpoſe to pray for his ſoul.

Gaveſton's Parentage.

This Gaveſton was the Son of a Gentleman of France, who had done good ſervice for King Edward the firſt in France; and for his ſake this Son of his was taken and brought up with the Prince. A man of excellent parts of body, and of no leſs endowments of minde. Valiant and Witty: to which if we might adde Vertuous, he had been compleat: Though the Lords (whether they had heard ſo, or whether they ſaid it to wean the King from him) told the King, that his Father was a Traitor to the King of France, and for the ſame was executed; and that his Mother was burnt for a Witch; and that this Gaveſton was baniſhed out of France for conſenting to his Mothers Witchcraft; and that he had now bewitched the King himſelf. But why ſhould the Lords be ſo violent againſt Gaveſton? Might not the King place his affection where he pleaſed? Might not he make his own choice of what companion he liked? No doubt he might; and ſo he ſhould: but yet in this caſe the Lords had great cauſe to do as they did; both in regard of the King, of themſelves, and of the Commonwealth. It is true, if the valour of Gaveſton could as well have made the King valiant, as his riot made him riotous, there might ſome good have come of their extraordinary conjunction: but ſeeing vertues are but perſonal, vices only are communicative, It now made the King not only more vicious then otherwiſe he would have been, but vicious where otherwiſe he would not have been; and therefore great cauſe in regard of the King to remove Gaveſton from his company; and no leſs in regard of the Lords themſelves. For Gaveſton's advancing was their debaſing; his greatneſs with the King made them but Cyphers: but in regard of the Commonwealth, moſt cauſe of all; for while the King was altogether ruled by Gaveſton, and Gaveſton himſelf was altogether irregular, the Common-wealth could have but little hope of Juſtice, but was ſure to ſuffer as long as Gaveſton was ſuffered. And this may be ſufficient to juſtifie the Lords, that it be not interpreted to be Rebellion, which was indeed but Providence.

Of his Troubles with Scotland.

AND now we have ſeen two of the charges of his Fathers Will broken by the King, and puniſhed in him; the two and thirty thouſand pounds appointed for the Holy War, beſtowed upon Gaveſton, and the King for it puniſhed himſelf with want; Gaveſton called home from baniſhment, and the King for it puniſhed with the loſs of his Subjects love. It remains to ſee how well he performed the third charge of his Fathers will, for ſubduing of Scotland. It was now the ſixth year after the death of his Father King Edward; and Robert Bruce now gotten to be King of Scotland, had ſtayed all this while to ſee how this new King Edward would prove. And when he found by the courſes he held, that he was like to prove a good eaſie enemy, he thereupon took heart, and began to ſtir, and in a very ſhort time had brought almoſt all Scotland under his obedience; and finding no oppoſition he entered the Engliſh Borders, took and burnt Towns: that now King Edward, unleſs he would ſit ſtill, and ſuffer Bruce to come and pull his Crown from his head, he could not chuſe but do ſomething to ſtop his proceeding. Hereupon he prepares an Army, but like himſelf, fitter for a Court then for a Camp. Many men and great bravery; but readier to take ſpoils, then to make ſpoil: and accordingly they ſpeed. For going to raiſe the ſiege at Striveling, defended for King Edward, by the valiant Knight Philip Mowbray, the Kings Army conſiſting of a hundred thouſand, was defeated and overthrown by the Scots Army, conſiſting of ſcarce thirty thouſand: So true is that ſaying of an ancient Souldier, There is more hope of an Army where the General is a Lion, though the Souldiers be but Sheep, then of an Army where the General is a Sheep, though the Souldiers be Lions. But indeed the Scots beſides Valour uſed Policy; For having in their own Army none but Foot, no Horſe at all, they had made Trenches in the ground three foot deep, covering them with Twigs and Hurdles, where the Engliſh Horſemen were to paſs; who floundring in thoſe Trenches, were killed no leſs by their own Fellows, then by the Enemy. In this Battel, called of Bannocks-Borough, were ſlain the Lord Mawle, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Tiptoft, the Lord William Marſhal, Sir Giles, Doctor Argenton, and ſeven hundred Knights and Eſquires, ſpecially Gilbert Earl of Gloceſter, who had ſhewed much valour that day; and whom the Scots would willingly have kept for ranſome, if they had known him: but he had forgotten to put on his Coat of Arms whereby to be known. The ſlaughter of common Souldiers was certainly great, though perhaps not ſo great as Hector Boetius ſpeaks of, who ſaith they were fifty thouſand. There were taken Priſoners Humfrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, John Seagrave, John Claveringham, William Latimer, and Sir Roger Northbrook, bearer of the Kings Shield; the King himſelf with the Biſhops, the Earls of Hartford, and Pembroke, and Hugh Spencer, ſaved themſelves by flight: Humfrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford was afterward releaſed in exchange

Bruce enters the Engliſh Borders.

King Edward's Army of 100. thouſand overthrown by the Scots.

The Scots Stratagem.

The Battel of Bannocks-Borough.

The North parts from Carlile to York in subjection to the Scots.

for Bruce's Wife, who had been long kept a prisoner in England. After this many Engliſh fell away to the Scots; and all the North parts from Carlile to York, came under their ſubjection: and the Engliſh grew ſo faint-hearted, and into ſuch contempt, that three Scots durſt venture upon a hundred Engliſh, when a hundred Engliſh durſt ſcarce encounter with three Scots. And what can be thought the cauſe of this great diſaſter to this King, but the want of his Fathers Bleſſing for not performing the charge he gave him dying, which is commonly accompanied with the want of a higher Bleſſing, without which a Vacat is ſet upon the labours of men, that makes them all fruſtrate? But Bruce not ſatisfied with his acqueſts in England, ſends his Brother Edward into Ireland alſo; who ſo far prevailed, that many Iriſh came in unto him, and in the end crowned him King of a great part of that Iſland: and ſo he continued the ſpace of three years, till the Primate of Armagh, and the Lord Brinningham, Juſticiar of Ireland, gathering Forces together oppoſed him, and in a Battel taking him Priſoner at Dundalk cut off his head, with the ſlaughter of many thouſands of the Scots beſides. With which the Scots are ſo incenſed, that they invade again the Engliſh borders, forraging as far as York; whereupon a Parliament is aſſembled at London, wherein an aid is granted of armed men to go againſt them. London ſets forth two hundred, Canterbury forty, Saint Albans ten, and ſo proportionably for all Cities and Boroughs, whereby a great Army was levied: which coming to York, through mutiny, emulation, and other impediments was ſoon diſſolved, and returned back without effecting any thing. Not long after the Town of Berwick was betrayed to the Scots, through the Treaſon of Peter Spalding the Governour, and other Engliſh men; whom the King of Scots to make them an example, cauſed to be hanged for being Traitors to their Countrey. King Edward hearing of the ſurrendring of Berwick, raiſeth an Army, and beleaguers it; but the Scots to divert his Forces, enter upon England by other wayes, and were like to have ſurpriſed the perſon of the Queen, lying then near York. The ſiege of Berwick is notwithſtanding eagerly continued, and the King in great poſſibility to have regained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaſter with his followers withdrawn himſelf upon diſcontent; hearing the King ſay he would give the keeping thereof to Hugh Spencer the younger, who was now grown a ſpecial Favourite of the Kings, and therefore not to be endured by the Earl. In the mean time the Scots won the Caſtles of Harbottle, Wark, and Midford, ſo as they poſſeſſed the greater part of all Northumberland, burning all before them till they came to Rypon, which Town they ſpoiled; and tarrying there three dayes, they received a Thouſand Marks to ſave the Town from burning, as they had done the Towns of Northallerton, Borough-Bridge, and others. In their returning back they burnt Knaresborough, and Skipton in Craven, and all other before them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous number of Cattel, beſides Priſoners, men and women. The Yorkſhire men thus grievouſly endammaged, gather together the number of ten thouſand; and at the Town of Mitton, ten miles from York, encounter the Scots, where they loſt three thouſand of their men, and were defeated: which Battel, becauſe of the many ſpiritual men that were in it, was called the White Battel. Whereof when the King heard he left the ſiege of Berwick, to follow the Scots, but they returned another way. The year following, King Edward once again with a great Army entered Scotland; but the Scots having deſtroyed all afore, the King oppreſſed with Famine, was forced to return, whom the Scots followed, and in a place of the Foreſt of Blackmore ſet upon him, that he hardly eſcaped; where were taken John Earl of Britain, and the Lord of Silaico, the French Kings Ambaſſadour, and many other. After this King Edward finding the Scots either too ſtrong or too wily for him, made a truce with them for two years, ſome ſay for thirteen. And this was the ſucceſs of this unfortunate King in his Wars with Scotland.

Edward Bruce crowned King of Ireland: but after three years is taken priſoner, and beheaded.

Of his Troubles at home.

BUT his troubles abroad were not ſo grievous as thoſe at home; or rather, they were thoſe at home that made his troubles abroad ſo grievous. For though the Lords having made an end of Gaveſton, and cut off his head, thought they had made an end of their need to bear Arms, and had cut off the head of all their diſcontents; yet as if Gaveſton had been a Phœnix, as it were out of his aſhes another Phœnix riſeth preſently up, and puts the Lords to as much trouble as ever Gaveſton did. For now the younger Spencer upon a ſudden grows as great a favourite of the Kings as ever Gaveſton was: and indeed in all points juſt ſuch another, equal to him in goodlineſs of perſonage, in favour of the King, and in abuſing the Lords. For though they were the Lords themſelves that brought him at firſt to be the Kings Chamberlain, the rather (as was thought) becauſe he was one whom the King did not love: yet being once in the place, he ſo won upon the King by diligent ſervice, and by complying with the Kings humour, that he brought the King at laſt to comply with his humour, and nothing muſt be done but as Spencer would have it. It ſeems it was the Kings nature that he could not be without a boſom-Friend; one or other to be an alter idem: and to ſeek to remove ſuch a one from him, was to ſeek to remove him from himſelf: as impoſſible a thing as to alter nature. Yet the Lords being more ſenſible of their own grievance, to be inſulted on by a Favourite, then of the Kings grievance to be affronted by his Subjects, are more intentive to work their own ends then the Kings; and therefore to remove Spencer and his Father from the King, which they knew was a work not to be done but by ſtrong hand, they continue their Arms; and confederating together, they ſend to the King, peremptorily requiring the confirmation and execution of the Articles formerly granted; threatning withal, that unleſs he preſently perform the ſame, they would conſtrain him to it by force of Arms: and thereupon aſſemble ſtrong Forces about Dunſtable, where the King then then lay. The great Prelates of the Kingdom, with the Earl of Gloceſter, labour to appeaſe them; and with two Cardinals ſent lately by the Pope, to reform theſe diſorders, they repair to Saint Albans, and deſire conference with the Lords, who receive them peaceably: but the Letters which the Pope had written to them, they refuſe to receive, ſaying, They were men of the Sword, and cared not for reading of Letters; that there were many worthy and learned men in the Kingdom, whoſe counſel they would uſe, and not ſtrangers, who knew not the cauſe of their commotion: ſo the Cardinals with this anſwer returned to London. But the Prelates of England ſo labour the buſineſs, that the Lords were content to yield up to the King ſuch Horſes, Treaſure, and Jewels, as they had taken of Pierce Gaveſton at New-Caſtle, ſo as the King would grant their Petitions; and thereupon John Sandal Treaſurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Warle keeper of the Wardrobe, are ſent to Saint Albans to receive thoſe things at their hands.

Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains of the great contempt was had of him by the Barons, their riſing in Arms, their taking and murthering Pierce Gaveſton, and ſuch other affronts: whereunto with one accord they anſwer, that they had not offended therein, but rather merited his love and favour; having taken Arms, not for any contempt of his Royal Perſon, but to deſtroy the publick enemy of the Kingdom, which otherwiſe would never have been done. Which ſtout reſolution of theirs, the Queen with the Prelates and the Earl of Gloceſter ſeeing, they ſeek by all means to qualifie their heat; and at length ſo prevailed with them, that they humble themſelves to the King, and crave pardon for that they had done, which they obtained; and the King receives them into grace, as his loyal Subjects, grants them their Articles, and particular pardons by his Charter, for their Indemnity concerning the death of Gaveſton. And for the greater ſhew of true reconcilement, Guy de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, is made of the Kings Counſel, though ſhortly after he had ended his life; not without ſuſpicion of poyſon: as being a man much envied by ſuch as poſſeſt the King. The King kept his Chriſtmas at Clipſton, and his Eaſter at Clarendon; and they ſeemed to be all good friends: but this reconcilement of the King with his Barons, was but as the covering of fire with aſhes, every little winde that blew, made it break out into flames afreſh; and the time being ſo unſettled as it was, it was impoſſible but ſuch windes would continually be blowing. It was ſuch a winde blew, when the great Earl of Lancaſter had his Wife (a Lady who had lived with him alwayes in good fame) taken out of his houſe at Canford in Dorſetſhire, by one Richard Saint Martin, a deformed lame Dwarf, who challenged her to be his Wife; and had lien with her before the Earl married her. And this winde was made to blow the ſtronger, by the Ladies own confeſſion; for upon examination, ſhe voluntarily averred, it was all true: and thereupon the ugly fellow in her right, claimed the two Earldoms of Lincoln and Saliſbury, which he durſt not have done, if he had not been back't with great Abbettours: and it was not without aſperſion upon the King himſelf. It was another ſuch winde blew, when at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, at dinner in the open Hall at Weſtminſter, a woman fantaſtically diſguiſed, entred on horſeback, and riding about the Table, delivered the King a Letter, wherein was ſignified the great neglect he ſhewed of ſuch as had done him and his Father Noble ſervices, taxing him for advancing men of unworthy parts, and ſuch other complaints. Which Letter read, and the woman departed, put the King into a great rage; they who guarded the door being ſharply reprehended for ſuffering her to enter in ſuch manner, anſwered, It was the faſhion of the Kings houſe in times of Feſtivals, to keep out none that came as this woman did, to make ſport. Search being made for the woman, ſhe is found, and examined who ſet her on; ſhe confeſſed a Knight gave her money to do it; the Knight is found, and upon examination, boldly anſwered, he did it for the Kings honour, and to no other end, and thereupon eſcaped without further trouble. It was ſuch another winde blew, when a Knight was taken paſſing by Pomfret, with Letters ſealed with the Kings Seal, directed to the King of Scots, about murthering the Earl of Lancaſter; which meſſenger is executed, his head ſet upon the top of the Caſtle, and the Letters reſerved to witneſs the intended plot. Which whether it were feigned or true, the report thereof reflected upon the King; and made many to take the Earls part. It was ſuch another winde blew, when a fanatick fellow, one John Powdras, a Tanners Son of Exeter gave forth, that himſelf was the true Edward, eldeſt Son of the late King Edward the firſt, and by a falſe Nurſe was changed in his Cradle; and that the now King Edward was a Carters Son, and laid in his place. But this winde was ſoon blown over, when at his death, being drawn and hanged, he confeſſed he had a familiar Spirit in his houſe in the likeneſs of a Cat, that aſſured him he ſhould be King of England; and that he had ſerved the ſaid Spirit three years before to bring his purpoſe about. But moſt of all, it was ſuch a wind blew, when a Baron named William Brewis, having waſted his eſtate, offers to ſell unto divers men, a part of his Inheritance called Powis; Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, obtains leave of the King to buy it, and bargains for it. The two Roger Mortimers, Uncle and Nephew, great men likewiſe in thoſe parts, not underſtanding, it ſeems, any thing of the former bargain, contract alſo for the ſame Land with the ſaid Sir William Brewis. Hugh Spencer the younger, hearing of this ſale, and the Land adjoyning to part of his, obtains a more ſpecial leave of the King, being now his Chamberlain, and buyes it out of their hands. The Earl of Hereford complains hereof to the Earl of Lancaſter, who thereupon at Sherbourne enters into a new confederation with divers Barons there aſſembled, taking their Oaths intermutually, to live and dye together in maintaining the Right of the Kingdom, and to procure the baniſhment of the two Spencers, Father and Son, whom they now held to be the great Seducers of the King, and the oppreſſours of the State, diſpoſing of all things in Court

And under this pretence they take Arms, and coming armed to St. Albans, they ſend to the King, being then at London, the Biſhops of London, Saliſbury, Hereford, and Chicheſter, (who were there aſſembled to conſult for peace) requiring him as he tendred the quiet of the Realm, to rid his Court of thoſe Traitors, the Spencers, condemned in many Articles of high Treaſon, by the commonalty of the Land; and withal to grant his Letters Patents of Pardon and Indemnity both to them and all ſuch as took part with them.

The King anſwers for them.

The King returns anſwer, that Hugh Spencer the father was now beyond the Seas, imployed in his buſineſs, and his ſon was guarding the Cinqueports, according to his office; and that it was againſt Law or Cuſtom they ſhould be baniſhed without being heard: and withal ſwore he would never violate the Oath made at his Coronation, by granting Letters of Pardon to ſuch notorious Offenders, who contemned his perſon, diſturbed the Kingdom, and violated the Royal Majeſty. Which anſwer ſo exaſperated the Lords, that preſently they approached to London; and lodged in the Suburbs, till they had leave of the King to enter into the City, where they peremptorily urge their demands. To which at length by mediation of the Queen, and the chief Prelates, the King is brought to condeſcend; and by his Edict, publiſhed in Weſtminſter-Hall, by the Earl of Hereford, the Spencers are baniſhed the Kingdom.

But at laſt yields to their baniſhment.

Hugh the Father hearing it, keeps beyond the Seas, but the Son ſecretly hides himſelf in England, expecting the turn of a better ſeaſon. And indeed ſhortly after the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in a Council holden at London, pronounceth the baniſhment of the Spencers to have been erroneous; and thereupon the Edict is revoked, and the Spencers are called home, and ſet in as great authority as they were before.

But ſoon revoked.

But the Lords having thus obtained their deſire, with the Kings Letters of indemnity, return home; but yet not with ſuch ſecurity as to give over the proviſion for their own defence. Not long after there fell out an unexpected accident, that ſuddenly wrought the Lords confuſion. The Queen making her progreſs towards Canterbury, intended to lodge at the Caſtle of Leeds, belonging to the Lord Badleſmere, (who had been long the Kings Steward, but now took part with the Lords) and ſending her Marſhal to make ready for her and her train, they who kept the Caſtle told him plainly, that neither the Queen nor any elſe ſhould enter there without Letters from their Lord. The Queen her ſelf goes to the Caſtle, and receives the like anſwer; whereupon ſhe is driven to take ſuch lodging otherwhere as could be provided. Of which indignity ſhe complains to the King, who took it ſo to heart, that preſently with a power of armed men out of London, he layes ſiege to the Caſtle, takes it, hangs the Keeper Thomas Colepepper, ſends the Wife and Children of the Lord Badleſmere to the Tower, and ſeiſeth upon all his Goods and Treaſure. And having this power about him, and warmed with ſucceſs and the inſtigation of the Queen, ſuddenly directs his courſe to Chicheſter, where he keeps his Chriſtmas, and there provides for an Army againſt the Barons: whereof many (ſeeing the Kings power encreaſing) left their Aſſociates, and yield themſelves to his mercy. Amongſt whom were the two Roger Mortimers, men of great might and means; the Lord Hugh Audeley, the Lord Maurice Barkley, and others: who notwithſtanding, contrary to their expectation, were ſent to divers Priſons. The Earls of Lancaſter and Hereford ſeeing this ſudden change, withdrew themſelves and their company from about Gloceſter, towards the North parts; whom the King follows with an Army, wherein were the Earls of Athol and Angus: and at Burton upon Trent, where they had made a head, diſcomfited their Forces, and put them to flight. In the mean time the Earl of Lancaſter had ſent into Lancaſhire a Knight of his, named Robert Holland, (one whom he had brought up of nought) to raiſe more Forces amongſt his Tenants; but he hearing of this flight of his Lords, goes with his Forces to take the Kings part. Which ſo diſmayes the Earl, that he began now to think of ſuing to the King for grace: but being in the way, at a Town called Borough Bridge, there was ſet upon by Sir Simon Warde, Sheriff of York, and Sir Andrew Harkeley, Conſtable of Carlile, who utterly defeat his Forces. In which fight was ſlain the Earl of Hereford, (who fighting valiantly upon a Bridge, was by a Varlet skulking under the Bridge, thruſt with a Spear into the fundament) Sir Roger Beneſield, Sir William Sulland, and others. There was taken the Earl of Lancaſter, Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Tackets, Sir William Fitz-Williams, with divers other, and were led to York. This field was fought the fifteenth day of March, in the year 1320. It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniel, Sir Bartholomew de Badleſmere were taken. Three dayes after the Earl of Lancaſter is brought to Pomfret, where the King ſitting himſelf in judgement with Edmund Earl of Kent, his Brother, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl Warren, Hugh Spencer lately created Earl of Wincheſter, and others, ſentence of death is given againſt him, to be drawn, hanged, and beheaded as a Traitor. The two firſt puniſhments are pardoned, in regard he was of Royal Blood; and beheaded he was the ſame day without the Town of Pomfret, before his own Caſtle. To ſpeak of the Miracles ſaid to be done by him after his death, might be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle; and therefore I omit them. By the like judgement were condemned the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Liſle, the Lord William Tuchet, Thomas Maudit, Henry Bradburn, William Fitz-Williams, Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Mowbray, Joceline Lord Daniel; all which were executed at York. Shortly after the Lord Henry Teyes is taken, drawn, hanged, and quartered at London; William the Lord Aldenham at Windſor; the Lords Badleſmer and Aſhburton at Canterbury; at Cardiffe in Wales, Sir William Fleming; at Briſtow, Sir Henry Womington, and Sir Henry Montford Bannerets; at Gloceſter, the Lord Clifford, and Sir William Elminbridge, principal men in principal places: to ſpread the terror over the Kingdom, all their Eſtates and Inheritances are

But not long after, the King in a calmer humour, began to have ſenſe of the Earl of Lancaſter's execution, which he diſcovered upon this occaſion. Some about him making earneſt ſuit for a Pardon to one of the Earls followers, and preſſing the King hard to it, he fell into a great paſſion, exclaiming againſt them as unjuſt and wicked Counſellors, who would urge him to ſave the life of a notorious Varlet, and would not ſpeak one word for his near kinſman the Earl of Lancaſter, who (ſaid he) had he lived, might have been uſeful to me, and the whole Kingdom; but this fellow the longer he lives, the more miſchief he will do: and therefore by the ſoul of God, he ſhould die the death he had deſerved. Sir Andrew Harkeley, who was the man that took the Earl of Lancaſter priſoner, being advanced for this ſervice to the Earldom of Carlile, enjoyed his honour but a while; for the next year after, either thruſt out in diſcontent by the Spencers, envying his high preferment, or combining with the Scots, upon hope of a great match, (as he was accuſed) he is degraded of all his honours, drawn, hanged, and quartered at London for Treaſon.

King Edward ſummoned into France.

But now the King of France ſummons King Edward to come and do his homage for Gaſcoine; and he not coming, all his Territories in France are adjudged to be forfeited, and many places of importance are ſeiſed on by the French. Hereupon a Parliament is called; and it is by common conſent of all agreed, that the King ſhould not go in perſon himſelf, in regard of the diſtraction of the times, but ſhould ſend ſome ſpecial men to excuſe his appearance: whereupon Edmund Earl of Kent the Kings brother is ſent, but to little effect. Then it is thought fit the Queen ſhould go, and indeed the Queen went; but what was the cauſe of her going, there is amongſt Writers great variance. Some ſay ſhe was ſent by the King to accommodate this buſineſs; which ſhe negotiated ſo well, as that all quarrels were ended, upon condition the King ſhould give to his ſon Edward the Dutchy of Aquitain, with the Earldom of Ponthieu, and ſend him over to do his homage for them. Which after many conſultations, the King is wrought to yield unto; and the Prince is ſent with the Biſhop of Exeter and others, to the Court of France accordingly: but others ſay, ſhe went out of diſcontent, to complain to her brother the King of France for wrongs offered her by the Spencers, who had ſo alienated the Kings mind from her, that he would ſcarce come where ſhe was, nor allow her fit maintenance for her calling. But whatſoever was the cauſe of her going, there appeared no cauſe of her ſtaying, but that ſhe had gotten into her company, Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, a gallant young Gentleman, whom ſhe ſpecially favoured, lately eſcaped out of the Tower of London, by giving his keepers (as was ſaid) a ſleeping drink. And withal, the Biſhop of Exeter perceiving ſome plots to be in hand, and their cloſe conſultations made without him, withdraws himſelf ſecretly, and diſcovers to the King what he obſerved in their courſes. Whereupon the King ſends preſently for the Queen and Prince, and ſolicits the King of France to haſten their return; which when he ſaw was neglected and delayed, he cauſed them openly to be proclaimed enemies to the Kingdom, baniſhed them and all their adherents out of the Land; and withal cauſeth all the ports to be ſtrongly kept, and ſends three Admirals to attend in ſeveral Coaſts to hinder their landing. It was not without ſuſpicion, that as the King for love of the Spencers, had his minde alienated from loving the Queen; ſo the Queen for love of Mortimer had her minde alienated from loving the King: and therefore having him with her, cared not how long ſhe ſtayed. However it was, when the Queen heard of the Kings Proclamation, ſhe knew there was no returning for her into England without ſome good aſſiſtance. Whereupon ſolliciting her brother the King of France he aided her with men and money, ſay ſome, but others, that he refuſing to aid her, as being wrought under hand by the Spencers againſt her, ſhe left the French Court, and went into Heynault, to the Earl of that Countrey, who upon a contract between her ſon Prince Edward and Philippa the Earls daughter, aided her with a competent Army under the conduct of his brother John; and with them and her beloved Mortimer, ſhe took ſhipping and landed at Orwell, a Port neer unto Harwich in Suffolk: where preſently came to her the Earl Marſhal, Henry Earl of Leiceſter, and Henry Earl of Lancaſter with the wry neck, called Torcoll, with many other Lords and Biſhops. The King at this time being at London, and hearing of the Queens landing with ſuch Forces, and chiefly how all the Realm ran flocking to her, was ſuddenly, ſtrucken into a great amazement; and though he had his great Counſellors the Spencers about him, yet now he found what little good their counſel could do him: and indeed in this caſe what ſhould he, or what could he do? To ſtay in London was apparent danger, for he plainly ſaw the Londoners to be more inclining to take the Queens part then his; and to go from London to any other place was as unſafe, all places being poſſeſt either with certain enemies, or uncertain friends: at laſt the Iſle of Lundy is thought of, a place plentiful of proviſion, abounding with Conies, Fiſh and Fowl, and the Iſland of hard acceſs, as having but one place in it where it could be entered; and that ſo narrow that a few might eaſily keep out many. Upon this place he reſolves, and taking with him the Earl of Gloceſter, the Spencers, and Robert Baldock with ſome few others, he takes ſhipping, but by contrary winds is driven back, and fain through Tempeſts to land in Wales; and there in the Abbey of Nethe in Glamorganſhire kept himſelf cloſe. In the mean time the Queen was come to Oxford where Adam Biſhop of Hereford took for his Text, Caput meum doleo; and thereupon inferred, that the Kingdom being now deadly ſick of its head, it was fit to remove that head, and put a ſounder in the place. At this time alſo, the Londoners to ſhew their love to the Queen, ſeiſed upon Walter Stapleton, the good biſhop of Exeter and Lord Treaſurer of England, left Governour there by the King; and with great deſpight

In the mean time the Queen went from Oxford to Gloceſter, and from thence to Briſtow, where Hugh Spencer the Father was, a man of fourſcore and ten years old; who is there taken, and without examination of Judgement, in moſt cruel manner executed, having his heart pulled out of his body being yet alive, and his body left hanging upon the Gallows. After this the Queen ſtayed at Hereford the ſpace of a moneth, and then dividing her Army, ſhe ſends one part of it under the Conduct of Henry Earl of Lancaſter, and Rice ap Powel, a Clerk, to finde out the King: and this Rice being a Welſhman, and knowing the Countrey well, brought the Earl to the Monaſtery of Nethe, where the King was, whom they there take together with Spencer the Son, Robert Baldock, and Simon of Reading. The King is by the Biſhop of Hereford committed to the cuſtody of the Earl of Leiceſter; where all that Winter he was uſed no worſe then was fit for a captive King: but Edmund Earl of Arundel, John Daniel, and Thomas Micheldene, at the inſtance of Mortimer, are all three beheaded. Preſently after is Hugh Spencer, the younger, who was now Earl of Gloceſter, drawn, hanged, and quartered; his head ſent up to be ſet upon London-Bridge, and his four quarters beſtowed in ſeveral Cities. The like is done with Simon of Reading, but Robert Baldock is committed to New-Gate, againſt whom, when no juſt cauſe of death could be found, there was uſed ſo much cruelty in his impriſonment, that he ſhortly after died.

Preſently after Chriſtmas a Parliament is called, wherein it was agreed to depoſe the King and ſet up his Son; which he hearing, refuſed it, unleſs his Father would freely reſign. Whereupon are appointed three Biſhops, two Earls, two Abbots, four Barons, and of every City a Burgeſs to go to the King, (in cuſtody then at Kenelworth) the Biſhops were John of Stratford, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Adam Tarleton Biſhop of Hereford, and Henry Biſhop of Lincoln. But the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln, getting to the King before the reſt came, perſwade the King to reſign his Crown to his eldeſt Son; craftily promiſing him he ſhould have as good maitenance afterward, as ever he had when he was King: and contrarily threatning him, that if he did it not, the people would exclude both him and his Son too, and make a King of another Race. By theſe promiſes and threatnings, the meek King is drawn to yield to the Biſhops motion: but when afterward the Biſhop of Hereford and the other Commiſſioners came, and were ſate in a place appointed to take his reſignation, the King coming forth amongſt them in mourning Robes, upon a ſudden fell down in a ſwoon; in whom the Earl of Leiceſter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, had much ado to recover life: but then the Biſhop of Hereford riſing up, delivered the cauſe of their coming, as the other Biſhops before had done. To which the King anſwered, that as he much grieved his people ſhould be ſo hardened againſt him, as utterly to reject him; ſo it was ſome comfort unto him, that they would yet receive his Son to be their Sovereign. After this Thomas Blunt Knight, Steward of the Kings houſe, brake the Staffe of his Office; and William Truſſel, Speaker of the Parliament, in the name of the whole Kingdom, pronounced a Form of renouncing all Allegiance to Edward of Carnarvan. Here Caxton writes, that from the time of this Kings depoſing, which was in December, to the time of his Sons Crowning, which was not till Candlemas following, all Pleas of the Kings-Bench were ſtayed, and all Priſoners arreſted by Sheriffs, commanded to be ſet at liberty; which ſeems to have little probability, ſeeing his Son Edward preſently upon his depoſing was received for King. But howſoever ſo great a Dowry was then aſſigned to Queen Iſabel, that ſcarce a third part of the revenues of the Crown is left for the new King and his Wife. And to the late King is allowed a hundred Marks a moneth for his maintenance, with which he lived with his Couſin Earl of Leiceſter, in good plenty and contentment for a time; only this grieved him moſt of all (he ſaid) that the Queen his Wife would never be gotten to come to ſee him: For he ſwore moſt devoutly, that from the time he firſt ſaw her face, he could never like of any other woman. By which it may appear, that neither Gaveſton nor the Spencers had ſo debauched him, as to make him falſe to his Bed, or to be diſloyal to his Queen. But the Queen being hardened againſt him, and conceiving he had too great liberty under the Earl of Leiceſter, by advice of her peſtilent Counſellour, Adam Tarleton, Biſhop of Hereford, appoints Thomas Gourney, and John Matrevers Knights, to take him from the Earl into their own cuſtody, and to carry him whither they thought good. Who thereupon take him from Kenelworth, and carry him firſt to Corf Caſtle, and from thence to Briſtow; where they ſhut him in the Caſtle: till upon knowledge of a Plot laid to get him out, and ſend him beyond Sea, they took him in the night and carried him to Barkeley Caſtle, where by the way they abuſed him moſt inhumanely, as Sir Thomas de la More a Knight of Gloceſterſhire, in his life relateth. For to the end he ſhould not be known they ſhaved his head and beard, and that in moſt beaſtly manner; for they took him from his Horſe, and ſet him upon a Hillock, and then taking puddle water out of a Ditch there by, they went to waſh him, his Barber telling him that cold water muſt ſerve for this time: whereat the miſerable King looking ſternly upon him, ſaid, That whether they would or no, he would have warm water to waſh him; and therewithal to make good his word, he preſently ſhed forth a ſhowre of tears. Never was King turned out of a Kingdom in ſuch a manner. Many Kingdoms have been loſt by the chance of War, but this Kingdom was loſt before any Dice were caſt; no blow ſtruck, no Battel fought; done forcibly, and yet without force; violently, and yet with conſent; both parties agreed, yet neither pleaſed; for the the King was not pleaſed to leave his Kingdom, and the Queen was not pleaſed to leave him his life. It was not ſafe to leave him a part, by which he might afterward recover the whole: and therefore this was the mark now aimed at, having taken away his Kingdom openly, how they might take away his life ſecretly; be the

Of his Taxations.

BY this King it appears there is ſomething elſe beſides the grievance of Taxations, that alienates the mindes of Engliſh Subjects from their King; for never were fewer Taxations then in this Kings time: yet never were the Subjects mindes more alienated from their King, then they were from him. Before his Coronation in a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Clergy, and a twentieth of the Temporalty. In his fifth year in a Parliament at London, was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporalty. In his fifteenth year was granted the ſixth penny of temporal mens goods, through England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his Wars with Scotland. And more then theſe we read not of; but then at the defeat of the Earl of Lancaſter, there were Confiſcations that ſupplied the place of Taxations, by which (as one ſaith) he became the richeſt King that had been ſince the Conqueſt.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE ordained that the money of his Father, though counted baſe by the People, ſhould be currant. In the eighth year of his Reign, by reaſon of a dearth which raiſed the price of all Victuals, It was ordained by Parliament, that an Oxe fatted with Graſs ſhould be ſold for fifteen ſhillings, fatted with Corn, for twenty, the beſt Cow for twelve ſhillings; a fat Hog of two years old, three ſhillings four pence; a fat ſheep ſhorn, fourteen pence, with the Fleece twenty pence; a fat Gooſe for two pence half penny; a fat Capon two pence; a fat Hen a penny; four Pigeons a penny; whoſoever ſold for more, ſhould forfeit their ware to the King. But after theſe rates impoſed, all kinde of Victuals grew ſo ſcarce, that Prouiſion could hardly be made for the Kings Houſe; whereupon ſhortly after, the Order was revoked, and Market folks permitted to make the beſt of their Wares. In this Kings time an Ordinance was made againſt Knights Templars, accuſed of Hereſie and other crimes; and they were all apprehended, and committed to divers Priſons. The like was done by all the Kings of Chriſtendom, at one inſtant, being condemned in a General Council at Vienna. In the 14. year of his Reign, on the 15. of October, the Clerks of the Exchequer went towards York with the Book called Domus Dei, and other Records, and Proviſion that laded one and twenty Carts; but in half a year they were brought back again.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the 17. year of his Reign the Biſhop of Hereford was arreſted, accuſed of high Treaſon, for aiding the Kings Enemies in their late Rebellion; but he refuſed to anſwer, (being a conſecrated Biſhop) without leave of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe ſuffragan he was, (and who he ſaid was his direct Judge, next the Pope) or without the conſents of his fellow Biſhops, who then all aroſe, and humbly craved the Kings Clemency in his behalf: but finding the King implacable, they took him away from the Bar, and delivered him to the cuſtody of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Shortly after he was again taken and convented as before, which the Clergy underſtanding, the Archbiſhops, Canterbury, York, and Dublin, with ten other Biſhops, all with their Croſſes erected, went to the place of Judgement, and again took him away with them; charging all men, upon pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent hands upon him. With which audacious Act, the King was ſo much diſpleaſed, that he preſently commanded inquiry to be made ex Officio Judicis, concerning thoſe Objections againſt the Biſhop: wherein he was found guilty, though abſent, and had all his Goods and Poſſeſſions ſeiſed into the Kings hands. In this Kings time the Crowchet Fryers came firſt into England. In his time Pope John the two and twentieth, firſt inſtituted the Feaſt of Corpus Chriſti, begun before by Urban the fourth.

THis King founded Orial Colledge, and St. Mary Hall in Oxford: He builded a Church of Fryers at his Manour of Langley, where the ſoul of Gaveſton ſhould be prayed for. In this Kings twentieth year, Richard Rothing Sheriff of London, builded the Pariſh Church of Garlick-Hithe in London; Ralph Baldock Biſhop of London, gave two thouſand Marks to the building of the New work of the Chappel, on the South ſide of Pauls Church: and left much more by his Teſtament.

Orial Colledge in Oxford founded.

Caſualties.

IN the eighth year of this Kings Reign, was ſo great a dearth, that Horſes and Dogs were eaten, and Thieves in priſon pluckt in pieces, thoſe that were newly brought in amongſt them, and eat them half alive; which continuing three years, brought in the end ſuch a peſtilence, that the living ſcarce ſufficed to bury the dead. In the fourth year of his Reign, the Church of Middleton in Dorſetſhire, with all the Monuments, was conſumed with Lightning, the Monks being at Mattins. In this Kings time, digging the Foundation of a Work about Pauls, were found more then a hundred heads of Oxen and Kine, which confirmed the opinion, that of old time it had been the Temple of Jupiter, and that there was the Sacrifice of Beaſts.

A marvellous dearth.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Iſabel, Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France, ſhe being but twelve years of age; who lived his Wife twenty years, his Widow thirty, and dying at threeſcore and three years old at Ryſings near London, was buried in the midſt of Gray-Friers Quire in London. By her he had iſſue two Sons and two Daughters; his eldeſt Son named Edward of Windſor, becauſe born there, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. His ſecond Son named John of Eltham, becauſe born there, was at twelve years old created Earl of Cornwal: He died in Scotland in the flower of his Youth, unmarried. His eldeſt Daughter Joan, being a Childe, was married in the fourth year of King Edward her Brother, to David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert Bruce, at ſeven years old; who coming afterward into England to viſit her Brother, died here, and was buried at the Gray Friers in London. His ſecond Daughter Eleanor, was married to Reginald the ſecond Earl of Gelder, with a portion of fifteen thouſand pounds; and had iſſue by him two Sons, who were Earls ſucceſſively.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was fair of body, and of great ſtrength, but given much to drink, which made him oftentimes bewray his own Secrets. For his other conditions, his greateſt fault was, he loved but one; for if his love had been divided, it could not have been ſo violent. He was extream in nothing but in loving; and though love moderated, be the beſt of affections, yet the extremity of it is the worſt of paſſions. He was rather unfortunate then unhappy; ſeeing unfortunateneſs is in the event, unhappineſs in the cauſe: and if his fortune had been to love good men, his own goodneſs would have made him happy. Two vertues were eminent in him above all his Predeceſſours, Continence, and Abſtinence: So continent, that he left no baſe iſſue behinde him; ſo abſtinent, that he took no baſe courſes for raiſing of money. They who deſpiſed him being alive, ſo much honoured being dead, that they could have found in their hearts to make him a Saint.

Of his Death and Burial.

Wayes deviſed to take away his life.

MAny wayes were attempted to take away his life. Firſt, they vexed him in his diet, allowing him nothing he could well endure to eat, but this ſucceeded not. Then they lodged him in a Chamber over Carrion and dead Carkaſſes, enough to have poiſoned him; and indeed he told a workman at his Window, he never endured ſo great a miſery in all his life: but neither did this ſucceed. Then they attempted it by poiſons, but whether by the ſtrength of his Conſtitution, or by the Divine Providence, neither did this ſucceed. At laſt the peſtilent Achitophel, the Biſhop of Hereford, deviſed a Letter to his Keepers, blaming them for giving him too much liberty; and for not doing the ſervice which was expected from them: and in the end of his Letter wrote this Line, Edvardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt: Craftily contriving it in this doubtful ſenſe, that both the Keepers might finde ſufficient warrant, and himſelf might finde ſufficient excuſe. The Keepers gueſſing at his meaning, took it in the worſt ſenſe, and accordingly put it in execution. They took him in his Bed, and caſting heavy Bolſters upon him, and preſſing them hard down, ſtifled him; and not content with that, they heated an iron red hot, and through a Pipe thruſt it up into his Fundament, that no marks of violence might be ſeen: but though none were ſeen, yet ſome were heard; for when the Fact was in doing, he was heard to roar and cry all the Caſtle over. Gourney and Matrevers, his murtherers, looking for reward, had the reward of Murtherers. For the Queen and Biſhop Tarleton diſavowing the command, threatned to queſtion them for the Kings death; whereupon they fled beyond Sea: and Gourney after three years, being taken in France, and ſent into England, was in the way upon the Sea, beheaded. Matrevers flying into Germany, had the grace to repent, but lived ever after miſerably. Thus died this King in the year 1327. more then half a year after his depoſing; when he had reigned almoſt 19. years, lived 43. His body was carried to Gloceſter, and there without any Funeral Pomp buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Peter, by the Benedictine Friers. 1327.

Of Men of Note in his time.

IN this Kings time, of Martial men were many, whoſe acts have been ſpoken of in the late Kings life. Of learned men alſo many, as John Duns the great Logician, called Doctor Subtilis, born in Northumberland, at Emildune a Village three miles diſtant from Alnwick; though both the Scots and the Iriſh challenge him for theirs; Robert Walſingham a Carmelite Frier, who wrote divers Treatiſes; Robert Baſton born in Nottinghamſhire, a Carmelite Frier of Scarborough, whom King Edward took with him into Scotland, to write ſome remembrances of his Victories: but being taken by the Scots, was conſtrained by Robert Bruce to write Remembrances of his Overthrows; William Riſhanger, a Monk of Saint Albans, an Hiſtoriographer; Ralph Baldock, Biſhop of London, who wrote a Hiſtory, entituled, Hiſtoria Anglicæ; John Walſingham, a Carmelite Frier, who wrote divers Treatiſes; Nicholas de Lyra, a Jew by Birth, who wrote many excellent Treatiſes in Divinity; William Ockam a Frier Minor, who wrote divers Treatiſes, and namely againſt John Duns, and alſo againſt Pope John the 23. in favour of the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria; Thomas Halſewood, a Canon of Leeds in Kent, who wrote a Chronicle called Chronicum compendiarium; Robert Perſcrutator born in Yorkſhire, a Black Frier and a Philoſopher, or rather a Magician; and laſt, though not leaſt worthy to be remembred, John Mandevile, the great Traveller, a Doctor of Phyſick and a Knight.

The LIFE and REIGN of KING EDWARD THE THIRD.

Of his coming to the Crown, and Acts done in his Minority.

Anno Dom. 1327.

EDWARD of Windſor, eldeſt Son of King Edward the Second, by the Order of Parliament, upon his Fathers Reſignation, was proclaimed King of England, on the five and twentieth day of January, in the year 1327. And becauſe he had not yet received the Order of Knighthood, he was by Henry Earl of Lancaſter girt ſolemnly with the Sword; and on the firſt day of February following, was Crowned at Weſtminſter by Walter Reginald Archbiſhop of Canterbury: and thereupon a general Pardon is proclaimed, which hath ſince been uſed as a Cuſtom with all ſucceeding Kings; that at their firſt coming to the Crown, a general Pardon is alwayes granted. And becauſe the King was under age, ſcarce fifteen years old (though Froyſſard ſaith he was then eighteen) there were twelve appointed Governours of him and the Kingdom; namely the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Hereford, and Worceſter; Thomas of Brotherton, Earl Marſhal, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncles; John Earl Warren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Pierce, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Roſſe: but though theſe were appointed and bore the name, yet the Queen and Roger Mortimer took all the authority to themſelves. The firſt action that was undertaken, was an expedition againſt the Scots; for Robert Bruce, though now old and ſickly, and (as was ſaid) Leprous: yet conſidering the youth of the new King, and the diſtractions of the Kingdom, thought it now a fit time to do ſome good upon England; and entring the Engliſh borders with an Army, ſent defiance to King Edward. Whereupon an Army is raiſed, and the Heynaulders, (whom the Queen had brought over) are joyned with the Engliſh: but a variance falling out between the two Nations, made the action not ſucceſsful. For the Kings Army encountring the Scots at Stanhope Park in Weredal in the Biſhoprick of Durham, though three times as many as the Scots, as being thirty thouſand; yet through this variance, but more through treaſon of ſome great men, ſuffered them all to eſcape their hands, and the Scots returned home in ſafety, the Engliſh with diſhonour: and after this, the Engliſh ſeeing the Heynaulders could do them no good, ſent them away to their own Countrey. In King Edward's ſecond year, his marriage with Philippa of Heynault is ſolemniſed, (a diſpenſation being firſt gotten, becauſe of their nearneſs in Blood) and a Parliament is holden at Northampton, where the King made three Earls; John of Eltham his Brother, Earl of Cornwal; Roger Mortimer, Earl of March; and James Butler of Ireland, Earl of Ormond. And in this Parliament a diſhonourable Peace is concluded with the Scots; and confirmed by a match between David Bruce Prince of Scotland, being but ſeven years old, and Joan, ſiſter to King Edward not ſo old. At which time by the ſecret working of Queen Iſabel, Roger Mortimer, and Sir James Douglaſs, the King ſurrenders by his Charter all his title of Sovereignty to the Kingdom of Scotland, reſtores divers Deeds and Inſtruments of their former Homages and Fealties, with the famous Evidence called Ragmans Roll, and many ancient Jewels, and Monuments, amongſt which was the Black Croſs of Scotland; and beſides, any Engliſh man is prohibited to hold Lands in Scotland, unleſs he were a dweller there. In conſideration whereof King Bruce was to pay 30000. Marks, and to renounce his claim to the Counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, and any other place poſſeſſed by him in England. This was no good beginning, and yet worſe followed after. For another Parliament being holden at Wincheſter, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncle, is there accuſed, and condemned upon his confeſſion, for intending to reſtore his Brother, the late King Edward; an intention only without any fact, yet condemned he was, and brought to the Scaffold: but generally ſo beloved of the people, that he ſtood on the Scaffold from one a Clock till five, before any Executioner could be found that would do the Office; till at laſt a ſilly wretch of the Marſhalſey was gotten to cut off his head. But the Authors of his death eſcaped not long themſelves, for in the third year of the Kings Reign, another Parliament is holden at Nottingham, wherein the Queen hath all her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to her Penſion of a thouſand pounds a year, and her ſelf confined to a Caſtle, where ſhe remained the reſt of her dayes, no fewer then thirty years. A time long enough to finde that her being the Daughter of a King, the Siſter of a King, the Wife of a King, and the Mother of a King, were glorious Titles, but all all not worth the liberty of a mean Eſtate. And as for Mortimer, (lying then in the Caſtle of Nottingham and lately created Earl of the Marches of Wales) he was ſeiſed on in this manner; the King taking with him William Montacute, Robert Holland, and others, go ſecretly one night by Torch-light, through a privy way under ground, till they come to the Queens Chamber; where leaving the King without, they entred and found the Queen with Mortimer, ready to go to bed: then laying hands on him, they led him forth, after whom the Queen followed, crying, Bel fits, ayes pitie du gentil Mortimer; good ſon, good ſon, take pity upon the gentle Mortimer, ſuſpecting that her ſon had been amongſt them. This courſe was taken to apprehend him for avoiding of tumult, he having no fewer then nineſcore Knights and Gentlemen, beſides other meaner ſervants continually about him. But thus ſeiſed on, he is committed preſently to the Tower, accuſed of divers great crimes, whereof theſe were chief; That he had procured the late Kings death; That he had been the Author of the Scots ſafe eſcaping at Stanhope Park, corrupted with the gift of thirty thouſand pounds; That he had procured the late Marriage and Peace with Scotland, ſo diſhonourable to the King and Kingdom; That he had been too familiar with the Queen, as by whom ſhe was thought to be with Childe. Of which Articles he was found guilty and condemned; and thereupon is drawn and hanged upon the common Gallows at the Elms, now called Tyburn, where his body remained two dayes as an opprobrious ſpectacle for all beholders.

Seiſeth upon Mortimer, and in what manner.

Who is hanged at Tyburn.

After theſe buſineſſes in England, there comes a new buſineſs upon him from the King of France; for about this time Philip le Bel, King of France, the Queens brother, dying without iſſue, the right of ſucceſſion to the Crown is devolved upon the Heir to Charles a former King, wherein are Competitors Philip Duke de Valois, and Edward King of England. Edward is the nearer in blood, but draws his Pedigree by a Female: Philip the farther off, but deſcending by all Males: and becauſe the Law Salique excluding Females, was conceived as well to exclude all deſcendants by Females; therefore is Philip's title preferred before King Edward's, and Philip is received and crowned King of France: to which preferment of his, Robert de Artois, a Peer of great power, gave no ſmall furtherance. And now as ſoon as Philip was inveſted in the Crown, he ſummons Edward to come and do his Homage for the Dutchy of Guyen, and his other lands in France, held of that Crown, according to the Cuſtom; which though it were ſome prejudice to King Edward's claim afterward, yet in regard his Kingdom of England was ſcarce well ſettled, and himſelf was young, he was contented to do it: and thereupon the ſixth of June, in the year 1329. King Edward in a Crimſon Velvet Gown, imbroidered with Leopards, with his Crown on his head, his Sword by his ſide, and Golden Spurs on his heels, preſents himſelf in the Body of the Cathedral Church of Amyens before King Philip, ſitting in his Chair of Eſtate, in a Velvet Gown of a violet Colour, imbroidered with Flowers de lys of Gold, his Crown on his head, and his Scepter in his hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him. The Viſcount Melun Chamberlain of France, firſt commands King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and to kneel down, which he did on a Crimſon Velvet Cuſhion before King Philip; and then the Viſcount putting both his hands together between the hands of the King of France, pronounced the words of the Homage, which were theſe: You become Liegeman to my Maſter here preſent, as Duke of Aquitaine, and Peer of France; and you promiſe to bear faith and loyalty to him: Say yea. And King Edward ſaid yea, and kiſſed the King of France on the mouth, as Lord of the Fee. The like homage alſo he did for the Earldom of Ponthieu. But this act of ſubmiſſion left a rancour in King Edward's heart, which afterwards brake ſo out, that it had been good for France it had never been exacted.

King Edward claims the Crown of France, but Philip of Valois is preferred, and why.

King Edward doth homage to the King of France for his Dutchy of Guyenne, and the manner of doing it.

This done, King Edward returns home, and there findes a new buſineſs with Scotland, upon this occaſion. Edward Baliol, Son to John Baliol, (ſometimes King of Scotland) two and thirty years after his Fathers depoſition, began now to ſhew himſelf, attempting the recovery of that Crown; and coming out of France, where he had all that while remained, and getting aid under-hand in England, with them he ſuddenly aſſails thoſe who had the Government of Scotland, during the Nonage of the young King David (being at that time with the King of France) and in a Battel overcame them, with the ſlaughter of many Noble-men, and thouſands of the common people; and thereupon was immediately Crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But notwithſtanding his great defeat, King Baliol was forced to retire him into England to get more aid of King Edward. Who now ſhews himſelf in the action, joyns with Baliol againſt his Brother-in-law King David; goes in perſon with a ſtrong Army to recover Berwick, which after three months ſiege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, was taked in, and the Army of the Scots which came to the reſcue thereof, at Hallidown-Hill, utterly defeated: where were ſlain ſeven Earls, ninety Knights and Bannerets, four hundred Eſquires, and about two and thirty thouſand common Souldiers, as our Writers report: as theirs, but fourteen thouſand. And with this effuſion of blood is Baliol returned to his miſerable Kingdom; and to hold good correſpondence with the King of England hereafter, doth him homage for his Realm of Scotland, and the Iſlands adjacent. But though he had a Kingdom, yet he had not quietneſs, for many of the Scots aided by the French, made War upon him divers years after; during all which time, King David with his Wife remained in France. If any man marvel why King Edward would aid Baliol againſt King David, who had married his ſiſter, he may conſider that alliances, how near ſoever, weigh but light in the Scales of State.

Edward Baliol is crowned King of Scotland.

King Edward aids Baliol againſt his brother-in-law King David.

1333.

The Scots defeated at Hallidown-Hill.

About this time, the Iſle of Man is conquered by William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, for which ſervice King Edward gave him the title of King of Man.

William Montacute Earl of Salisbury hath the title given him to be King of Man.

Of

Of his Acts after he came of age.

King Edward is perſwaded by Robert d' Artois to make War upon France

AND now Robert of Artois baniſhed out of France, comes into England, whom King Edward makes Earl of Richmond, and of his Council. This Robert perſwades King Edward to make War upon France, to which Crown (he ſaid) he had more right then he that held it. With whoſe perſwaſions, King Edward is at laſt reſolved to undertake the enterpriſe; and to furniſh himſelf of noble Cheiftains, he at one time in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, the eighth year of his Reign, creates ſix Earls, Henry of Lancaſter he made Earl of Derby, William Montacute he made Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Audeley Earl of Gloceſter, William Clinton Earl of Huntington, and Robert Clifford, or Ufford, Earl of Suffolk: alſo twenty Knights of whom Thomas de la Moore, who writ the life of the Kings Father was one. Withal he ſends the Biſhop of Lincoln, to procure leagues of amity with divers Princes abroad. Where it is ſcarce worth remembring, what Froiſſard mentions here, that certain young Gentlemen covered one of their eyes with a piece of ſilk, and vowed to ſee but with one eye, till it might be ſeen, what great deeds of Arms they performed; but for all this vow of theirs, we hear nothing of their exploits. And as the King of England laboured to procure himſelf friends, ſo likewiſe the King of France got to take his part, the Biſhop of Leige, with the Dukes and Earls of Gelders, Juliers, Cleve, Heynault, and Brabant, and with the Archbiſhop of Colen, and Valeran his Brother; John King of Bohemia, Earl of Luxemberg, Henry Count Palatine, Aubert Biſhop of Mentz, Otho Duke of Auſtria, Ame Earl of Geneva, with many other Princes and Captains out of Germany, Spain, and other Countries. King Edward thus reſolved in himſelf, and furniſhed with friends abroad, goes over into Flanders, with his Queen and Children, makes his reſidence at Antwerp; where by perſwaſion of the Flemings, he takes upon him the Style, Title, and Arms of the King of France: for by this they accounted themſelves diſobliged of the Bond of twenty hundred thouſand Crowns, which they had entred into, never to bear Arms againſt the King of France: and hereupon the League was eſtabliſhed between them and King Edward. And from this time forward the Kings of England quartered 1339. the Arms of France with thoſe of England; and took upon them the name of Kings of France. And now King Edward for a beginning to put his claim in execution, ſets upon Cambray, and enters France by the way of Vermandois and Thierach: On the other ſide King Philip ſeiſeth on the Dutchy of Guienne, and ſends thither the Counte d' Eu, Conſtable of France, with the Earls of Foix and Armigniack. At laſt both Armies came ſo near together, that a fight was appointed the Friday after: but upon better conſideration, the Engliſh thought it no diſcretion to give Battel to an Army ſo much greater then their own, if they could avoid it; and the French thought it as little diſcretion for them to hazard the perſon of the Prince within his own Kingdom; and perhaps were not a little moved with the warning given them by Robert King of Sicilie, a great Aſtronomer, that he foreſaw by the Stars, ſome great misfortune to threaten the French, if they ſhould that day fight with the Engliſh, King Edward being preſent. And thus both Armies having their ſeveral reaſons to decline the battel, they parted without doing any thing; only an accident happened ſcarce worth remembring, yet muſt be remembred. A Hare ſtarting out before the head of the French Army, cauſed a great ſhout to be made; whereupon, they who ſaw not the Hare, but only heard the ſhout, ſuppoſing it to be the onſet of the battel, diſpoſed themſelves to fight: and fourteen Gentlemen for encouragements ſake, as the cuſtome is, were knighted; called afterward in merriment, Knights of the Hare.

Knights of the Hare, why ſo called.

But now King Edward muſt a little look home, and therefore leaving the Queen in Brabant, he paſſeth himſelf into England about Candlemas, having been in Brabant about a year; and landing at the Tower about midnight, and finding it ungarded, was ſo much diſpleaſed that he preſently ſends for the Maior of London, commanding him to bring before him the Chancellour and Treaſurer, with Sir John Saint Paul, Michael Wath, Philip Thorpe, Henry Stratford, Clergie men, (who it ſeems were officers for his Receipts) and John Sconer Juſtice of the Bench: all which, except the Chancellour, were apprehended and committed to priſon; as were afterward in like manner, divers Officers of Juſtice, and Accomptants, upon inquiry of their unjuſt proceeding. During the Kings abode in England, William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and Robert Ufford Earl of Suffolk left in Flanders to oppoſe the French, having performed divers great exploits, were at laſt in an encounter about Liſle, ſo overlaid by multitude, as they were both taken and ſent priſoners to Paris. Beſides, about this time two accidents happened that were thought would be great rubs in King Edward's proceeding; one, that his Wives Father, William Earl of Heynault, dying, and leaving his Son to ſucceed, this ſon left his Brother King Edward, and fell to take part with the King of France; the other, that the Duke of Normandy, thinking himſelf as ſtrong as ever William Duke of Normandy was that conquered England, he ſaw no reaſon but he might conquer it as well as that William; and thereupon makes preparation by Sea and Land to attempt the enterpriſe: but theſe were but vapours that never came to be winds, at leaſt brought no ſtorms. For John Earl of Heynault had quickly enough of the King of France, and was ſoon after reconciled to his Brother King Edward; and the Duke of Normandy went no further then preparations: for indeed King Edward proſecuted his courſes againſt France with ſuch heat, that all the neighbouring Princes ſeeing a fire kindled ſo near their own borders, were glad to look to themſelves at home. But now to impede the King of England's return into France, King Philip had provided a mighty Navie in the Haven of Sluce, conſiſting of two hundred ſail of Ships, (beſides many Gallies) and two thouſand armed men in the Port ready to encounter him upon his landing; whereof King Edward being advertiſed, prepares the like number of Ships, and ſets out William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and Robert Ufford Earl of Suffolk taken priſoners by the French.

The Armies of the two Kings being near together, yet part without fighting and why.

Sea

Sea upon Midſummer Eve, is met the morrow after with a Navy likewiſe from the North parts, conducted by Sir Robert Morley; and encounters his enemy who lay to intercept him with ſuch force and courage, and ſuch advantage of Winde and Sun, that he utterly defeated their whole Navy, took and ſunk all their Ships, ſlew thirty thouſand men, and landed with as great glory, as ſuch a victory, (the greateſt that ever before was gotten by the Engliſh at Sea) could yield, though King Edward himſelf was there wounded with an Arrow in the thigh. Moſt of the French, rather then to endure the Arrows of the Engliſh, or be taken, deſperately leapt into the Sea; whereupon the French Kings Jeſter, ſet on to give notice to him of his overthrow, (which being ſo ill news, none elſe would willingly impart unto him) ſaid, and oftentimes repeated it in the Kings hearing; Cowardly Engliſh men, Daſtardly Engliſh men, Faint-hearted Engliſh men! The King at length asked him why? for that (ſaid he) they durſt not leap out of their Ships into the Sea as our brave French men did. By which ſpeech the King apprehended a notion of this overthrow, which the French attributed to Nicholas Butchet, one of their Chief Commanders, who had armed his Ships with men of baſe condition, (content with ſmall pay) and refuſed Gentlemen and ſufficient Souldiers, in regard they required greater wages. And indeed it often happens that the avarice of Commanders is the occaſion of great defeats.

King Edward takes and ſinks two hundred Sail of French Ships.

How the French Kings Jeſter gave notice of this overthrow to the King.

By this Victory King Edward gained a free entrance into Flanders, and preſently went and beſieged Tournay with an Army of five and fifty thouſand; but was ſo valiantly encountred by the Duke of Burgundy, and the Earl of Armigniack, that they routed his Army, and ſlew four thouſand upon the place: which ſo enraged King Edward, that two dayes after he ſent a challenge to King Philip to meet him in a ſingle Combat, or with an hundred againſt as many, before the Walls of Tournay. King Philip anſwers that his challenge being made to Philip de Valois, without mention of King, he took it not to be to him, who was truly King of Frante; but he wiſhed him to remember the Homage he had done him at Amiens, and the wrong he did to the Chriſtian world, by his troubleſome courſes to hinder him from his Voyage intended to the Holy-Land. Beſides this anſwer in writing, he ſends to him by word of mouth; that by his challenge he hazarded nothing of his own, but expoſed only the Dominion of another, which was againſt all reaſon: but if he would ſet his Kingdom of England, though much meaner, againſt his of France, he would then accept the challenge, and meet him in the field in ſingle Combat. But this King Edward would not hearken to, for as he was valiant to make the challenge, ſo he was circumſpect to look to the conditions. But hereupon he continues his ſiege of Tournay; to the relief whereof King Philip ſends all the Forces he could poſſibly make by himſelf or his friends: and after the ſiege had continued three months, partly by mediation of Robert King of Sicilie, but chiefly by the Lady Jane of Valois, ſiſter to King Philip, and mother of King Edward's Wife, (who had vowed her ſelf a Nun, but to do this good office, travelled from one to another) a Truce was concluded for a year, and both their Armies are diſſolved.

King Edward's Army of five and fifty thouſand defeated.

King Edward ſends a challenge to the King of France, and the King of France's anſwer.

A Truce is concluded between the two Kings.

After this, King Edward returning into England, was aduertiſed how the Scots after many other places gained, had beſieged the Caſtle of Striveling; for relief whereof, the King makes all the haſte he can: and yet before he could come, it was by force of battery, compelled to render it ſelf upon conditions. Then King Edward being at Berwick, paſſeth to New-Caſtle upon Tine, where he ſtayes a month, waiting for his proviſion that was to come by Sea; but that being driven into other parts by tempeſt, he makes a Truce with the Scots for three or four months, and then returns home. In the time of this Truce, the Scots ſend to King David, to come and govern the Kingdom in his own perſon; who thereupon taking his leave of the King of France, with whom he had remained ſeven years, he with his Wife Joan, King Edward's ſiſter, returns into Scotland: where, after he had been moſt honourably received by the Prince of Orknay, and the other Lords and Barons of the Kingdom, as ſoon as the Truce was ended, with a ſtrong Army enters Northumberland, paſſing on to New Caſtle upon Tyne, where he plants his Camp. Of this Caſtle, John Nevile was left governour by King Edward, who ſending out certain companies, took the Earl Murray priſoner; and with the ſlaughter of divers of his men, and rich booties, returned back to his Caſtle: which ſo incenſed King David, that he aſſaulted the Caſtle as a man enraged, but finding it too ſtrong for his taking, he then paſſed into the Province of Durham, where he uſed all kindes of cruelty, firſt upon the Countrey, and then upon the City, killing Men, Women, and Children, Clergy, and others; burning and deſtroying Houſes, and Churches, and utterly defacing it. From thence he paſſeth on to the Caſtle of Salisbury, which Caſtle belonged to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, in right of his Wife; but himſelf being then priſoner in France, only his Counteſs, and one William Montacute a Couſin of his, was in the Caſtle. This William perceiving the Scottiſh horſe to be ſo over-charged with pillage, that they were ſcarce able to go, iſſues out of the Caſtle with forty horſe, ſets upon them, kills two hundred, and takes ſixſcore, whom he brings with their rich pillage, into the Caſtle. King David ſoon after with his whole Army arrived, but hearing of King Edward's coming, (who certified of theſe things, made all the haſte he could) he retires himſelf from thence; and King Edward finding him gone before he came, yet would needs go in and viſit the Counteſs: of whom as ſoon as he ſaw her, he was ſo enamoured, that he laid more battery to her Chaſtity, then King David had done to her Caſtle; but finding it inexpugnable, after a day and a night he left it, and followed after the Scots, with whom for three dayes together he had many ſkirmiſhes, till at laſt a Truce was concluded for two years; and amongſt other conditions, William Earl of Salisbury, a priſoner with the King of France, was ſet at liberty in exchange for for the Earl Murray, priſoner with the King of England.

About this time another difference fell out between the Kings of England and France. John Earl of Montford laid claim to the Dutchy of Britain; but in the quarrel was taken priſoner by the King of France. His Lady ſends to King Edward for ſuccour; which King Edward grants upon condition that a marriage be made between his Daughter Mary, and the Earl of Montford's ſon: which being agreed on (he ſends over to her aid, firſt, Walter de Manny, a valiant Knight, and afterward Robert d' Artois. But whiles his Army was preparing, King Edward was informed by Edward Baliol, the pretended King of Scotland, and Governour of Berwick, that the Scots had not kept the conditions of the Truce; whereupon King Edward draws a great Army to Berwick, with a purpoſe to do great matters, but nothing was done, for a new Truce was again concluded for two years. By this time Robert d' Artois had made ready his Army, and taking with him the Counteſs of Montford, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Suffolk, and many other Barons, after great tempeſts and encounters at Sea, lands ſafely at laſt near to Vannes, which was held by the French; and laying ſiege to the City, with the aſſiſtance of Walter de Manny, who came unto him, after many aſſaults, at laſt he took it, to the great joy of the Counteſs of Montford, though ſhe held it not long; for certain reſolute French Knights aſſaulted it ſoon after, and recovered it from the Engliſh. In which action many Lords were ſlain or wounded, and particularly Robert d' Artois himſelf; who paſſing over into England, for the better curing of his wounds, ſoon after died, and was buried in Pauls Church in London. And now King Edward himſelf with a ſtrong Army paſſeth over into Britain, and plants his Camp before the City of Vannes, where was like to have been a cruel Battel; but in the inſtant there came from Pope Clement the ſixth, two Cardinals, the Biſhops of Preneſte and Tuſculum: who upon certain conditions concluded a Peace. Amongſt other conditions this was one, that the City of Vannes ſhould be delivered to King Philip; and thereupon John Earl of Montford ſhould be ſet at liberty, but yet with this charge, not to go into Britain: which promiſe notwithſtanding he kept not, but went preſently and beſieged a Town in Britain, though he were forced to retire, and died ſhortly after. But the Truce cracked thus, as it were, by Montford, was afterward abſolutely broken by King Edward; though he charged the breach of it upon King Philip, and King Philip upon him: But howſoever, broken it was, and Henry of Lancaſter Earl of Derby, with divers other Earls and Barons, is ſent into France, who won many Towns in Gaſcoyne, and in the Counties of Perigort and Tholouſe, and then went to winter at Burdeaux. And afterward in May following, purſuing his Victories, he won many more Towns; and amongſt others, the great Town of Reoll. After this again, he took Montpeſat, Maurore, Villefranche, and many other Towns; and at laſt the great City of Angouleſme, and then came to winter again at Burdeaux.

KING Philip informed of ſo many great loſſes, aſſembles a mighty Army, no leſs then a hundred thouſand men, with which he recovers Miremont, and Villefranche, and then proceeded to beſiege Angouleſme; whom the Earl of Derby having not forces ſufficient to encounter, King Edward (leaving for Wardens of England in his abſence, the Lords Piercy and Nevil) goeth himſelf in perſon with an Army (as Froiſſard ſaith) of fourſcore thouſand men at Arms, and ten thouſand Archers, beſides thoſe out of Wales and Ireland: taking with him his Son, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Guyen, being then but of the age of fifteen years. It may be thought prepoſterous in King Edward to put his Son to be a Souldier before he was come to be a man; but it ſeems he had a longing to try his ſons valour in the bud, and perhaps was loath to omit any thing that might give any countenance to this Battel, in which the two Kingdoms were laid as it were at ſtake: but howſoever, taking him along with him, and almoſt all the Lords of his Kingdom, he takes Shipping, and lands at Normandy, where at his firſt ſetting his foot on ground, he took ſuch a fall, that the blood guſhed out at his noſe; which the Barons took for an ill ſign, but the King took it for a good: ſaying, It was a ſign that the Land deſired to have him. And indeed he preſently took the Towns of Harfleur, Moulbeurgh, Carenton, and Saint Lo, and afterward the City of Caen it ſelf; and from thence paſſed to the County of Eureux, ſaccaged, and pillaged it, as alſo the City of Gyſors, Vernon, Meulan, and Boulebourſe to the City of Poiſſy. King Philip all this while ſtayed about Paris, as looking for King Edward to give him Battel there; and for that purpoſe had planted his Camp near to Saint Germans: but King Edward deceived him. For going from Poiſſy, he paſſed into Picardy, and Ponthieu, where he took and burned many Towns and Caſtles; and then paſſed the River of Soame, though not without danger: For King Philip had ſent thither Gandemar de Fay, with a thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot to ſtop his paſſage. King Edward notwithſtanding reſolves to paſs, or periſh, and plungeth foremoſt into the River; crying out, They who love me will follow me. At which voice every man ſtrove who ſhould go formoſt, and ſo the ſhore was preſently gained by the Engliſh. Gandemar aſtoniſhed with his bold adventure, aſtoniſheth his people with his fearful countenance: ſo that the Engliſh encountring the French all in diſorder, put them to flight. King Philip enraged with this diſhonour, reſolves to revenge it; and preſently provokes King Edward to Battel. King Edward had now encamped in a Village called Creſſy, his Army conſiſted of thirty thouſand men, which he divided into three Battalias: the firſt was led by the young Prince of Wales, with whom were joyned the Earl of Warwick, Geoffry of Harecourt, Thomas Holland, Richard Stafford, John Chandoes, Robert Nevile, and many other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, two thouſand Archers, and a thouſand thouſand Welſh. In the ſecond were the Earls of Northampton and of Arundel, the Lords, Roſſe, Baſſet, and others, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. In the third the King was himſelf, having about him ſeven hundred men at Arms, and three thouſand Archers. The Battels thus ordered, mounted on a white Hobby, he rode from rank to rank to view them; encouraging every man that day to have regard to his right and honour. The French Kings Army was far greater, conſiſting of above ſixty thouſand combatants well armed; whereof the chief were Charles Duke of Alanſon the Kings Brother, John of Luxemburgh King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the Kings Nephew, Ralph Duke of Lorain, the Earls of Flanders, Nevers, Sancerre; of Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, about three thouſand. The Vaunt-guard he commits to his Brother the Count de Alanſon, the Reer to the Earl of Savoy, the main Battel he leads himſelf; his heat out of confidence of Victory, was ſo great, that it ſcarce permitted time for a little counſel what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia adviſed that the Army ſhould take ſome repaſt, and that the Infantry conſiſting of Genoueſes (which were above fifteen thouſand Croſs-bows, and ſure men) ſhould make the firſt Front, and the Cavalry to follow; which was agreed on. But the Count of Alanſon, contrary to this order, took it ill that the Genoueſes were in the firſt rank; and in fury cauſed them to change place, which bred that diſcontentment, that it irritated them more againſt the Leader then the enemy. Beſides, there fell at the inſtant ſuch a ſhowre of rain, as diſſolved their ſtrings, and made their Bows of little uſe; and at the breaking up of the ſhowre, the Sun ſhone full in the face of the French (dazling their ſight) and on the back of the Engliſh, as if all made for them. King Edward who had gotten to a Windmil, beholding as from a Sentinel, the countenance of the enemy, and diſcovering the diſturbance made by the change of place, inſtantly ſends to charge that part, without giving them time to re-accommodate themſelves: whereupon the diſcontented Genoueſes recoil, which the Count de Alanſon perceiving, he comes on with the horſe, and in great rage cries out, On, on, Let us make way upon the bellies of theſe Genoueſes, who do but hinder us: and inſtantly pricks on with a full carier through the midſt of them, followed by the Earls of Lorain and Savoy, and never ſtayes till he came up to the Engliſh Battel, where the Prince was. The fight grew hot and doubtful, inſomuch as the Commanders about the Prince ſend to King Edward to come up with his power to aid him. The King asks the meſſengers whether his Son were ſlain or hurt: who anſwering, No, but that he was like to be overlaid; well then (ſaid the King) return and tell them who ſent you, that ſo long as my ſon is alive, they ſend no more to me whatever happen; for I will that the honour of this day be his. And ſo being left to try for themſelves, they wrought it out with the Sword; the rather becauſe the French King having his horſe ſlain under him, and in danger to be troden to death, had he not been recovered by the Lord Beaumont, was to the great diſcouragement of his people, withdrawn out of the field: whereof notice being once taken by the Engliſh, the day was ſoon after theirs, and the greateſt Victory they ever had yet againſt the French; and ſo bloody, as there is no mention made of any one priſoner taken in the Battel, but all ſlain out-right; only ſome few Troops that held together, ſaved themſelves by retiring to places near adjoyning. The French King himſelf with a ſmall company got to Bray in the night, and approaching the Walls, and the Guard asking who goes there? he anſwered the Fortune of France. By his voice he was known, and thereupon received into the Town, with the tears and lamentations of his people. The number of the ſlain are certified to be thirty thouſand: the chief whereof, were Charles de Alanſon, John Duke of Burbon, Ralph Earl of Lorain, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Jaques Daulphin de Viennois, ſon to Imbert, (who after gave Daulphin to the Crown of France) the Earls of Sancerre, Harecourt, and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteen hundred. This memorable Victory happened upon the Saturday after Bartholomew day, in the year 1346. The next day early in the morning, being Sunday, he ſent out 300. Lances, and 2000. Archers, to diſcover what was become of the enemy, who found great Troops coming from Abbeville, Saint Requier, Roan, and Beauvoys (ignorant of what happened) led by the Archbiſhop of Roan, and the Prior of France: whom they likewiſe defeated, and ſlew ſeven thouſand.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward that year; there was another of no leſs importance gotten in England, by the Queen and his people at home, againſt the Scots: who being ſet on by the French to divert the War there, entred upon this Kingdom with threeſcore thouſand men (as our Writers report) aſſuring himſelf of ſucceſs, in regard (as he ſuppoſed) the main ſtrength thereof was now gone into France; but he found it otherwiſe. For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Umphrevile, the Earl of Angus, Henry Piercy, Ralph Nevile, William Dayncourt, with the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gathered ſo great Forces, and ſo well ordered them, by the animation of the Queen (who was there in perſon) as fighting a great Battel at Nevils Croſs, in the Biſhoprick of Durham, they utterly defeated this great Army, took David their King priſoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteith, Murry, Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbiſhop of Saint Andrews, and others; and put to the Sword fifteen thouſand Scots. This Victory alſo fell upon a Saturday, ſix weeks after that of Creſſy. He that took King David Priſoner, was one John Copland, an Eſquire of Northumberland, whom King Edward rewarded with five hundred pound land a year, and made him a Banneret. And as if all concurred to

And now King Edward without medling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbevile, marched on directly, and sits down before Callice, a Town of more importance for England, and the Gate to all the rest: Wherein John de Vienne Marshal of France, and the Lord de Andreghen, (a great man in his time) commanded. The King being to make it a Winter siege, erected for him and his people, so many houses and lodges, that it was named New-Callice.

King Edward sits down before Callice.

All that Winter King Edward lay without any molestation by the French King, who was busied at home in his own State about raising of money; wherewith supplied at last, he raiseth an Army and approached Callice, but finds no way open to come to relieve it. The King of England was both Master of the Haven and possest all other waies that were passable; and the Flemmings his friends had besieged Aire. To oppose whom, John Duke of Normandy is sent for out of Guyenne: who departing leaves Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby, Master of the Field; and he having an Army consisting of twelve hundred men at Arms, two thousand Archers and three thousand other Foot, takes in most of the Towns of Xaintoigne, and Poictou, and in the end besieged and sacked Poictiers, and then returns to Burdeaux, with more pillage then his people could well bear: Thus the English prosper every where, and the French suffer. During the siege of Callice, (in which some think King Edward first used Guns) the Flemmings send to King Edward, to make a marriage between his Daughter Isabel and their Lord, the young Count Lewis; to which the King consented, but the Duke of Brabant gets the King of France to make the match for a Daughter of his. The Flemmings press their Lord with the match of England; but he absolutely refused it, saying, he would never marry a Daughter of him, that had killed his Father, though he would give him half his Kingdom. This answer so incensed the Flemmings, that they put their Lord in Prison, till with long durance he at last consented; and thereupon King Edward and his Queen, with their Daughter Isabel came over to Berghes, and there the young Earl is affianced to her: but returning afterwards into Flanders, as soon as he found opportunity, he went to King Philip, and left his affianced Lady unmarried; and married afterwards a Daughter of the Duke of Brabants. But all this while the siege of Callice was continued; and King Philip not being able to come to relieve it, solicits King Edward to appoint some place of battail, and he would meet him. But King Edward returns answer, that if he would make his own way, to come thither to him, there he should finde him, but from thence he would part; having lain there so long to his great labour and expence, and being now so near the point of gaining the place. Two Cardinals are sent from the Pope, to mediate a Peace, but could effect nothing; so as the French King was forced to break up his Army and retire to Paris, leaving Callice to the mercy of the besieger: which when the Town understood, they sent to desire Parle, had it granted, and therein received this final answer, that six of the chief Burgesses should be sent to the King bare-headed, and bare-footed, in their shirts, with halters about their necks, the keys of the Town and Castle in their hands, and submit themselves to the Kings will; the rest he was content to take to mercy. This seemed a hard condition and much difficulty who should be those six: but one rising up, and out of love to his Countrey offering himself to be one, the six were soon made up; for now by his example every one strove to be of the number: who presenting themselves before the King, he commanded them instantly to be put to death. Great supplication was made by his Lords for their lives, but the King would not be drawn to alter his sentence, till the Queen, great with Childe, fell on her knees, and with tears obtained pardon for them; which done, she caused them to be cloathed, and besides a good repast, gives to every one of them six Nobles a piece. But though the King in this sentence shewed severity, yet in an Act before he had shewed mercy; For when Victuals began to fail in the Town, and all unuseful persons, as old men, women, and children, were put out of the Gates, he forced them not back again as he might have done, thereby the sooner to consume their store: but suffered them to pass through his Army, gave them to eat and two pence a piece to all of them. And thus was that strong Town of Callice gotten, the third day of August, in the year 1347. after eleven months siege, and continued afterward in possession of the English two hundred and ten years. All the Inhabitants are turned out, but only one Priest, and two old men, to inform of the Orders of the Town: and a Colony of English, amongst which seven and thirty good Families out of London, is sent to inhabit it; the King and Queen enter the Town triumphantly, and make their abode there, till the Queen was brought a bed of her Daughter Margaret. The King made Governour of the Town, Aymery of Pavia a Lombard, whom he had brought up from his Infancy; and then with his Queen returns into England. At which time the Princes Electours send to signifie, that they had chosen him King of the Romans; but the King refuseth to accept it, as being an honour out of his way, and scarce compatible with his State at home.

Callice desires a Parle.

King Edward requires six of their chief Burgesses to bring the keyes of the Town to him with halters about their necks, whom he judged to be put to death.

But at the Queens intercession spares them.

King Edward is chosen King of the Romans, but refuseth it.

After this, Truces, were made by mediation, from one time to another, for the space of two years; in which time, Geoffry de Charmy Captain of Saint Omer, agreed with Aymery of Pavia, whom King Edward had left Governour of Callice, to render it up for twenty thousand Crowns: which King Edward hearing of, sent to Aymery, and charged him with this perfidiousness; whereupon Aymery comes to the King, and humbly desiring pardon, promiseth to handle the the matter ſo as ſhall be to the Kings advantage, and thereupon is ſent back to Callice. The King, the night before the time of agreement arrives with three hundred men at Arms, and ſix hundred Archers: Mounſieur de Charmy ſets out likewiſe the ſame night from Saint Omers with his Forces, and ſent a hundred men before with the Crowns to Aymery. The men are let in at a Poſtern Gate, the Crowns received, and aſſured to be all weight: which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and out marches the King before day to encounter Mounſieur de Charmy; who perceiving himſelf betrayed, defended himſelf the beſt he could, and put King Edward to a hard bickering, who for that he would not be known there in perſon, put himſelf and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and was twice beaten down on his knees by Mounſieur de Riboumont, a hardy Knight (with whom he fought hand to hand) and yet recovered, and in the end took Riboumont priſoner. Charmy was likewiſe taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the night after (which was the firſt of the new year, feaſted with the priſoners; and gave Riboumont in honour of his valour, a rich Chaplet of Pearl, which himſelf wore on his head (for a New-years-gift) forgave him his ranſome, and ſet him at liberty. But the Engliſh not long after, in the like practice, had better ſucceſs, and got the Caſtle of Guyſnes, (a piece of great importance near Callice) for a ſum of money, given to one Beaconroy a French man. Of which Caſtle when the French King demanded reſtitution, in regard of the Truce, King Edward returns anſwer, that for things bought and ſold between their people, there was no exception, and ſo held it.

But gets the bribe, and yet keeps the Town.

King Edward twice beaten down on his knees by Mounſieur de Riboumont; yet at laſt takes him priſoner.

He rewards Riboumont for his valour.

1350. About this time Philip King of France died, leaving his ſon John to ſucceed him; in the beginning of whoſe Reign, Humbert Prince of Daulphin, dying without iſſue, made him his heir; and thereupon Charles, King John's Son was created the firſt Daulphin of France: from whence it grew to be a cuſtom that the King of France his heir ſhould alwayes be called Daulphin of France. About this time alſo the Duke of Lancaſter was to perform a Combat, upon a challenge with a Prince of Bohemia; but when they had entred the Liſts, and had taken their Oaths, King John interpoſed and made them friends. And now when after many means of mediation, no peace could be concluded between the two Kings, the Prince of Wales being now grown a man, is appointed by Parliament to go into Gaſcoyn with a thouſand men at Arms, two thouſand Archers, and a great number of Welſhmen; and in June following he ſets forth with three hundred Sail, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford; the Lord Chandos, the Lord James Audeley, Sir Robert Knolls, Sir Francis Hall, with many others. About Michaelmas following, the King himſelf paſſeth over to Callice with another Army, taking with him two of his Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulſter in right of his Wife, and John of Gaunt, Earl of Richmond. There met him at Callice of Mercenaries out of Germany, Flanders, and Brabant, a thouſand men at Arms; ſo that his Army conſiſted of three thouſand men at Arms, and two thouſand Archers on horſe-back, beſides

Archers on foot. The City of London ſent three hundred men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one livery, at their own charge; but all this great Army effected nothing at that time, by reaſon the King of France would not be drawn to any Encounter, and had ſo diſfurniſhed the Countrey of all proviſions, that the King of England was forced to return. King Edward ſolicited by the King of Navarre to aid him againſt the King of France, ſends over the Duke of Lancaſter with four thouſand men at Arms, who wins many Towns; and the Prince enters Guyenne, paſſeth over Languedock to Tholouſe, Narbonne, Burges, without any encounter, ſacks, ſpoils; and deſtroyes where he goes; and loaden with booties, returns to Burdeaux. The French King thus aſſaulted on all ſides, gathers all the power he poſſibly could; and firſt makes againſt his Enemies in Normandy, recovers many of his loſt Towns, and was likely to have there prevailed; but that he was drawn of force to oppoſe this freſh Invader, the Prince of Wales, who was come up into Touraine, againſt whom he brings his whole Army, conſiſting of above threeſcore thouſand: whereupon the Prince, whoſe Forces were not likely to be able to encounter him (being ſix for one) was adviſed to retire again to Burdeaux. But the French King to prevent this courſe, follows; and within two Leagues of Poyctiers, hath him at a great advantage. At which inſtant two Cardinals came from the Pope to mediate a Peace. But the French King ſuppoſing he had his enemy now in his mercy, would accept of no other conditions, but that the Prince ſhould deliver him four Hoſtages; and as vanquiſhed, render himſelf and his Army to his diſcretion. The Prince was content to reſtore unto him what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice of his honour, wherein he ſaid he ſtood accomptable to his Father, and to his Countrey. But the French King would abate nothing of his demands, as making himſelf ſure of Victory; and thereupon was inſtantly ready to ſet upon the Prince: who ſeeing himſelf reduced to this ſtraight, takes what advantage he could of the ground, and providently got the benefit of Vines, Shrubs, and Buſhes, on that part he was like to be aſſailed, to impeſter and intangle the French Horſe, which he ſaw were to come furiouſly upon him. The ſucceſs anſwered his expectation, for the Cavalry of his Enemies upon their firſt aſſault were ſo wrapt and encumbred amongſt the Vines, that his Archers galled and annoyed them at their pleaſure. For the French King to give the honour of the day to his Cavalry, imployed them only without his Infantry; ſo as they being diſordered and put to rout, his whole Army came utterly to be defeated. In this Battel were taken priſoners King John himſelf, with his youngeſt Son Philip, by Dennis de Morbecque, a Knight of Artois; Jaques de Bourbon, Conte de Ponthieu; the Archbiſhop of Sens, John de Artois, Conte de Eu; Charles de Artois; his brother Count de Longueville; John de Melun; Count de Tankerville; the Counts of Vendoſme, Vaudemont, Eſtampes, Salbourg, Dampmartin and La Roche, and John de Ceintre, accounted (as Froyſſard ſaith) the beſt Knight of France, with many other Lords beſides two thouſand Knights and Gentlemen; inſomuch insomuch as the Conquerours holding it not safe to retain so many, let many of them go. The French who can give best account of their own losses, report there died in this Battel, a thousand seven hundred Gentlemen, amongst which were fifty two Bannerets: the most eminent Peter de Bourbon, the Duke of Athens Constable of France, Jehan de Clermont, Marshal; Geoffry de Charmy, high Chamberlain; the Bishop of Chalons, the Lords of Landas, of Pons, and of Chambly. There escaped from this Battel three of the French Kings Sons, (for he brought them all thither) Charles Prince Daulphin; Lowys after Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Barry: all great actors in the time following. The special great men of the English in this fight, were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, Stafford; the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Barkeley, Basset: of Gascoynes, Le Capital de Beuff; the Lords, Pumyer, Chamount, and others. The Lord James Audeley won honour both by his valour, and his bounty; for having vowed to be foremost in this fight, he performed his word, and sealed it with many wounds: for which the Prince having rewarded him with the gift of five hundred Marks Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Esquires. Whereupon the Prince demanding whether he accepted not his gift? he answered, that these men had deserved the same as well as himself, and had more need of it: with which reply the Prince was so well pleased, that he gave him five hundred Marks more in the same kinde. A rare example, where desert in the Subject, and reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater.

The Lord James Audeley his valour: and his bounty.

But here great strife arose between many, who should be the man that took King John prisoner; but the Prince commanded them to forbear their claims, till they came into England: where the matter being heard, it was adjudged by King John's own testimony, that one Sir Denis Morbecque of Saint Omers had taken him prisoner: for which service the King rewarded him with a thousand Marks.

And now, though King John had the misfortune to fall into the hands of his enemy, yet he had the happiness to fall into the hands of a noble Enemy; for Prince Edward used him with such respect and observance, that he could not finde much difference between his captivity and liberty. After the Battel, which was fought the nineteenth day of September, in the year 1357. Prince Edward leads King John and the captive Lords to Burdeaux, where he retains them till the Spring following; but sends present news of this Victory to his Father: who thereupon causeth a general Thanksgiving all England over eight dayes together. And in May following King John rather coming over with the Prince, then brought over by him, is lodged at the Savoy, a Palace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster, and the fairest at that time about London. And King Edward, as though he thought it honour enough to have one King his Prisoner at once, at the suit of his Sister Queen Joan, sets her Husband David King of Scots at liberty, after he had been prisoner in England eleven years; but not without paying a ransome, which was a hundred thousand Marks to be paid in ten years.

David King of Scots, after eleven years imprisonment is set at liberty

After this, by mediation of Cardinals sent by the Pope, a Truce for two years is concluded between the two Kingdoms of England and France; and in the time of this Truce, Articles of Peace between the two Kings are propounded. King Edward requires the Dutchies of Normandy and Guyenne, the Countries of Poictou, Thouraine, Maine, and Anjou, with all their appurtenances as large as King Richard the first held them, and many other Provinces besides, and to hold them all without Homage or any other service; to which Articles King John (weary of imprisonment) assents and seals, but the Daulphin and Council of France utterly reject it. Whereupon King Edward in great displeasure resolves to make an end of this work with the Sword, and to take possession of the Kingdom of France; and leaving his younger Son Thomas Governour of his Kingdom at home, with a Fleet of eleven hundred Sail, and taking all the great Lords of the Realm with him, he passeth over to Callice, dividing his Army into three Battels, whereof one he commits to the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself. And first marching through Picardy, where he takes in many Towns, he plants his siege afterward before Rheims: but having spent there six or seven weeks without effecting any thing, he passeth thence, and taketh in the Cities of Sens and Nevers, the Dutchy of Burgoine redeems it self from spoil with paying two hundred thousand Florens of Gold. Then he marcheth up to Paris, and plants his Camp within two small Leagues of the Town, where he honoured 400. Esquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood: but when Sir Walter de Manny had made a Bravado before the Gates of the City, and the King saw that the Daulphin would by no provocations be drawn out to Battel, he raiseth his siege, and returns into Britain to refresh his Army, from thence he marcheth towards Chartres with a purpose to besiege that City; and though great offers were made him by the French, and Commissioners from the Pope solicited him with all earnestness to accept them: yet neither they, nor the Duke of Lancaster's perswasions could prevail with him, till a terrible storm of Hail with Thunder and Lightning fell upon his Army, which so terrified him, being a warning, as it were from Heaven, that he presently vowed to make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable conditions, as shortly after he did at a Treaty of Britigny near to Chartres upon these Articles: that the Feifs of Thouars and Belleville, the Dutchy of Guyenne, comprising Gascoyne, Poictou, Santoigne, Limosin, Perigort, Quercie, Rhodes, Angoulesm, and Rochel, together with the Counties of Guysnes and Callice, and some other places with the Homages of the Lords within those Territories, should be to the King of England, who besides was to have three millions of Crowns of Gold; whereof six hundred thousand in hand, four hundred thousand the year following, and the rest in two years after: and for this the King of England, and his Son the Prince of Wales, for them and their successours for ever, should renounce all their right pretended to the Crown of France, the Dutchy

The Daulphin and Council of France not yielding to King Edward's demands, he passeth with an Army over into France.

He marcheth up to Paris.

Dutchy of Normandy, the Countries of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, the Homage and Sovereignty of Britain, and the Earldome of Flanders; and within three weeks King John to be rendred at Callice, at the charge of the King of England, except the expences of his houſe. For aſſurance of which accord ſhould be given into his hand five and twenty of the greateſt Dukes and Lords of France for Hoſtages, The Scots not to be aided by the French King, nor the Flemings by the Engliſh. This accord and final Peace ſigned by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldeſt Sons, Edward and Charles, and ſworn unto by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hoſtages are delivered to King Edward, who brought them into England; and thereupon King John is honourably conducted to Callice, after he had remained priſoner in England near about five years: but being come to Callice, he was detained there above three months, till the money which he was to pay in hand, could be provided; and for providing the reſt he was put to hard ſhifts, being feign to give the Jews leave to dwell in France for twenty years, paying twelve Florens a man at the entry, and ſix every year after. At this time the Prince by diſpenſation, marries the Counteſs of Kent, Daughter to Edmund, brother to Edward the ſecond; and his Father inveſting him with the Dutchy of Aquitain, he was now Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain, Duke of Cornwal, and Earl of Cheſter and Kent: and not long after, with the Princeſs his Wife, he paſſeth over into France, and keeps his Court at Burdeaux.

King John after five years impriſonment is releaſed.

Edward Prince of Wales marries the Counteſs of Kent, and keeps his Court at Burdeaux.

1362. This was now the year 1362. and the fiftieth year of King Edward's age, wherein for a Jubile, he ſhews himſelf extraordinarily gracious to his people, freely pardoning many offences, releaſing priſoners, revoking exiles; with many other expreſſions of his love and bounty. The year following was famous for three Kings coming into England; John King of France, Peter King of Cyprus, and David King of Scots. The King of Cyprus came to ſolicit King Edward to joyn with other Princes in the Holy War, but receives only royal entertainment and excuſes. The King of Scots came for buſineſs and viſitation, but why the King of France came is not ſo certain; whether it were about taking order for his Hoſtages; or to ſatisfie King Edward for breach of ſome Articles; or elſe for love to the Counteſs of Salisbury; or perhaps out of a deſire to let England ſee his Majeſty, being at liberty, which had been darkened before by the cloud of captivity: but whatſoever the cauſe of his coming was, the cauſe of his ſtaying (at leaſt, of longer ſtaying then he meant) was a mortal ſickneſs, whereof (having lien all the Winter at the Savoy) in March or April following he died; and his body conveyed over into France, was buried at Saint Dennis with his Anceſtours.

King John comes into England.

And here falls ſick, and dieth.

The Prince of Wales was now grown famous all the Chriſtian world over, and the man to whom all wronged Princes ſeem to appeal, and to flie for ſuccour: for which end there came at this time to his Court, James King of Majorque, and happened to come at a time when the Princeſs lay in; and thereupon he and Richard King of Navarre were taken to be God-fathers to his Son Richard. For the like aſſiſtance alſo there came at the ſame time to him, Peter King of Caſtile, driven out of his Kingdom by the French, in favour to Peter King of Aragon: and Prince Edward, partly out of charity to ſuccour a diſtreſſed Prince, and partly out of policy, to keep his Souldiers in exerciſe, undertakes the enterpriſe, and was ſo proſperous in it, that with one Battel (having but 30000. againſt 100000.) he put King Peter in poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, though he was ill rewarded for his labour; for the ungrateful King would not ſo much as pay his Souldiers. And it is memorable which Froiſſard writes, that of the enemies were ſlain and drowned above 2000. and of the Princes party not above 40. But yet an unfortunate journey for the Prince, for though he came back with victory; yet he brought back with him ſuch an indiſpoſition of body, that he was never throughly well after: not perhaps by poyſon, nor given him by his Brother the Duke of Lancaſter, though both were ſuſpected; but there were cauſes of diſtempering him enough beſides, the Countrey, the Seaſon, the Action it ſelf: and it may be more marvelled that his Souldiers came home ſo well, then that he came home ſo ill. But howſoever, being now returned, there was preſently to his indiſpoſition of body, added diſcontentment of minde; for not having means to pay his Souldiers, which forced him to wink at that which he could not chuſe but ſee, and ſeeing, grieve at, how they preyed upon the Countrey, and thereupon how the Countrey murmured againſt him. And now to ſtop this murmuring, his Chancellour, the Biſhop of Rhodes, deviſed a new impoſition, of levying a Frank for every Chimney; and this to continue for five years to pay the Princes debts: but this Impoſition made the murmuring the more. For though ſome part of his Dominions, as the Poictovins, Xaintons, and Lymouſins, in a ſort conſented to it, yet the Count of Armigniack, the Count of Cominges, the Viſcount of Carmain, and many others ſo much diſtaſted it, that they complained thereof to the King of France, as to their Supreme Lord; who upon examination finding their complaint to be juſt, he thereupon by advice of his Council, ſummons Prince Edward to appear in perſon to anſwer the complaint: Whereunto Prince Edward made anſwer, that if he muſt needs appear, he would bring threeſcore thouſand men in Arms to appear with him; and had certainly brought his Army that Summer againſt Paris, if he had not fallen into ſymptomes of a Dropſie which (Walſingham ſaith) was wrought by enchantment. But upon this anſwer of the Prince, King Charles ſends defiance to King Edward, who thereupon prepares Arms both by Sea and Land to oppoſe him. The French enters upon the Territories of the Prince, and defeats divers of his Troops; in revenge whereof John Chaundos the Princes Lieutenant aſſaults Terriers in the Province of Tholouſe, and takes it. The Count of Perigort aſſaults Roy anville in Quercy, and put all the Engliſh to the Sword; in revenge whereof James Audeley Seneſchal of Poictou, aſſaults the City of Broſs, and takes it. In the mean time Robert Knolls, by ſome called Robin, and by others Arnold, or Reynold Knoll, had drawn drawn Perducas de Albert to the party of the Engliſh; and thereupon went and encamped before the Fort of Darcuel in Quercy, which John Chandois underſtanding, went alſo and joyned with him in the ſiege: but finding they could do no good there, they removed and beſieged the City of Damme; and when they could do no good there neither, they marched forward, took the Fort of Froyns, Rochevandour, and Villefranche; and that done, returned to the Prince at Angouleſme. At the ſame time the Earls of Cambridge aud Pembroke, having ſpent nine weeks at the ſiege of Bordeille, at laſt took it; but other Captains of the Engliſh did yet more, for they ſcaled Belleperche in the Province of Bourbon, where the Mother of the Duke of Bourbon, and the Queen of France was, and take her priſoner.

Queen Eliſippa dieth.

About this time, Philippa Queen of England, King Edward's Wife died, and was buried at Weſtminſter: but this hindered not the proceeding of the Engliſh in France. The Earl of Pembroke enters Anjou, where he takes many Towns. The Duke of Lancaſter doth the like about Callice, and marching forward, plants his Camp before Harfleur, with a purpoſe to burn the King of France his Navy; but being watched by the Count Saint Paul, was forced to forbear that deſign: and ſo paſſing other wayes, and ſpoiling all the places where he paſſed, he returned to Callice. Winter was now drawing on, and John Chandois deſiring to recover the Abbey of Saint Silvan in Poictou, which not long before had been betrayed to the French, was in the enterpriſe diſcovered; and being aſſaulted by greater Forces, was ſlain in the place, to the great grief of the Prince of Wales, and of the Engliſh Lords: but dying without iſſue, his Eſtate which amounted to four hundred thouſand Franks, came to the Prince. At this time the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, with two great Armies enter upon the Territories of the Prince of Wales; whereof the Prince advertiſed, aſſembles Forces to oppoſe them: but when the news was brought him of the taking of Limonges, he was ſo much troubled at it, by reaſon the Biſhop of that place was his Goſſip, and one in whom he ſpecially had affiance, that he reſolved to recover it at any price, and not to ſpare a man that had a hand in rendring it up. And thereupon taking it by force, he commanded to ſack and pillage it, and would not be ſtayed by the cries of the people, caſting themſelves down at his feet; till paſſing through the Town, he perceived three French Captains, who themſelves alone had withſtood the aſſault of his victorious Army; and moved with the conſideration of their Valour, he then abated his anger, and for their ſakes granted mercy to all the Inhabitants. So much is vertue even in an Enemy, reſpected by generous mindes. In the mean time David King of Scots died without iſſue, and Robert Stuart his Nephew ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, and was Crowned at Scone. At this time Robert Knolls with a great Army is ſent into France, where making many attempts with valour enough, but with little ſucceſs, he was coming home though with no gain, yet with no loſs: till Bertrand de Gueſchlyn aſſaulting him, ſlew the moſt part of his men; and ſo this great Army on a ſudden came to nothing. It ſeems Knolls his action was the leſs ſucceſſful, by reaſon of ſome young Lords that went with him, ſcorning to be under his command; as being now a new man, and riſen from a low eſtate, were refractory to his directions: and indeed what can a General do, if he have not as well reputation of perſon, as of place?

Valour reſpected in an Enemy.

Robert Stuart crowned King of Scotland.

And now the Prince of Wales, his eldeſt Son Edward dying at Burdeaux, the Prince with his Wife, and other Son Richard, came over into England; at which time the valiant Knight Walter de Manny died at London, and was buried in the Monaſtery of the Chartreux which he had builded; leaving one only Daughter, married to John Earl of Pembroke. This Earl of Pembroke, was ſoon after ſent Governour into Aquitain; but ſet upon by the way by Spaniards in favour of the French, was by them taken priſoner, and carried with others into Spain: who being chained together, as the manner is, one Evans a Welſh Fugitive, who gave himſelf out for the right Heir of Wales, came upon him, fooliſhly playing upon him with ſcornful language; as though to inſult over another mans miſery, could ſerve for a cordial to mitigate his own. And now upon the taking of this Earl, the Princes Dominions in France, are either taken away, or fall away faſter then they were gotten. Gueſchlyn enters Poictou, takes Montmorillon, Chauvigny, Luſſack, and Moncontour: ſtraight after follows the Countrey of Aulnis, or Xantoigne, and the reſt of Poictou; then St. Maxent, Neele, Aulnai; then Benaon, Marant, Surgers, Fontency; and at laſt they came to Thouras, where the moſt part of the Lords of Poictou, that held with the Prince were aſſembled. At which time King Edward, with the Prince, the Duke of Lancaſter, and all the great Lords of England, ſet forward to their ſuccour, but being driven back by tempeſt, never came to give them aſſiſtance, ſo as Thouras yielded upon compoſition. Yet did this preparation of the King ſtand him in nine thouſand Marks; that it may be truly ſaid, it coſt him more now to loſe Towns, then it had coſt him before to win them: ſo great odds there is between the Spring and fall of Fortune. After this the Duke of Lancaſter is ſent over with another great Army, who paſſed up into many parts of the Countrey, but King Charles reſolved to hazard no Battel: ſaying, They were but clouds, and would ſoon paſs away; yet ſo watched him, that what with light skirmiſhes, and what with ſcarcity of Victuals, his Forces were ſo diminiſhed, that of thirty thouſand which went out of Callice, there ſcarce returned ſix thouſand home; which made King Edward ſay of this King Charles, that he did him more miſchief ſitting ſtill, then his Predeceſſors had done with all their ſtirring. And now by this time all Poictou is loſt, and all Aquitain alſo, but only Burdeaux and Baion; when the Archbiſhop of Roan and others are ſent from Pope Gregory the eleventh, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings: but each of them ſtanding upon high terms of conditi ons, nothing could be effected, but Truce upon Truce for two or three years together. In which time Edward Prince of Wales died, and with him we may ſay, the Fortune 1376.

A Parliament called, to which of Clergy-men were summoned only four Bishops and five Abbots.

Of King Edward's Acts after the death of the Prince.

IN the time of the Princes sickness, King Edward calls a Parliament at Westminster; in which when demands were made for supply of the King, demands were presently made for redress of grievances for the Subjects. It was required that the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Latimer then Lord Chamberlain, Dame Alice Pierce the Kings Concubine, and one Sir Richard Sturry might be removed from Court: and this was so vehemently urged by their Speaker, Sir Peter de la Moore, that the King rather then not to be supplyed, gave way unto it; and thereupon all these persons are presently put from Court: but the Prince soon after dying, they are all recalled to Court again, and restored to their former places.

Subsidies are demanded by the King; and redress of grievances are demanded for the Subject. Hereupon the Duke of Lancaster and Alice Pierce are banished the Court, but soon revoked.

About this time exemplary Justice was done upon Sir John Midsterworth, Knight, who was drawn, hanged, and quartered at Tyburn for Treason by him committed, in defrauding Souldiers of their wages.

Defrauding of Souldiers punished with death.

About this time the Duke of Lancaster, being at Burdeaux, and hearing of the death of Peter King of Castile, whom Prince Edward had vested in his Kingdom; and that he left only two daughters the heirs of his Kingdom, who were then at the City of Gascoigne, for their safety, he sent and caused them to be brought to Burdeaux, and there himself married the elder sister Constance: in whose right he afterward took upon him the title of King of Castile and Leon: and not long after his younger Brother, Edmund Earl of Cambridge married the younger sister Isabel.

It was now the fiftieth year of Edward's Reign, and he for another Jubile, grants another general pardon to his Subjects, only William Wickham Bishop of Winchester is excepted, being lately by procurement of the Duke of Lancaster, fallen into the Kings displeasure, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. This Parliament was called the good Parliament, though it wrought ill effects; for Sir Peter de la Moore at the suit of Alice Pierce, is committed to perpetual imprisonment at Forthingham, though within two years after, by importunate suit of friends he regained his liberty. This Alice Pierce presuming upon the Kings favour, grew so insolent, that she intermedled with Courts of Justice, and other Offices; where she her self would sit, to Countenance her Causes. And now the Duke of Lancaster is come to have the Regency, and to manage all the Affairs of the Kingdom; but King Edward to prevent the mischiefs, which by disordering the succession might grow in the Kingdom, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Burdeaux, creating him first Earl of Chester and Cornwal, and then Prince of Wales; and caused all the Lords of the Realm to take an Oath, to accept him for their King, as his lawful Heir, when himself should be dead. In this mean time a Treaty was had about a marriage between this Prince Richard, and Mary a daughter of Charles King of France: and an offer was made to King Edward, to leave him fourteen hundred Towns, and three thousand Fortresses in Aquitain, upon condition he would render Callice, and all that he held in Picardy; but before any thing could be concluded, King Edward died.

Of his Taxations.

IN the eighth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at London, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporalty, a twentieth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a tenth of the Clergy. In his tenth year, in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted a tenth penny of Cities and Boroughs, a fifteenth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy. Also all such Treasure as was committed to the Churches through England for the Holy War is taken out for the Kings use, towards his Wars with France. The next year after all the goods of three Orders of Monks, Lombards, Cluniacs, and Cistercians, are likewise seised into the Kings hands: and the like Subsidy as before granted at Nottingham. In his twelfth year (and as some write, in absence of the King) in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted by the Laity, one half of their Wool, but of the Clergy the whole. The next year after a fifteenth was likewise paid in Wool by the Commonalty. In his fourteenth year, in a Parliament at London, is granted him for custom of every sack of Wool, forty shillings, for every three hundred Wool-Fells forty shillings, for every Last of Leather forty shillings; and of other Merchandises, according to the rate: the same to endure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve Month after. Besides there was granted of Citizens and Burgesses, a ninth part of their goods; of Foreign Merchants and others, a fifteenth; of Husbandmen, the ninth Sheaf, the ninth Fleece, the ninth Lamb for two years; also another tenth of the Clergy: and for his present supply he had Loans of divers persons; and the City of London lent twenty thousand Marks. For the grant of which mighty Subsidy, the King (besides his pardon to divers kinds of offenders) remits all amerciaments for transgressions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage to the first time of his going into Flanders, besides all aids for the marriage of his Sons and daughters during his Reign; pardoning and remitting all ancient debts and arrearages, both of his Farmers and others, till the tenth year of his Reign; and likewise confirms the great Charter of Magna Charta. In his eighteenth year in a Parliament at London, a tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity; besides a Commission is sent into every Shire to enquire of mens abilities; and all of five pounds to ten of Lay Fee, were appointed to finde an Archer on horseback; of twenty five, a Demy-launce, and so ratably above. There had formerly been made a certain coin of Gold called the Floren, of base alloy for the Kings benefit, towards towards his Wars in France, but this was now called in, and Nobles of finer metal coined, to the great contentment of the people. In his nine and thentieth year, he hath by Parliament granted unto him fifty ſhillings upon every ſack of Wool, for ſix years next enſuing; by which impoſition, it was thought the King might diſpend a thouſand Marks ſterling a day, the vent of Wool was ſo great in that time: but that which exceeded all his Taxations, was the Ranſome he had in his four and thirtieth year, of the King of France, three millions of crowns of gold. In his twelfth year, he had taken from the Priors Aliens their Houſes, Lands, and Tenements, for the maintenance of his French Wars, which he kept twenty years in his hands, and then reſtored them again. In his ſix and thirtieth year was granted twenty ſix ſhillings eight pence, for tranſportation of every ſack of Wool for three years. In the five and fortieth year of his Reign in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, the Clergy granted him fifty thouſand pounds to be paid the ſame year, and the Laity as much; which was levied by ſetting a certain rate of five pounds fifteen ſhillings upon every Pariſh, which were found in the thirty ſeven Shires to be eight thouſand and ſix hundred, and ſo came in the whole to fifty thouſand, one hundred eighty one pounds and eight pence: but 181 l. was abated to the Shires of Suffolk and Devonſhire, in regard of their poverty. In his eight and fortieth year, in a Parliament, is granted him a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity. In his fiftieth year a Subſidy of a new nature was demanded by the young Prince Richard, whom (being but eleven years of age) the Duke of Lancaſter had brought into the Parliament of purpoſe to make the demand; to have two tenths to be paid in one year, or twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandiſes ſold for one year; and one pound of ſilver for every Knights Fee, and of every Fire-houſe one penny: but inſtead of this Subſidy, after much altercation, there was granted another of as new a nature as this, that every perſon, man and woman within the Kingdom, above the age of fourteen years, ſhould pay four pence, (thoſe who lived of Alms only excepted) the Clergy to pay twelve pence of every Parſon beneficed, and of all other Religious perſons four pence. A mighty aid, and ſuch as was never granted to any King of England before.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE inſtituted the Order of the Garter, upon what cauſe is not certain. The common opinion is, that a Garter of his own Queen, or (as ſome ſay) of the Lady Jone, Counteſs of Salisbury, ſlipping off in a Dance, King Edward ſtooped, and took it up; whereat ſome of his Lords that were preſent, ſmiling, as at an amorous action, he ſeriouſly ſaid, it ſhould not be long e're Sovereign honour ſhould be done to that Garter; whereupon he afterward added the French Motto, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe; therein checking his Lords ſiniſter ſuſpicion. Some conjecture that he inſtituted the Order of the Garter, for that in a Battel wherein he was victorious, he had given the word Garter, for the word or ſign: and ſome again are of opinion, that the inſtitution of this order is more ancient, and begun by King Richard the firſt, but that this King Edward adorned it, and brought it into ſplendour. The number of the Knights of this Order is twenty ſix, whereof the King himſelf is alwayes one, and Preſident; and their Feaſt yearly celebrated at Windſor on St. Georges day, the Tutelar Saint of that Order. The Laws of the Order are many, whereof there is a book of purpoſe. In the five and thirtith year of his Reign, he was earneſtly petitioned by a Parliament then holden, that the great Charter of Liberties, and the Charter of Foreſts might be duly obſerved; and that the great Officers of the Kingdom ſhould (as in former times) be elected by Parliament. To which Petition, though the King at firſt ſtood ſtiff upon his own Election and Prerogative; yet at laſt (in regard to have his preſent turn ſerved, as himſelf after confeſſed) he yielded that ſuch Officers ſhould receive an Oath in Parliament, to do juſtice to all men in their Offices: and thereupon a Statute was made and confirmed with the Kings Seal, both for that and many other Grants of his to his Subjects; which notwithſtanding were for the moſt part ſhortly after revoked.

The great Officers of the Kingdom choſen by Parliament.

The order of the Garter inſtituted, and whereupon.

This King alſo cauſeth all Pleas, which were before in French, to be made in Engliſh, that the Subject might underſtand the courſe of the Law. Alſo in his time an Act was paſſed for Purveyors, that nothing ſhould be taken up but for ready money upon ſtrict puniſhment. In the next Parliament holden the ſeven and thirtieth year of his Reign, certain ſumptuary Laws were ordained both for apparel and diet; appointing every degree of men the ſtuffe and habits they ſhould wear, prohibiting the wearing of Gold and Silver, Silks, and rich Furs to all, but eminent perſons. The Labourer and Husbandman is appointed but one meal a day, and what meats he ſhould eat. Alſo in his time at the inſtance of the Londoners, an Act was made that no common Whore ſhould wear any Hood, except ſtriped with divers colours; nor Furs, but Garments reverſed the wrong ſide outward. This King alſo was the firſt that created Dukes, of whom Henry of Bullingbrook, Earl of Lancaſter created Duke of Lancaſter, in the ſeven and twentieth year of his Reign was the firſt. But afterward he erected Cornwal alſo into a Dutchy, and conferred it upon the Prince: after which time, the Kings eldeſt Son uſed alwayes to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, and Earl of Cheſter. This King alſo altered moneys, and abated them in weight, and yet made them to paſs according to the former value. Before this time there were no other pieces but Nobles and half Nobles, with the ſmall pieces of ſilver called Sterlings; but now Groats of four pence, and half Groats of two pence, equivalent to the ſterling money, are coyned, which inhaunced the Prizes of things, that riſe or fall, according to the plenty or ſcarcity of coyn; which made Servants and Labourers to raiſe their wages accordingly: whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Weſtminſter, to reduce the ſame to the former rate. Alſo an Act was made in this Kings time, that all Wears, Mills, and other ſtoppages of Rivers, hindering the paſſages of Boats, Lighters, and other Veſſels ſhould be removed; which though it were moſt commodious to the Kingdom, yet it took little effect, by reason of bribing and corrupting Lords and great men, who regarded more their own private, then the publick benefit. In a Parliament holden the tenth year of his Reign, it was enacted that no Wool growing within the Realm should be transported, but that it should be made in Cloth in England. Peter-Pence are forbidden by the King to be paid any more to Rome, but yet in many Shires of England are gathered to this day, saith Fabian. The custom of washing poor mens feet on Maundy-Thursday, thought to have been first brought in by this King. This King also confirmed the Franchises of the City of London; and ordained that the Mayor for the time being, should sit in all places of Judgement, within the liberty of the same, as chief Justice, the Kings person only excepted: and that every Alderman that had been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace in all London and Middlesex; and every Alderman that had not been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace within his own Ward. Also he granted to the Citizens of London, that they should not be constrained to go out of the City to fight or defend the Land for any need. Also that after that day the Franchises of the City should not be seised into the Kings hands, but only for Treason and Rebellion done by the whole City. Also that Southwark should be under the rule of the City, and the Mayor to choose a Bayliffe there, as he liked. He also granted to the Citizens of London, that the Officers of the Mayors and Sheriffs, should from that day forward use Maces of silver parcel-gilt.

No Wool to be transported.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

KIng Edward upon some displeasure, had imprisoned divers Clergy-men; whereupon John Stratford Archbishop of Canterbury writes him a Letter, charging him with violation of the Rights of the Church, and with the breach of Magna Charta; and after much good counsel given him, threatens that if he amend not these disorders, he must and will exercise his Ecclesiastical Authority, and proceed to Excommunication of his Officers, though not of himself, Queen, or Children. The King answers, and sends his Letter to the Bishop of London, charging the Archbishop to be the cause of all this disturbance, having been the man that first set him upon the War with France, assuring him he should want no money; and now had been the hinderance, that moneys given him by Parliament, were not duly levied: and after many remonstrances to such purpose, concludes, that if he desisted not from his rebellious obstinacy, he would use his Temporal Authority, and proceed against him as against a Rebel. But this difference between them was not long after, upon the Archbishops submission, reconciled. And indeed the great account which this King made of Clergy-men, may appear by his imploying almost none but Clergy-men in all his Offices of account: Simon Langham Archbishop of Canterbury, was Chancellour of England; William Wickham Archdeacon of Lincoln, Keeper of the Privy Seal: David Willer Parson of Somersham, Master of the Rolls; ten Benefic'd Priests, Civilians, Masters of the Chancery; William Mulse Dean of St. Martins le Grand, chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Receiver and Keeper of the Kings Treasure and Jewels; William Aksby Archdeacon of Northampton, Chancellour of the Exchequer; William Dighton Prebendary of St. Martins, Clerk of the Privy Seal; Richard Chesterfield Prebend of St. Stephens, Treasurer of the Kings House; Henry Snatch Parson of Oundel, Master of the Kings Wardrobe; John Newnham Parson of Fenny-Stanton, one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer; John Rowseby Parson of Harwick, Surveyor and Comptroller of the Kings works; Thomas Brittingham Parson of Asby, Treasurer to the King, for the part of Guisnes, and the Marches of Callice; John Troys a Priest, Treasurer of Ireland.

A difference between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the King.

All the great Offices of the Kingdom in the hands of Clergy-men.

In the seventeenth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, complaint is made of the great inconvenience that came by the Popes Collation of Benefices in England, conferring them upon strangers, who understood not the Language; and therefore not fit to be Pastours over a flock they could not feed: and hereupon Sir John Shordich is sent to Pope Clement the sixth, to require him to forbear such Collations, and to signifie his consent therein: but this Message was so unwelcome to the Pope, that the Messenger came back unheard, at least unanswered; and the King taking his silence for consent, or perhaps not much caring whether he consented or no, proceeded to a prohibition of all such Collations within his Realm, on pain of imprisonment, or death, to whomsoever should in time to come, present or admit any such person, who by the Pope were so preferred to the prejudice of the Kings Prerogative. These were Disturbances in matter of Discipline, but towards the end of his Reign, there fell a disturbance in matter of Doctrine; for a certain Divine named John Wickliffe, inveighed in his Sermons, and other acts in the Schools, against the abuses of Church-men, Monks, and other Religious Orders: and had by his Doctrine won many Disciples unto him, (who after were called Lollards) professing poverty, going bare-foot, and poorly clad in Russet. Amongst other his Doctrines, he taught that neither King nor other secular Lord, could give any thing in perpetuity unto Church-men; and that temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take the goods of Religious persons to relieve them in their necessities, by the example of William Rufus, and others. This man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Piercy Marshal, much favour and cherish, extolling him for his learning and integrity of life; which made him so far to presume, that daily in one Church or other he published his Opinions. Whereupon at length he is cited to answer before the Archbishop, the Bishop of London, and others in Pauls. At the day appointed, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Marshal go to conduct him; when they were come to our Ladies Chappel, the Duke and Barons with the Bishops sitting down, John Wickliffe was by the Lord Marshal willed to sit down, in regard (he said) the man had much to answer, and needed a convenient seat. The Bishop of London told him, it was against all Law and Reason, that he who was there cited before his Ordinary ſhould ſit. Whereupon a great contention between the Duke and the Biſhop of London. Hereupon contumelious words aroſe between the Lord Marſhal and the Biſhop. The Duke takes the Marſhals part, and ſharply reprehended the Biſhop, the Biſhop returns the like to the Duke; who in a great rage ſwore he would pull down the pride of him, and of all the Biſhops in England: and whiſpering in his ear, told him he had rather pull him out of the Church by the hair of the head, then to ſuffer ſuch indignities. Which words the Londoners overhearing, ſwore with a loud voice they would rather loſe their lives then ſuffer their Biſhop to be thus injuriouſly uſed. Their fury was the more againſt the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament (whereof he was Preſident) it was required in the Kings name, that from thenceforth there ſhould be no more a Mayor of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City; and that the Lord Marſhal of England ſhould arreſt offenders within the Liberties, as in other places. The morrow after the Citizens aſſembling to conſult of this buſineſs, it happened the Lord Fitz-Water, and Guido Bryan, came into the City; which the people ſeeing, furiouſly ran upon them, and were like to beat them down for coming at that time. The Lord Fitz-Water proteſted he came to no other end, but to offer his ſervice to the City, being by inheritance their Standard-bearer, and was to take injuries offered to them, as to himſelf; and therefore willed them, to look to their defence. Whereupon they preſently take Arms, aſſail the Marſhals Inne, break open the Gates, brought forth a priſoner in his Gives, and ſet him at liberty, but found not the Lord Marſhal, who with the Duke was that day to dine with one John de Ypres. Then this furious multitude ran to aſſail the Savoy, which a Knight of the Dukes ſeeing, haſtes to the place where his Lord dined; and acquaints him with this uproar in the City. The Duke upon hearing it, leaps from the Table ſo haſtily, that he hurt both his ſhins on the form; and with Sir Henry Piercy alone takes boat, and goes to Kennington near Lambeth, where the Princeſs with the young Prince lay: to whom he complains of this Riot, and the violence offered him. In the mean time the multitude coming to the Savoy, a Prieſt inquiſitive to know the buſineſs, was anſwered, they went to take the Duke, and the Lord Marſhal, and compel them to deliver Sir Peter de la Moore, unjuſtly kept in priſon. The Prieſt replied that Sir Peter was a Traytor to the King, and worthy to be hanged; At which words they all cryed out, This is Piercy, This is the Traytor of England, his ſpeech bewrayes him, though his apparel be diſguiſed: and preſently they ran upon him, and wounded him to death. The Biſhop of London hearing of this out-rage, leaves his dinner, haſtes to the Savoy, admoniſheth them of the holy time being Lent; aſſuring them, all ſhould be fairly ended for the good of the City. With whoſe perſwaſions they were ſomewhat pacified, but yet they took the Dukes Arms, and hung them up reverſed, in ſign of Treaſon, in all the principal parts of the City. Upon the Princeſſes advice, the chief Citizens ſend to the ſick King, to excuſe this tumult, ſaying it was not in their power to ſuppreſs it, the Commonalty being in commotion, upon an information that their Liberties ſhould be taken from them by Parliament. The King told them, it never was in his thought to infringe their Liberties; but he rather deſired to enlarge them. But this affront of the Citizens would not down with the Duke till he had pulled down ſome of the principal of them; for he cauſed the Mayor and Aldermen to be diſplaced, and other put in their rooms. A revenge he had better been without, for he never had the love of the City after: and to want their love is a kinde of baniſhment. Wickliffe himſelf, cenſured by the Biſhops to abjure his Opinions, choſe rather to leave his Countrey then his Doctrine; and going over into Bohemia, was there much honoured while he lived, and hath been more ſince he dyed: at leaſt a great part of his Doctrine continues in veneration amongſt that people to this day.

The Londoners take the Biſhops part, and ſet upon the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaſter's houſe.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

HIS works of Piety were great and many, as the founding of Eaſt-Minſter, an Abbey (of the Ciſteaux Order) near the Tower. An Abbey for Nuns at Dertford in Kent. The Kings Hall in Cambridge for poor Scholars. An Hoſpital for the poor at Callice. He conferred upon the Univerſity of Oxford, where he had himſelf been trained up, under the learned Walter Burley, the chief rule of the City, ſubordinating the Mayor and Citizens to the Chancellour of the Univerſity. He built Saint Stephen's Chappel at Weſtminſter, with the endowment of 300. pound per annum. He augmented the Chappel at Windſor, and made proviſions there for Church-men, and four and twenty poor Knights. Theſe were his publick works. But beſides theſe, his private Buildings were the Caſtle of Windſor, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Caſtle at Quinborough, Fortifications at Callice and other places. His Queen Philippa founded Queens Colledge in Oxford: and Mary Counteſs of Pembroke, the Colledge called Pembroke Hall in Cambridge. In this Kings time Sir John Poultney, Mayor of London, built the Colledge in London called Saint Lawrence Poultney; and little Alhallows, a Pariſh Church in Thames-ſtreet; and alſo the Carmelite Friers Church in Coventry. Henry Earl of Lancaſter and Leiceſter founded the Hoſpital by the Caſtle of Leiceſter, wherein a hundred poor impotent people were provided for with all things neceſſary. William Elſing Mercer of London, made a new Hoſpital of an old houſe of Nuns by Cripplegate; and placing Canons regular there, he became the firſt Prior thereof. Walter Stapleton Biſhop of Exeter founded Exeter Colledge, and Hart Hall in Oxford. William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich, builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. Simon Iſlip Archbiſhop of Canterbury, founded Canterbury Colledge in Oxford. William Edendon Treaſurer of England, founded the Monaſtery of Edendon; the Religious Brethren whereof were called Bonhommes. Sir Walter de Manny, born in Cambray, purchaſed a piece of ground called Spittle-Croft, containing thirteen Acres, without the Bars of Weſt-Smithfield, and cauſed the ſame to be encloſed; where he built a Chappel, and after founded the ſame to be a Houſe of Charter-Houſe Monks.

In the two and thirtieth year of this Kings Reign, John Stody, Mayor of London, gave unto the Vintners of London all the Quadrant where Vintners Hall now ſtandeth, with the Tenements round about, from the Lane to this day called Stody's Lane; where are founded thirteen houſes for thirteen poor people, which are there kept of Charity. Alſo in this Kings time Sir John Cobham founded the Colledge of Cobham in Kent. John Loufkin four times Mayor of London, builded at Kingſtone upon Thames, where he was born, a Chappel called Magdalens, to the which he joyned an Hoſpital, wherein was a Maſter, two Prieſts, and certain poor men: and for that the Pariſh Church of Saint Michael by Crooked-lane, where he dwelled, was a very homely thing, and the ground thereabout a filthy plot, by reaſon of the Butchers in Eaſtcheap, who made the ſame their Lay-ſtall, he on the ſame ground builded the fair new Pariſh-Church of St. Michael now ſtanding, and was buried there in the middle of the Quire, under a fair Tomb of Stone. He alſo founded a Colledge to the ſame Church, near thereunto adjoyning. John Barnes Mayor of London, gave a Cheſt with three Locks, and a thouſand Marks to be lent to young men upon ſecurity, ſo that it paſſed not one hundred Marks; and for the occupying thereof, if he were learned, to ſay at his pleaſure, De profundis for the ſoul of John Barnes; if he were not learned, to ſay Pater Noſter: but howſoever the money is lent, the Cheſt at this day ſtandeth in the Chamber of London, without money or pledges. Thomas of Woodſtock, the youngeſt Son of King Edward, founded a Colledge at Playſie in Eſſex, where in his life he had provided a ſumptuous Tomb, where he was firſt laid, but tranſlated afterward to Weſtminſter.

Caſualties happening in his time.

A very great Peſtilence, and continued nine years.

IN the two and twentieth year of his Reign, a contagious Peſtilence aroſe in the Eaſt and South parts of the world, and ſpread it ſelf all over Chriſtendom; and coming at laſt into England, it ſo waſted the people, that ſcarce the tenth perſon of all ſorts were left alive. There died in London (ſome ſay in Norwich) between the firſt of January and the firſt of July, 57374. perſons. In Yarmouth, in one year, 7052. men and women: before which time, the Parſonage there was worth 700. marks a year, and afterwards was ſcarce worth forty pounds a year. This Plague began in London about Alhallontide, in the year 1348. and continued till the year 1357. Where it was obſerved, that thoſe who were born after the beginning of this mortality had but twenty eight teeth, where before they had two and thirty. In the twelfth year of his Reign, a ſudden Inundation of Water, at New-Caſtle upon Tine, bare down a piece of the Town Wall, and ſix perches in length, near to a place called Walkenew; where a hundred and twenty men and women were drowned. In the five and thirtieth year of his Reign, another Peſtilence happened in England, which was called the ſecond Peſtilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaſter, alſo Reginald Lord Cobham, and Walter Fitz-Warren, two famous men, and five Biſhops, of Worceſter, of London, of Ely, of Lincoln, and of Chicheſter. In this Kings time a Froſt laſted from the midſt of September to the month of April. In the fourth year of his Reign a ſolemn Juſting or Turnament was holden at London in Cheapſide, betwixt the great Croſs and the great Conduit, nigh Soper-Lane, which laſted three dayes; where the Queen Philippa, with many Ladies fell from a Stage, ſet up for them to behold the Juſting; and though they were not hurt at all, yet the King threatned to puniſh the Carpenters for their negligence, till the Queen intreated pardon for them upon her knees: as indeed ſhe was alwayes ready to do all good offices of mercy to all people. In the eleventh year of his reign was ſo great plenty, that a quarter of Wheat was ſold at London for two ſhillings, a fat Ox for a Noble, a fat Sheep for ſix pence, and ſix Pigeons for a penny, a fat Gooſe for two pence, a Pig for a Penny, and other things after that rate. But in his twenty ſeventh year there was a great ſcarcity, by reaſon there fell no rain, or very little, from the end of March, to the end of July: and was therefore called the dry ſummer.

Many great men died of the plague.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Philippa the Daughter of William Earl of Heynault at York. A match made up in haſte by Queen Iſabel his mother, for her own ends, although a better could never have been made upon deliberation for King Edward's ends. For though her Parentage was not great, and her Portion leſs; yet ſhe made amends for both, in vertue: for never King had a better Wife. By her King Edward had ſeven ſons, and five daughters. His eldeſt ſon Edward Prince of Wales, and commonly called the Black Prince, (but why ſo called uncertain; for to ſay, of his dreadful acts, as Speed ſaith, hath little probability: and indeed Froyſſard who hath written the Reign of King Edward the third, more particularly then any other, and lived in his time, never calls Prince Edward the Black Prince, nor any where makes mention that he was ſo called) was born at Woodſtock, in the third year of his Fathers Reign. He married Joan, the daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, brother by the Fathers ſide to King Edward the ſecond. She had been twice married before; firſt to the valiant Earl of Salisbury, from whom ſhe was divorced: next to the Lord Thomas Holland; after whoſe deceaſe, this Prince paſſionately loving her, married her. By her he had iſſue two ſons, Edward the eldeſt, born at Angouleſme, who died at ſeven years of age; and Richard born at Burdeaux, who after his Father, was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather, King of England. This Prince had alſo natural iſſue, Sir John Sounder, and Roger Clarendon, Knights; the latter being attainted in the Reign of King Henry the fourth, is thought to have been Anceſtour to the houſe of Smiths in Eſſex. He died at Canterbury in the ſix and fortieth year of his age, and of his Fathers Reign the nine and fortieth, and was buried at Chriſts Church there. His ſecond ſon William was born at Hatfield in Hertfordſhire, who deceaſed in his childehood, and was buried at York. His third ſon Lionel was born at Antwerp, in the twelfth year of his Fathers reign. He married firſt Elizabeth the Daughter and Heir of William Burgh, Earl of Ulſter in Ireland, in whoſe right he was firſt created Earl of Ulſter; and becauſe he had with her the honour of Clare, in the County of Toumond, he was in a Parliament created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Countrey about the town and honour of Clare: from which Dutchy, the name of Clarencieux (being the title of the King of Arms, for the South parts of England) is derived. This Duke had iſſue by her one only daughter, named Philippa, afterward Wife of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Mother of Earl Roger, Father of Anne Counteſs of Cambridge, the Mother of Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the Fourth. The ſecond Marriage of this Duke was at Millain in Lombardy, with the Lady Violanta, daughter of Galeacio, the ſecond Duke thereof; but through intemperance he lived not long after. King Edward's fourth ſon named John, was born at Gaunt, in the fourteenth year of his Fathers Reign. He had three Wives, the firſt was Blanch, daughter and co-heir, and in the end, the ſole Heir of Henry Duke of Lancaſter, ſon of Edmund, ſurnamed Crouch-back; by whom he had iſſue Henry of Bullingbroke, Earl of Derly, after Duke of Hereford, and laſtly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who firſt placed the Crown in the houſe of Lancaſter. By her alſo John of Gaunt had two Daughters, Philippa Wife of John the firſt, King of Portugal, and Elizabeth married firſt to John Holland, Earl of Huntington, and after him to Sir John Cornwal, Baron of Fanhope. John of Gaunt's ſecond Wife was Conſtance, the eldeſt Daughter of Peter King of Caſtile and Leon, in whoſe right for the time, he entituled himſelf King of both thoſe Realms. By her he had iſſue one only Daughter named Katharine, married to Henry the third, ſon of King John, in poſſeſſion before, and in her right, after King of both the ſaid Realms. John of Gaunt's third Wife was Katherine, the Widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnſhire, eldeſt Daughter and Co heir of Pain Roet, a Gaſcoyne, called Guien King of Arms for that Countrey; his younger Daughter being married to Sir Geoffry Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had iſſue born before Matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament in the twentieth year of King Richard the ſecond, John Earl of Somerſet, Thomas Duke of Exeter, Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinal, and Joan (who was firſt married to Robert Ferrers, Baron of Wemme, and Ouſley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwick) and ſecondly, to Ralph Nevil, the firſt Earl of Weſtmerland. Shee and all her Brethren were ſurnamed Beaufort, of a Caſtle which the Duke had in France, where they were all born; and in regard thereof, bare the Portcullis of a Caſtle for the Cogniſance of their Family. This Duke in the thirteenth year of his Nephew King Richard was created Duke of Aquitain, but in the ſixteenth year he was called home, and this title recalled; and the third year after in the ſixtieth of his age, he died at Ely-houſe in Holbourn, and lieth honourably Entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul. King Edward's fifth ſon Edmund, ſurnamed of Langley, was firſt in the year 1362. created Earl of Cambridge; and afterward in the year 1386. made Duke of York, he married Iſabel Daughter and Co-heir to Peter King of Caſtile, and Leon: his Son Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, took to Wife Anne Mortimer, Heir of the foreſaid Lionel, elder brother to Edmund of Langley. King Edward's ſixth ſon William, ſurnamed of Windſor, where he was born, died young, and is buried at Weſtminſter. King Edward's youngeſt ſon Thomas, ſurnamed of Woodſtock, where he was born, was firſt Earl of Buckingham, and after made Duke of Gloceſter by his Nephew King Richard the ſecond. He was a man of valour and wiſdome, but the King ſurmiſing him to be too ſevere an obſerver of his doings, conſulted with Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, how to make him away: whom Mowbray unawares ſurpriſing, conveyed ſecretly to Callice, where he was ſtrangled the twentieth year of King Richards Reign. He had iſſue one Son, Humfrey Earl of Buckingham, who died at Cheſter of the Peſtilence, in the year 1400. and two Daughters, Anne Married firſt to Edmund Earl of Stafford, by whom ſhe had Humfrey Duke of Buckingham; ſecondly to William Bourchier Earl of Ewe, by whom ſhe had Henry Earl of Eſſex, and Joan married to Gilbert, Lord Talbot, and had iſſue by him a Daughter, who died young. Of King Edward's Daughters, the eldeſt named Iſabel, was married at Windſor to Ingelram of Guyſnes, Lord of Coucy, Earl of Soiſſons, and after Archduke of Auſtria; created alſo by King Edward Earl of Bedford: by whom ſhe was Mother of two Daughters, Mary married to Henry Duke of Barre, and Philip married to Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marqueſs of Dublin. This Robert in the height of his fortunes forſook his Lady Philip, and married one Lancerona, a Joyners Daughter (as was ſaid) which came with King Richard the ſecond's Wife out of Bohemia; and being for abuſing the Kings ear, driven out of the land by the Lords, he died at Lovain, in extream poverty in the year 1392. Iſabel his Wives Mother, was buried in the Church of Friers Minors near Aldgate in London. King Edward's ſecond Daughter Joan was married by Proxy to Alphonſus, King of Caſtile and Leon; but paſſing into Spain, died by the way, and King Alphonſus met her inſtead of conſummating his Eſpouſal, to ſolemnize her Funeral. His third Daughter Blanch died young. His fourth named Mary, was married to John Montford Duke of Britain. His youngeſt named Margaret, born in Callice, was the firſt Wife of John de Haſtings, Earl of Pembroke, but died without iſſue.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of ſtature indifferent tall, of ſparkling eyes, of a comely and manly countenance, in his latter time ſomewhat bald; and concerning his conditions, no man was more gentle, where there was ſubmiſſion: where oppoſition, no man more ſtern. He was a Prince no leſs of his paſſions, then of his people; for he was never ſo loving, as to be fond, nor ever

ſo

ſo angry, as to be inexorable: but this muſt be underſtood of the time while he was a man, for in his old age, when he came to be a childe again, he was a Prince of neither. He was no leſs fortunate then valiant, and his fortunateneſs was the greater by a kinde of Antiperiſtaſis, as coming between two unfortunate Princes; Succeſſour to one, and Predeceſſour to another. He was of ſo warlike a diſpoſition, that his very ſports were warlike; for no delights were ſo frequent with him as Juſts and Turnaments. To ſhew his devotion, one example may be ſufficient; for when neither Cardinals nor Counſellours could move him to make Peace with France, a Tempeſt from Heaven did it: to which may be added, that he never won great Battel, of which he won many, but he preſently gave the glory of it to God by publick Thankſgiving. He out-lived the beſt Wife, and the beſt Son that ever King had; and to ſay the truth, he out-lived the beſt of himſelf, for his latter years were not anſwerable to his former.

Of his Death and Burial.

KIng Edward beſides his being old, and worn with the labours of War, had other cauſes that haſtned his end; his grief for the loſs of ſo worthy a Son, dead but ten months before; his grief for the loſs of all benefit of his Conqueſts in France, of all which he had little now left but only Callice. And oppreſſed thus in body and minde, he was drawing his laſt breath, when his Concubine Alice Pierce packing away what ſhe could catch, even to the Rings of his Fingers, left him; and by her example, other of his attendants, ſeiſing on what they could come by, ſhift away: and all his Counſellours and others forſook him, when he moſt needed them, leaving his Chamber quite empty. Which a poor Prieſt in the houſe ſeeing, he approaches to the Kings Bed-ſide, and finding him yet breathing, calls upon him to remember his Saviour, and to ask mercy for his offences; which none about him before would do. But now moved by the voice of this Prieſt, he ſhews all ſigns of contrition, and at laſt breath he expreſſeth the name of Jeſus. Thus died this victorious King at his Manor of Sheene, (now Richmond) the 21. day of June, in the year 1377. in the 64. year of his age, having reigned fifty years, four months, and odd dayes. His body was conveyed from Sheene by his four Sons, and other Lords, and ſolemnly interred within Weſtminſter Church, where he hath his Monument; and where it is ſaid the Sword he uſed in Battel, is yet to be ſeen, being eight pound in weight, and ſeven foot in length.

Lying in his death-bed forſaken of all.

Of Men of Note in his time.

MArtial men were never more plentiful then in this Kings Reign: whether it were that the Stars have an influence to produce ſuch men at one time more then another: or whether it were that Regis ad exemplum, the Kings example made his Subjects like himſelf: or laſtly, that his continual exerciſe of arms put them as it were into a mould of fortitude. The firſt of this kinde is worthily Edward the Black Prince, and ſo worthily the firſt, that Longe erit à primo quiſque ſecundus erit. Next him Henry Earl of Lancaſter, the Princes right hand, in all his great atchievements; then William the valiant Earl of Salisbury; then John Eure, Anceſtor to the L. Eures that now liveth; then follow the Lord John Chandois, Sir James Audeley, Sir Walter de Manny, Sir Robert Knolls; then Sir John Hawkwood born in Eſſex, who though not much honoured at home, having been a Taylour: yet in foraign parts, and ſpecially in Italy ſo famous, that his Statue was erected in publick, for a Monument to teſtifie his valour to poſterity. And here muſt not be forgotten Robert Venile, Knight, a Norfolk man; who when the Scots and Engliſh were ready to give Battel, a certain ſtout Champion of great ſtature, commonly called Tournbol, coming out of the Scots Army, and challenging any Engliſh man to meet him in a ſingle Combat, this Robert Venile accepteth the challenge, and marching towards the Champion, and meeting by the way a certain Black Maſtiff Dog, which waited on the Champion, he ſuddenly with his Sword cut him off at the loyns: and afterwards did more to the Champion himſelf, cutting his head from off his ſhoulders. And as there was this great plenty of Martial men, ſo there was no leſs plenty of Learned men; John Baconthorpe born in Norfolk, a Carmelite Frier, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes in Divinity; Nicholas Trivet born alſo in Norfolk, a Black Frier, who wrote two Hiſtories, and a Book of Annals: Richard Stradley, born in the Marches of Wales, a Monk and a Divine, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes of the Scriptures: William Herbert a Welſh man, and a Frier Minor, who wrote many good Treatiſes in Divinity: Tho. Wallies a Dominican Frier, and a Writer of many excellent Books: John Everſden a Monk of Bury in Suffolk, an Hiſtoriographer: Walter Burley a Doctor of Divinity, brought up in Merton Colledge in Oxford, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes in Natural and Moral Philoſophy, which remain in eſtimation to this day, and who for the great fame of his Learning, had the honour to be one of the great Inſtructors of Edward the Black Prince: Roger of Cheſter a Monk of that City, and an Hiſtoriographer: John Burgh a Monk, who wrote a Hiſtory, and alſo divers Homilies: Richard Aungervil Biſhop of Durham, and Lord Chancellour of England, born in Suffolk: Walter Heminford, an Hiſtoriographer: Richard Chicheſter a Monk of Weſtminſter, who wrote an excellent Chronicle from the year 449. to the year 1348. Richard Rolle alias Hampole, who wrote many excellent Treatiſes in Divinity: Robert Holcot a Black Frier, born in Northampton, a learned Schoolman, and wrote many Books in Arguments of Divinity: Thomas Bradwardin, born near Chicheſter in Suſſex, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and who wrote againſt the Pelagians, and for his depth of Learning, had the Title of Doctor Profundus: Richard Fitz Ralph, Archbiſhop of Armagh in Ireland, a learned Writer: William Gryſant, named Anglicus, a notable Phyſitian, whoſe Son came to be Pope, and was called Urbane the fifth: John Killingworth an excellent Philoſopher, Aſtronomer, and Phyſician: Ranulph

Sir John Hawkwood a Taylor, ſo famous in Italy, that his Statue is there erected.

Robert Venile his Valour.

Walter Burley one of the black Princes Schoolmaſters.

Thomas Bradwardin called Doctor Profundus.

Ranulph Higdon a Monk of Cheſter, an Hiſtoriographer: Bartholomew Glanvile, deſcended of thoſe Glanviles that were ſometimes Earls of Suffolk: Simon Iſlip Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and founder of Canterbury Colledge in Oxford, who wrote many Treatiſes: Matthew Weſtmonaſterienſis, who wrote the Book called Flores Hiſtoriarum: William Fleet an Hermite, who wrote ſundry Treatiſes, exhorting England to repentance: Henry Knighton, who wrote a Hiſtory intituled De geſtis Anglorum; and laſtly, two other, worthy perhaps to have been placed firſt, John Mandevil the great Traveller, a Doctor of Phylick, and a Knight, who died at Liege, in the year 1372. and Sir Geoffry Chaucer, the Homer of our Nation; and who found as ſweet a Muſe in the Groves of Woodſtock, as the Ancients did upon the banks of Helicon.

Matthew of Weſtminſter lived in this time.

John Mandevil the great Travellour.

Sir Geoffry Chaucer lived at this time.

THE

The REIGN of KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

Anno Dom. 1377.

RICHARD called of Burdeaux, becauſe born there, the only ſon of Edward the Black Prince, was by his Grandfather in his life time, declared to be his Heir and lawful Succeſſour; and accordingly after his death was crowned King of England at Weſtminſter, the ſixteenth day of July, in the year 1377. by Simon Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And for the more ſolemnity of his Coronation, he then made nine Knights, and created four Earls; Thomas of Woodſtock King Edward the third's youngeſt ſon, was created Earl of Buckingham, and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, younger Brother of John Lord Mowbray, Earl of Notingham; Gifford Angouleſme a Gaſcoin, was made Earl of Huntington; and Henry Piercy ſon of Henry Lord Piercy, was created Earl of Northumberland. At the time of the Coronation, the Duke of Lancaſter, by the name of John King of Caſtile, and Leon, and Duke of Lancaſter, put in his claim as Earl of Leiceſter, to have the place of Earl Marſhal of England; as Duke of Lancaſter, to carry the Sword called Curtana; as Earl of Lincoln, to be carver that day: all which to be executed by himſelf, or by his ſufficient Deputy; which with the Fees thereunto belonging, were confirmed unto him. As likewiſe, divers others made their claims: Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, to have the Office of Chamberlain, and to pour out water for the King to waſh: John Wiltſhire Citizen of London, by reaſon of a moity of the Manour of Heydon, holden in Sergeanty, claimed to hold a Towel for the King to wipe with when he went to meat: Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, to bear the third Sword before the King; and alſo to exerciſe the office of Pantler: Sir John Argentine, by reaſon of his Manour of Wimondtey in the County of Hartford, to ſerve the King at his Cup: William L. Furnival for his Manour of Fernham, to ſupport the Kings right Arm when he held the Royal Scepter: Anne late Wife of John de Haſtings Earl of Pembroke, for his Manour of Aſhele in Norfolk, to have the Office of Naperer; which ſhe was admitted to do by her Deputy Sir Thomas Blunt: Richard Earl of Arundel, for his Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chief Butler: The Lord Mayor of London, to attend in his own perſon as chief Cup-waiter: Sir John Dimmock, for his Manour of Scrivolvy, and Sir Baldwin Frevile, for his Caſtle of Tamworth, in the County of Warwick, contended for the Office of being the Kings Champion, but adjudged to Dimmock: William de Latimer, and John the ſon and heir of John Mowbray of Axholm, joyntly petitioned to have the Office of Almoner; but adjudged to Latimer: Richard Lion, as Tenant of the Manour of L. held by the ſervice of making Wafers for the King at his Coronation, was thereunto admitted: The Barons of the Cinque-Ports were admitted to bear the Kings Canopy, upon four ſtaves of ſilver, over the Kings head; and alſo to ſit at meat in the Hall, at the higheſt Table on the Kings right hand: John Fitz-John, by reaſon of his Manour of S. in Norfolk, was admitted to be chief Larderer: Richard Herring, for the Manour of the C. in the County of Surry, claimed to be Uſher of the Kings Chamber; but becauſe that claim did no way concern the Coronation, he was left to purſue his Right ſome other time. The Coronation it ſelf was performed with great ſolemnity: After a Sermon, the King took his Oath; and then the Archbiſhop bleſſed the King: which done, he tore off his Garments, and ſtripped him into his Shift; then he anointed his Hands, Head, Breaſt, Shoulders, and the joynts of his Arms, with the Sacred Oyl; and after certain Prayers, he then clad him, firſt with the Coat of St. Edward, and after with his Mantle: after which the Archbiſhop delivered him the Sword, ſaying, Accipe Gladium; with which two Earls girded him: Then he gave him Bracelets, ſaying, Accipe Armillas. After this he put upon him an upper veſture called a Pall, ſaying, Accipe Pallium. In the mean time, while the Archbiſhop bleſſed the Crown, he to whoſe office it pertained, put Spurs on his heels; after the Crown was bleſſed, the Archbiſhop ſet it on his head, ſaying, Coronet te Deus: then he delivered him a Ring, ſaying, Accipe Annulum. Immediately herewith came the Lord Furnival by vertue of his Office, offering him a red Glove; which the Archbiſhop bleſſed, and putting it on his hand, delivered him a Scepter, ſaying, Accipe Sceptrum: and after that, into his other hand, delivered him a Rod, on the top whereof ſtood a Dove, ſaying, Accipe Virgam Virtutis; and then bleſſed the King, ſaying, Benedicat te Deus: which done, the King kiſſed the Biſhops and Abbots, by whom he was afterward led to his ſeat: and ſo ended the Solemnity.

King Richard the ſecond Crowned.

Claims of Office at his Coronation.

The manner of his Coronation.

The tender years of the King, being but eleven eleven years of age, required a Protector: but being perhaps thought dangerous to commit that Authority to only one, who might rather ſeek to get it for himſelf, then to keep it for another, it was thought fit to commit it to many; and thereupon John Duke of Lancaſter, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Unkles, with ſome other Lords and Biſhops, were joyned in Commiſſion to manage the State; and Guichard de Angouleſm appointed to be his School-maſter. And now the Kings minority made foreign Princes conceive, that this would be a time of advantage for any that had quarrel to England: which the French and Scots took preſently hold of. For, the French came now, and burnt the Town of Rye; and ſoon after, entring the Iſle of Wight, burnt divers Towns there; and though they were repelled from the Caſtle by the valiant Sir Hugh Tyrrel Captain there, yet they conſtrained the men of the Iſle to give them a thouſand Marks, to ſpare the reſidue of their houſes and goods: and departing thence, they ſet on Land where they ſaw advantage, burning ſundry Towns near to the ſhore, as Portſmouth, Dertmouth, and Plymouth, and then ſayling towards Dover, they burnt Haſtings, aſſaulted Winchelſey: but being valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battel, were forced to retire. After this, they landed not far from the Abbey of Lewis, at a place called Rottington; where the Prior of Lewis, with Sir Thomas Cheyney, and Sir John Falleſley, encountring them, were overthrown and taken priſoners. And no leſs then the French were the Scots alſo now buſie; for coming one morning by ſtealth, they won the Caſtle of Berwick: but ſhortly after, upon knowledge thereof had, they were driven out again by the Earls of Northumberland and Notingham; and all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramſey their Captain, put to the ſword. About Michaelmas a Parliament was held at Weſtminſter, wherein Alice Pierce, the late Kings Concubine, was baniſhed the Realm, and all her goods confiſcate; and two Tenths of the Clergy, and two Fifteenths of the Temporalty were granted: but ſo, as that two Citizens of London, William Walworth, and John Philpot, ſhould receive and keep it, to ſee it beſtowed for defence of the Realm. In this time, Sir Hugh Calverley, Deputy of Callice, burnt ſix and twenty French Ships in the Haven of Boloigne. And at the ſame time a great Navy ſet out, under the guiding of the Earl of Buckingham, the Duke of Britain, the Lord Latimer, Sir Robert Knolls, and others, with a purpoſe to intercept the Spaniſh Fleet; but through tempeſt was twice driven back. When in the mean time, one Mercer, a Scottiſh Pirate, came to Scarborough, took there divers Ships, and committed many out-rages; and no order being taken to repel him, a Citizen of London, named John Philpot, at his own charges ſet forth a Fleet, and in his own perſon encountring them, took the ſaid Mercer, and all his Ships: and returning home, inſtead of being rewarded for his ſervice, he was called in queſtion for preſuming to raiſe a Navy without advice of the Kings Councel: but he gave ſuch reaſons for that he had done, that not only he came off then with credit, but lives in reputation for it to this day. Indeed reaſons of State, though they may be ſecretly cenſured, yet they muſt not openly be controlled; for this were to bring Authority into contempt, and inſtead of errors to bring in confuſion: but yet when wrongs be offered that are publick, every particular perſon ſeems to have an intereſt in taking revenge; and though it may be no manners not to ſtay the States leaſure, yet it can be no offence to do their work for them,

Many actions paſſed at this time with the French and Scots, ſome proſperous, and ſome adverſe. The Scots burn Roxborough, this was adverſe; but the Earl of Northumberland entring Scotland with ten thouſand men, ſpoileth the Lands of the Earl of March, the chief Incendiary; this was proſperous: but when the Northern men would needs make a Road into Scotland, and were encountred by the Scots, and put to flight, this was adverſe. Anon after Midſummer, the Duke of Lancaſter, with the Earls of Buckingham, Warwick, Stafford, and others of the Nobility, with a ſtrong power took the Sea, and landing in Britain, beſieged the Town of St. Malo, but finding ſtrong oppoſition, is forced to raiſe his ſiege, and return home: this was adverſe. And now again, the Scots by night entred ſecretly into the Caſtle of Berwick, and ſlew Sir Robert Baynton, that was Conſtable there: this alſo was adverſe. But when the Earl of Northumberland, being adverſed thereof, came with a power, aſſaulted the Caſtle, and after two dayes defence recovered it again: this was proſperous. William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, the Kings Lieutenant in Callice forrageth the Countrey round about, and furniſheth Callice with booties of French Cattel. Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Piercy made Admirals, put to Sea, and take divers Ships laden with Merchandize, and one Ship of War: Sir John Hurleſton, Captain of Chierbourgh in France, iſſuing forth, aſſaults a Fortreſs of the French, which was the ſtore-houſe of their proviſion; and with much valour takes it: theſe were proſperous. But when Sir John Clark lying in Garriſon in a Caſtle in Britain, where lay many Engliſh Ships in the Hauen, had theſe Ships ſet upon by the French; where though he ſhewed incredible valour in the action, yet the Ships were taken, and himſelf ſlain: this was adverſe. Alſo in the third year of this Kings Reign, Sir John Arundel, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Tho. Piercy, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Baniſter, and many other Knights went to Sea, with a purpoſe to paſs over into Britain: but were ſo beaten back with Tempeſt, that divers of their Ships were caſt away; and Sir John Arundel, Sir Thomas Baniſter, Sir Nicholas Trumpington, Sir Thomas Dale, and above a thouſand others were all drowned; only Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Caſverley, Sir William Elmham, and certain others eſcaped. It may not be impertinent to note here the ſumptuouſneſs of thoſe times; for this Sir John Arundel was then ſaid in his Furniture to have two and fifty new ſuits of apparel of Cloth of Gold and Tiſſue, all loſt at Sea.

This year alſo there being found inconvenience in having many governours of the King, and Kingdom, it was by Parliament decreed, That the Lord Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, ſhould should himself alone hold the place of Protector. About this time Sir John Anneſley Knight accuſed Thomas Katrington Eſq; for betraying the Fortreſs of S. Saviour to the French: which Katrington denying, at the ſuit of Anneſley, a ſolemn combat is permitted to be between them; at which combat the King and all the great Lords were preſent. The Eſquire Katrington was a man of a mighty ſtature, the Knight Anneſley a little man; yet through the juſtneſs of his cauſe, after a long fight, the Knight prevailed, and Katrington the day after the Combat dyed. Fabian ſaith, he was drawn to Tyburn and there hanged for his falſe accuſation. In the beginning of the fourth year of this King, Thomas of Woodſtock Earl of Buckingham, the Kings Unkle, with divers Earls and Lords, and an Army of ſeven or eight thouſand, was ſent into France, to aid the Duke of Britain; but the King of France at that time dying, the Duke of Britain grew to have peace with the new King: whereupon the Earl of Buckingham came home again, without doing much, but making of Knights, and forraging the Countrey. In this time the French and Spaniſh Gallies did much miſchief on the Coaſt of England: they burnt Rye, Haſtings, and Portſmouth; and at laſt entring the River of Thames, they came up to Graveſend, where they burnt moſt part of the Town, and taking many Priſoners and Booties returned into France.

1383. An Inſurrection in Kent, and the cauſe.

At this time alſo, there fell out an Accident of great diſturbance to the Realm, for the Commons roſe in divers parts, beginning at Deptford in Kent: and the cauſe of their riſing grew (as was thought) through the rude behaviour of a Collector of the Poll-mony, whoſe coming into the houſe of one John Tyler, and demanding Poll-money of his wife for a daughter of hers; and ſhe ſaying that her daughter was not of age to pay, the rude fellow ſaid he would preſently ſee whether that were ſo or no, and thereupon forcibly turned up her Cloaths: whereat the Mother making an out-cry, her husband being at work hard by, and hearing the noiſe, came in with his lathing-ſtaff in his hand, with which he gave the Collector ſuch a blow on the head, that his brains flew out, and he preſently died. Upon this, at the complaint of Tyler amongſt his neighbours, and withal a factious Clergy-man, one John Ball, taking occaſion hereat to rip up the ground of this miſ-government, and telling the people that this difference of mens Eſtates, where ſome are Potentates, and ſome are Bond-men, was againſt Chriſtian Liberty, taking for his Theme, When Adam delv'd and Eve ſpan, who was then a Gentleman? He ſo incenſed them that the Commons, in divers parts drew together; and whether beginning in Kent, or otherwiſe in Eſſex, they drew at laſt into their Faction the Commons of Suſſex, Hartfordſhire, Cambridgeſhire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and other Shires; and arreſting all ſuch as paſſed, made them ſwear to be true to King Richard, and to the Commons, and never to receive any King that ſhould be called John; which they did for the envy they bore to John Duke of Lancaſter. Thus their number ſtill encreaſed, that by that time they were come ſo far as Black-heath, they were eſteemed to be a hundred thouſand. The firſt thing they did when they came to London, was to ſend for one Richard Lion, a grave Citizen who had been Tyler's Maſter, and his head they ſtruck off, and carryed it upon a pole in Triumph before them. The next day they came to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaſter's houſe, which they ſet on fire, burning all his rich Furniture, breaking in pieces all his Plate and Jewels, and throwing them into the Thames, ſaying, They were men of Juſtice, and would not like Robbers enrich themſelves with any mans Goods: and when one of their fellows was eſpyed to thruſt a fair ſilver piece into his boſom, they took him, and caſt both him and the piece into the fire. Two and thirty of them were got into the Dukes Wine-Cellar, where they ſtayed drinking ſo long, till the rafters of the houſe on fire, fell upon them, and ſo covered them, that not able to get out, they were heard cry ſeven dayes after, and then periſhed. From the Savoy they went to the Temple, where they burnt the Lawyers Lodgings, with their Books and Writings, and all they could lay hands on. Alſo the Houſe of Saint John's by Smithfield they ſet on fire, ſo that it burned for the ſpace of ſeven dayes together. After this they came to the Tower, where the King was then lodged; and though he had at that time ſix hundred armed men, and as many Archers about him, yet he durſt not but ſuffer them to enter; where they abuſed the Kings Mother, offering to kiſs her, in ſuch rude manner that ſhe fell into a ſwoon: and finding in the place Simon Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellour, and Sir Robert Hales alſo Lord Treaſurer, they led them to the Tower-hill; and there in moſt cruel manner ſtruck off their heads, as alſo of divers others. Neither ſpared they ſacred places: for breaking into the Church of the Auguſtine Friers, they drew forth thirteen Flemmings, and beheaded them in the open ſtreets; as alſo ſeventeen others out of other Churches. Yet after all theſe out-rages, the King proclaimed Pardon to all ſuch as would lay down Arms, and go quietly home; which the Eſſex men did, but the Kentiſh men continued ſtill with their Captain Wat Tyler. To whom when the King ſent Sir John Newton to underſtand what his meaning was, Wat Tyler, offended becauſe he came on Horſe-back, told him it became him to light from his Horſe in his preſence; and therewith drew out his Dagger to ſtrike him. The King perceiving his Knight to be in danger, bade him alight from his horſe: but when this would not pacifie him, the Mayor of London, William Walworth, by the Kings appointment rode to him and arreſted him, and gave him ſuch a blow on the head, that he aſtonied him; and then other of the Kings Servants drew their Swords, and thruſt him through in divers parts of his Body, ſo as he died there in the place. When the Commons ſaw this, they cryed out, Our Captain is ſlain, let us revenge it. Here the King, though very young, not above fifteen years of age, yet had the courage to ride unto to them, telling them, that now their Leader was dead, he would be their Leader himself; and if they would follow him into the Fields, they should have whatsoever they desired. In the mean time the Lord Mayor Walworth had gone into the City, and raised a thousand armed men, and meeting Sir Robert Knolls by chance got him to be their leader; who coming into the fields where the Rebels were, so daunted them, that throwing down their Weapons, they cryed for mercy: that it was a wonderful thing to see how suddenly Fear overtook Presumption; for scarce their words of insolency were out of their mouths, when they fell to words of most servile submission. And as strange an alteration in those about the King, to see how suddenly Boldness surprised Fear; for scarce they left trembling at the sight of the Rebels, when suddenly upon sight of this aid their fingers itched to be setting upon them, but that the King would not suffer it, because some amongst them were there by compulsion; and to set upon them thus mingled, might as well be the death of the innocent as of the guily. But to pacifie them the more, the King caused his Charter of Manumission to be sent unto them; which yet stayed them not from committing out-rages at St. Albans, and cancelling the ancient Charters of the Abbots and Monks there. Besides, the sedition was more general, then that the appeasing it in one place could be final; for at the same time there were gathered together in Suffolk to the number of fifty thousand, by the setting on of one John Wraw a lewd Priest: and these fell to destroying the houses of Lawyers specially; and Sir John Cavendish Lord Chief Justice of England they beheaded, and set his head upon the Pillory in St. Edmundsbury. The like commotion of the Commons was at the same time also in Cambridgeshire, in the Isle of Ely, and and in Norfolk, under the guiding of one John Litteſter a Dyer: and to countenance their proceeding the more, they had a purpose to have brought William Ufford Earl of Suffolk into their fellowship; but he, advertised of their intention, suddenly rose from supper, and got him away: but many other Lords and Knights they compelled to be sworn to them, and to ride with them, as the Lord Scales, the Lord Morley, Sir John Brewis, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert Salle, who not enduring their insolencies, had his brains dasht out by a Countrey Clown who was his bondman. The rest terrified by this example, were glad to carry themselves submissively to their Chieftain, John Litteſter, who named himself King of the Commons; and counted it a preferment for any to serve him at his Table, in taking the assay of his meats and drinks with kneeling humbly before him, as he sate at meat. And now these fellows, upon a consultation, send two choice men, namely, the Lord Morley, and Sir John Brewis, with three of their chief Commons, to the King, for their Charter of Manumission and Enfranchising: who being on their way at Ichingham, not far from Newmarket, they met with Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich; and he examining them if there were any of the Rebels in their company, and hearing that three of the chief were there present, he presently caused their heads to be struck off; and then pursuing on towards Northwalsham in Norfolk, where the Commons stayed for an answer from the King. By that time he came thither, where he had at first but eight Launces, and a small number of Archers in his company, his number was so increased, that it came to be a compleat Army; with which he set upon the Rebels, discomfited them, and took John Litteſter and their other Chieftains, whom he caused all to be executed: and by this means the Countrey was quieted. After this the Mayor of London sate in Judgement upon Offenders, where many were found culpable, and lost their heads; amongst other, Jack Straw, John Kirkby, Alane Tredder, and John Sterling, who gloryed that he was the man had slain the Archbishop. Also Sir Robert Tresilian Chief Justice was appointed to sit in Judgment against the Offenders; before whom above fifteen hundred were found guilty, and in sundry places put to death: amongst others John Ball Priest, their Incendiary. Of whom it is not impertinent to relate a Letter he wrote to the Rebel-rabble of Essex; by which we may see how fit an Orator he was for such an Auditory: and what strength of perswasion there was in Non-sense.

Neither is it impertinent to declare the Confession of Jack Straw at his Execution. "When "we were assembled (said he) upon Black heath, "and had sent to the King to come to us, our "purpose was to have slain all Knights and Gen"tlemen that should be about him: and as for the "King, we would have kept him amongst us, "to the end the people might more boldly have "repaired to us; and when we had gotten power "enough, we would have slain all Noblemen, and "specially the Knights of the Rhodes; and lastly, "we would have killed the King, and all men of "possessions, with Bishops, Monks, Parsons of "Churches, only Friers Mendicants we would "have spared, for administration of the Sacra"ments. Then we would have devised Laws ac"cording to which the people should have lived; "for we would have created Kings, as Wat Tyler "in Kent, and others in other Countries: and "the same evening that Wat Tyler was killed we "were determined to set fire in four corners of "the City, and to have divided the spoil amongst "us: and this was our purpose, as God may help "me now at my last end. For his service done in this seditious business, the King Knighted the Mayor Will. Walworth, and gave him a hundred pounds a year in Fee. Also he Knighted five Aldermen his brethren, girding them about the waste with the girdle of Knighthood, which was manner of Graduating in thoſe dayes: but as Stow ſaith, the manner of Knighting was rather thus; to cauſe him to put a Baſenet on his head, and then the King with a Sword in both his hands, to ſtrike him ſtrongly on the neck. And to do the City it ſelf honour, the King at this time granted there ſhould be a Dagger added to the Arms of the City; for till this time the City bore only the Croſs without the Dagger.

And now all parts being quiet, the King by Proclamation revoked and made void his former Charters of Infranchiſing the Bondmen of the Realm; and that they ſhould ſtand in the ſame condition they were before. In the time of this ſedition, the Duke of Lancaſter had been ſent into Scotland, to keep the Scots quiet; who ſo carried the matter, that before the Scots heard of the Sedition, a Truce was concluded for two or three years. But the Duke coming back to Berwick, was denyed by the Captain Sir Matthew Redman, to enter the Town, becauſe of a Commandment given him by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the Marches, not to ſuffer any perſon to enter the ſame; which the King indeed had appointed to be done, forgetting the Duke of Lancaſter that was then in Scotland: but howſoever, this bred ſuch a ſpleen in the Duke againſt the Earl, that at his coming home he laid many things to the Earls charge, and the Earl as ſtoutly anſwered his Objections: and ſo far it proceeded, that both of them came to the Parliament which was then beginning, with great numbers of armed men, and themſelves in Armour, to the great terrour of the people: but the King wiſely taking the matter into his own hands, made them friends. At which time the Lady Anne, Siſter to the Emperour Wenceſlaus, and affianced Wife to the King, was come to Callice; whereupon the Parliament was prorogued. The Lady was brought to London, joyned in marriage to the King, and Crowned Queen at Weſtminſter by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with great ſolemnity. After the marriage, the Parliament began again; in which William Vfford Earl of Suffolk being choſen by the Knights of the Shires to deliver in behalf of the Common-wealth, certain matters concerning the ſame, the very day and hour in which he ſhould have done the buſineſs, as he went up the ſtairs towards the upper Houſe, he ſuddenly fell down and dyed, having been merry and well before, to all mens judgements. About this time the Lord Scroop was depoſed from the Chancellourſhip, for refuſing to ſeal ſome Grants which the King had made; and the King receiving the Great Seal at his hands, kept it a certain time, and ſealed with it ſuch Grants and Writings as he pleaſed: till at length it was delivered to Robert Braibrook Biſhop of London, who was made Lord Chancellour.

1382. Henry Spencer Biſhop of Norwich, had lately with the Kings leave, raiſed an Army, and was gone into France, in behalf of Pope Urban, againſt the Anti-Pope Clement; and entring firſt into Flanders, he took and ſacked many Towns; at laſt beſieged Ypres, till by an Army of French (greater then was thought could have been raiſed in France) he was forced to raiſe his ſiege; and then paſſing divers places, he came to Graveling, from whence he writ to King Richard, that if ever he meant to try Battel with the French, now was the time. The King was at that time at Daintry in Northamptonſhire; and being at ſupper when the word was brought him, he inſtantly roſe from the Table, got to Horſeback, and rode in Poſte with ſuch ſpeed, that he came to St. Albans about midnight; where making no ſtay, but while he borrowed the Abbots Gelding, he haſted forth till he came to Weſtminſter, as though he had meant never to reſt till he had given Battel to the French-men. But after he had taken counſel of his Pillow, his minde was altered, and he thought it better to imploy ſome other, then to go himſelf; ſo the Duke of Lancaſter is thought the fitteſt man: but he protracted the time ſo long in making preparation, that before he could be gone, the Biſhop was come away. And this indeed is the condition of many, to ſpend ſo much time in preparing, that they utterly loſe all opportunity of acting; like to men that are putting on their cloaths ſo long, till it be time to put them off again. Shortly after a Truce was concluded between England and France, to endure till the Feaſt of St Michael, which ſhould be in the year 1384.

Of Acts done after he came of Age.

1384. THE Scots in this mean time had made Roads into England, and taken and burnt divers Towns upon the Borders; whereupon the Duke of Lancaſter, with his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, is ſent with a mighty Army to repreſs them: but having entred Scotland, and not able to draw the Scots to a Battel, they only burnt certain Towns, and then returned.

About this time an Iriſh Fryer of the order of the Carmelites charged the Duke of Lancaſter, with heinous crimes; as that he intended to deſtroy the King, and uſurp the Crown: ſhewing the time, the place, and other circumſtances of the whole Plot. But the Duke called to his anſwer, ſo cleared himſelf; at leaſt gave ſuch colours of clearing, that the accuſer was committed to the cuſtody of John Holland the Kings half-brother, till a day appointed for further Trial. The night before which day, the ſaid Lord Holland and Sir Henry Green are ſaid to have come to this Frier, and putting a cord about his neck, tyed the other end about his privy members; and after hanging him up from the ground, laid a ſtone upon his belly, with the weight whereof his very back-bone burſt aſunder: thereby putting him to a moſt tormenting death. An act not more inhumane then unadviſed; for though it took away the Accuſer, yet it made the Accuſation more ſuſpicious.

A Frier accuſing the Duke of Lancaſter with treaſon, is ſecretly put to a miſerable death.

At this time, though a Truce had been made with the Scots, yet they would not be quiet; but entred and won the Caſtle of Berwick, whereof the Earl of Northumberland was Captain, but had committed the keeping of it to another: for which being blamed, he went not againſt them with an Army, but took an eaſier courſe, for with the ſum of two thouſand Marks he bought them out, and had the Caſtle ſurrendred into his hands again. The King upon ſome new diſpleaſure, being now incenſed againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, had a purpoſe to have him arreſted arreſted and arraigned of certain points of Treaſon, before Sir Robert Treſilian Chief Juſtice, though he ought to be tried by his Peers: but the Duke having intimation hereof, got him to his Caſtle of Pomfret, and ſtood upon his guard; till the Kings Mother (notwithſtanding her indiſpoſition of body, by reaſon of her corpulency) riding to and fro betwixt them, pacified the King, and made them friends.

1386. King Richard with a mighty Army enters Scotland, burns ſome Towns and returns.

In the ninth year of King Richard's Reign, the French King ſent the Admiral of France into Scotland, with a thouſand men of Arms, beſides Croſs-bows and others, to aid the Scots againſt the Engliſh; with which aid the Scots encouraged, enter the Engliſh borders. Whereof King Richard advertiſed, himſelf with a mighty Army enters Scotland; and coming to Edenborough, and finding all the people fled, he ſet fire on the houſes, burnt the Church of St. Giles, only Holy-Rood-Houſe was ſpared at the Duke of Lancaſter's ſuit, in remembrance of the friendſhip he had formerly received in that houſe. The Scots by no means could be drawn to any Battel; but to divert the Kings Army, they entered Cumberland, and beſieged Carlile, where by the valour of Sir Lewis Clifford and Sir Thomas Muſgrave they were repelled: and hearing of the Kings Army coming towards them, and fearing to be incloſed, they drew back into Scotland, and the King returned into England. But in this mean while, the Engliſh of Callice took many prizes of French Ships at Sea, and many booties alſo by land, at one time four thouſand Sheep, and three hundred head of great Cattel.

Dukes and Earls created.

This year the King called a Parliament at Weſtminſter, where he created two Dukes, one Marqueſs and five Earls: Edmund of Langley Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Unkle was created Duke of York: Thomas of Woodſtock, Earl of Buckingham, his other Unkle, Duke of Gloceſter: Robert Vere Earl of Oxford, was made Marqueſs of Dublin: Henry of Bullingbrook, Son of John of Gaunt, was created Earl of Derby: Edward Plantagenet Son to the Duke of York, was made Earl of Rutland: Michael de la Pool Chancellour of England, was created Earl of Suffolk: and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Notingham, was made Earl Marſhal. Alſo by Authority of this Parliament Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Son and Heir of Edmund Mortimer, and of the Lady Philip, eldeſt Daughter and Heir to Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son to King Edward the third, was eſtabliſhed Heir apparent to the Crown of the Realm, and ſhortly after ſo proclaimed: but going into Ireland to his Lordſhip of Ulſter, was there by the wilde Iriſh ſlain. This Roger Earl of March had iſſue, Edmund, Roger, Anne, Alice, and Eleanor, which Eleanor was made a Nun: The two Sons died without iſſue: Anne his eldeſt Daughter was married to Richard Earl Cambridge, Son to Edmund of Langley; which Richard had Iſſue by the ſaid Anne, a Son called Richard, that was after Duke of York, and Father to King Edward the fourth: alſo a Daughter named Iſabel married to the Lord Bourchier. Alſo this year Henry of Bullingbrook Earl of Derby, married the Daughter and Heir of Humfrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, in whoſe right he was afterward made Duke of Hereford.

Roger Mortimer proclaimed heir apparent to the Crown. His Iſſue.

This year alſo King Richard holding his Chriſtmas at Eltham, Leo King of Armenia came thither to him, who in fear to have his Kingdom conquered by the Turks, was come into Chriſtendom to ſeek for aid: but his chief errand into England was to have procured a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; but their ſpleens were ſo great againſt one another, that it was not in the power of his Phyſick to cure them.

The Duke of Lancaſter goes with a great train into Spain, whom King Richard commands to be called King of Spain.

At this time the Duke of Lancaſter, taking with him his Wife the Lady Conſtance, and a Daughter he had by her named Katherine, and two other Daughters which he had by his former Wife, ſailed into Spain. He was attended in his journey with the Lord Lucy, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Baſſet, Willoughby, Fitz-Water, Poynings, Bradſton, and many other Lords and Knights, to the number of fifteen hundred men of Arms; whereof a thouſand at leaſt were Knights and Eſquires. The King at his taking leave gave him a Crown of Gold, and commanded he ſhould be called King of Spain: and the Queen likewiſe gave another Crown of Gold to the Dutcheſs. He landed firſt at Breſt, and freed that Caſtle from the French. From thence he ſailed, and arrived at the Groyne in Spain, where he remained a month; and then went to Compoſtella, where he ſtayed a while: In which time his Conſtable Sir John Holland won divers Towns. At Monſon, the King of Portugal and the Duke of Lancaſter met; where a marriage was concluded between the ſaid King of Portugal, and the Lady Philip Daughter to the Duke: which marriage ſhortly after was conſummated, and the Lady ſent into Portugal honourably accompanied. The Duke continued at Compoſtella all the Winter. At March the King of Portugal and he entred the Confines of Caſtile, where they took many Towns; and paſſing over the River of Dure, entred into the Country Del Campo: But the Spaniards not willing to come to a Battel, but meaning to weary them out with delayes; the Engliſh not uſed to ſuch hot air, fell daily into many Diſeaſes, which the Duke ſeeing, accorded to a Truce. There died in this action, the Lord Fitz-Water, Sir Richard Burley, a Knight of the Garter; the Lord Poynings, and Sir Henry Piercy, Couſin-german to the Earl of Northumberland; alſo the Lord Talbot; and in all twelve great Lords, fourſcore Knights, two hundred Eſquires, and of the meaner ſort above five hundred. When the Army was broken up, the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Dutcheſs his Wife went into Portugal; and after ſome ſtay there, they ſailed to Bayon, in the Marches of Gaſcoigne, where he reſted a long time after. In which mean while there were offers made for a Marriage to be had between the Duke of Berry, Unkle to the French King, and the Lady Katherine, Daughter to the Duke of Lancaſter: which the King of Spain underſtanding, he began to doubt, leſt if that marriage went forward, it might turn to his diſadvantage; and thereupon by earneſt ſuit, at length concluded a Peace with the Duke of Lancaſter, on this wiſe, That his eldeſt Son Henry ſhould marry the Lady Katherine, the Duke of Lancaſter's Daughter, and be intituled Prince of Auſturgus: and in conſideration of this Many Lords about the Duke dye of ſickneſs.

A Navy of 1287. Ships prepared by the French to invade England.

At this time, the French had a purpoſe to invade England, with no leſs a hope then to make a Conqueſt; and to that end, they prepared a mighty Navy: ſo as in the month of September, there were numbred about Sluis, Dam, and Blankerke, 1287. Ships, beſides thoſe which were rigged in Britain by the Conſtable, who had cauſed an Incloſure of a Field to be made of Timber, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith incloſe their Field, and ſo lodge at more ſurety. But it ſo fortuned that the Lord William Beauchamp Captain of Callice, took two of their Ships, whereof one was laden with a piece of the ſaid Incloſure; and after that, another Ship laden with Guns, Gunpowder, and other Inſtruments of War; and after that again, two Ships more, laden with parcels of the ſaid incloſure, which King Richard cauſed to be reared and ſet up about Winchelſey Town. At laſt the foreſaid Army came into Flanders, and arrived at Sluis; where after ſome ſtay, they were ſo diſtreſſed for Victuals, that in the end of November they were glad to be gone, and return into France.

But by William Beauchamp Captain of Callice, ſome of them taken and the reſt diſtreſſed.

Robert Vere Earl of Oxford is created Duke of Ireland; And Michael de la Pool a Merchants Son is made Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Chancellour.

At this time, in a Parliament, Robert Vere Earl of Oxford, and Marqueſs of Dublin, was created Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Pool a Merchants Son, had lately before been created Earl of Suffolk, and made Chancellour of England. And now begins King Richard to enter, I may ſay upon the Confines of his Deſtiny. His gracing of undeſerving men, and diſgracing of men deſerving, if they were not the cauſes, they were at leaſt the occaſions of his own diſgracing, and deſtruction in the end. He was now come to full age to do all himſelf, which was indeed to be of full age to undo himſelf; for the faults of his younger years might have the excuſe to be but errors: but the faults of the age he was now at, were peremptory againſt him, and admitted no defence. And to haſten the pace of his deſtiny the faſter, the ill counſel which before was but whiſpered in his ear, was now ſcarce forborn to be given him aloud. It is told him that he is under tuition no longer, and therefore not to be controuled, as in former times he had been; That to be croſt of his will by his Subjects, was to be their Subject. It is no Sovereignty, if it be not abſolute. At the inſtigation of which Counſel, the King in a Parliament now aſſembled, fell to expoſtulate with his Lords, asking them what years they thought him to be of? who anſwering, that he was ſomewhat more then one and twenty; Well then (ſaid he) I am out of your Wardſhip, and therefore look to enjoy my Kingdom as freely as your ſelves at the like years enjoy your Patrimonies. But his flattering Favourites ſhould have remembred, that though the King may not be controuled, where he can command; yet he may be oppoſed where he can but demand, as now indeed he was: for when he came to demand a Subſidy towards his Wars, he was anſwered, That he needed no Subſidy from his Subjects, if he would but call in the debts which the Chancellour owed him: and if he were ſo tender of him, that he could not finde in his heart to do it himſelf, they would do that work for him: and thereupon charged him with ſuch crimes, that all his Goods were confiſcate, and himſelf adjudged to dye, if the King ſo pleaſed: though ſome write, his ſentence was only to pay a Fine of twenty thouſand Marks, and a thouſand pounds yearly beſide. Upon this provocation, the oppoſite ſide ſeek preſent revenge. It is deviſed, that the Duke of Gloceſter as principal, and other Lords that croſſed the Kings courſes, ſhould be invited to a ſupper in London, and there be murthered. In the execution of which plot the former Lord Mayor, Sir Nicholas Brember, had a ſpecial hand: but the preſent Mayor Richard Exton, moved to it by the King, would by no means conſent; and thereupon the plot proceeded not. But for all theſe harſh ſtrains, and many ſuch other that paſſed this Parliament, a Subſidy was at length granted to the King, of half a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth; but with condition, that it ſhould not be iſſued, but by order from the Lords: and the Earl of Arundel was appointed to receive it. But before this time, both Houſes had directly agreed, that unleſs, the Chancellour were removed, they would meddle no further in the Parliament. The King advertiſed hereof, ſent to the Commons that they ſhould ſend unto Eltham (where he then lay) forty of their Houſe to declare their mindes unto him: but upon conference of both Houſes, it was agreed, that the Duke of Gloceſter, and Thomas Arundel Biſhop of Ely, ſhould in the name of the Parliament go unto him; who coming to the King, declared, that by an old Statute the King once a year might lawfully ſummon his Court of Parliament, for reformation of all corruptions and enormities within the Realm: and further declared, That by an old Ordinance alſo it was enacted, That if the King ſhould abſent himſelf forty dayes, not being ſick, the Houſes might lawfully break up, and return home, At this the King is ſaid to ſay, Well, we perceive our people go about to riſe againſt us; and therefore we think we cannot do better then to ask aid of our Couſin the King of France, and rather ſubmit us to him then to our own Subjects. To which the Lords anſwered, they wondered at this opinion of his Majeſty, ſeeing the French King was the ancient Enemy of the Kingdom; and he might remember what miſchiefs were brought upon the Realm in King John's time, by ſuch a courſe. By theſe and the like perſwaſions, the King was induced to come to the Parliament: and ſoon after John Fortham Biſhop of Durham is diſcharged of his Office of Lord Treaſurer, and in his place was appointed John Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford, a Frier of the order of Preachers: Alſo Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, is diſcharged of his Office of Chancellour; and Thomas Arundel Biſhop of Ely, by conſent of Parliament, placed in his room. Alſo by order of Parliament, thirteen Lords were choſen to have overſight, under the King, of the whole Government of the Realm: of which thirteen there there were three of the New Officers named; as the Biſhop of Ely Lord Chancellour, the Biſhop of Hereford Lord Treaſurer, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal: The other ten were, William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Edmund of Langley Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, William Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Biſhop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scroop, and John Lord Devereux. But this participation of the Government being found inconvenient, held not long. Alſo in this Parliament it was granted that Robert de Vere, lately before created Duke of Ireland, ſhould have and receive to his own uſe 30000. Marks which the French men were to give for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Bloys; but it was granted upon this condition, That before the next Eaſter he ſhould paſs over into Ireland, to recover ſuch Lands as the King had there given him: ſo deſirous the Lords and Commons were to have him removed from the Kings preſence. But though the King gave way to this torrent of the Parliament for the preſent, yet as ſoon as the Parliment was diſſolved, he diſſolved alſo all that had been done, either againſt the Lord Chancellour, or againſtt he Duke of Ireland, or againſt Alexander Nevil, Archbiſhop of York; and received them into more favour then ever he had done before.

As ſoon as the Parliament was diſſolved, all they had done was preſently again undone.

The Engliſh Admiral takes 100. Ships all laden with Rochel Wines.

In his tenth year, about the beginning of March, Richard Earl of Arundel, appointed Admiral, and Thomas Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham, the Earl of Devonſhire, and the Biſhop of Norwich, went to Sea, with a warlike power of men and Arms, to watch for the Fleet of Flanders, that was ready to come from Rochel with Wines; and meeting with them, they ſet upon them, and took of them to the number of a hundred Veſſels, all fraught with Wines: ſo as Wine grew ſo plentiful, that it was ſold for thirteen ſhillings four pence the Tun; and the beſt and choiceſt for twenty ſhillings. Beſides this, they landed in Flanders, where they relieved and fortified Breſt, and demoliſhed two Forts which the Enemy had built againſt it. But this happy ſervice of the Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Sturrey, who continued ſtill about the King, ſeemed rather to envy then to commend; inſomuch that when the Earl of Nottingham, that had ever been the play-fellow, and of equal age to him, came to the Court, he was neither received by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome, nor by the King with any good countenance: and therefore indeed, not by the King with any good countenance, becauſe not by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome.

The Duke of Ireland puts away his lawful Wife, near a kin to the Duke of Gloceſter: and marries a Bohemian Maid. Which the Duke of Gloceſter offended at,

About this time the Duke of Ireland ſought to be divorced from his lawful Wife, Daughter to the Lady Iſabel, one of King Edward the third's Daughters; and took to Wife one Lancerona, a Vintners Daughter of Bohemia, one of the Queens Maids: at which indignity, the Duke of Gloceſter, that was Unkle to the Lady thus forſaken, took great diſpleaſure; which the Duke of Ireland underſtanding, ſtudied how by ſome means he might diſpatch the Duke of Gloceſter out of the way. Eaſter was now paſt, the time appointed for the Duke of Ireland's going over into Ireland; when the King with a ſhew to bring him to the waters ſide, went with him into Wales: and in his company Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Robert Treſilian, Lord Chief Juſtice, and divers others; who there conſulted how they might diſpatch the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham, with divers others of that Faction. But when the King had remained in thoſe parts a good while, he returned, and brought back the Duke of Ireland with him; and ſo his Voyage into Ireland was clean forgotten. About the ſame time Robert Treſilian, Chief Juſtice, came to Coventry, where he indicted two thouſand perſons. The King and the Queen came to Groby; and thither came by his Commandement, the Juſtices of the Realm, Robert Belknap Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, and William Borough, Knights: to whom it was propounded, to anſwer to theſe Queſtions following:

it is plotted to diſpatch him out of the way.

Queſtions propounded by the King, to the Judges, againſt the Lords: who all anſwer as the King would have them.

First, Whether the new Statute and Commiſſion made in the laſt Parliament, were againſt the Kings Prerogative, or no? To which they all anſwered, It was.

Secondly, How they ought to be puniſhed, that procured the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion to be made? They anſwered with one aſſent, that they deſerved death, except the King would pardon them.

Thirdly, How they ought to be puniſhed who moved the King to conſent to the making of the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion? They anſwered they ought to loſe their lives, unleſs the King would pardon them.

Fourthly, How they ought to be puniſhed, that compelled the King to the making of that Statute? They anſwered, they ought to ſuffer as Traitors.

Fifthly, Whether the King might cauſe the Parliament to proceed upon Articles by him limited, before they proceed to any other? They anſwered, That in this the King ſhould overrule; and if any preſumed to do contrary, he was to be puniſhed as a Traitor.

Sixthly, Whether the King might not at his pleaſure diſſolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart? They all anſwered, He might.

Seventhly, Whether the Lords and Commons might, without the Kings will, impeach Officers and Juſtices, upon their Offences, in Parliament, or no? It was anſwered, They might not; and he that attempted contrary, was to ſuffer as a Traitor.

Eighthly, How he is to be puniſhed, who moved in the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward the Second was Indicted in Parliament, might be ſent for; by Inſpection of which Statute, the preſent Statute was deviſed? It was anſwered, That as well he that moved it, as he that brought the Statute into the Houſe, were to be puniſhed as Traitors.

Ninthly, Whether the Judgement given in Parliament againſt Michael de la Pool were erroneous and revocable? They anſwered, It was erroneous and revocable: and that if the Judgement were now to be given, the Juſtices would not give the ſame.

Judge-

In witneſs of the Premiſes, the Juſtices aforeſaid, to theſe Preſents have ſet their Seals; in the preſence of Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Robert Archbiſhop of Dublin, John Biſhop of Durham, Thomas Biſhop of Cheſter, John Biſhop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earl of Suffolk, John Ripon Clerk, and John Blake.

At this time the Londoners incurred much obloquy; For, having before been pardoned by the King of ſome crimes laid to their charge, they were now ready to comply with the King in his deſires: and thereupon being impanelled, they indicted ſome Lords of many crimes informed againſt them. But not only the Juſtices aforeſaid, but all other Juſtices and Sheriffs of the Realm were called at this time to Nottingham; the chief cauſe was, to underſtand what power of men they could aſſure the King of, to ſerve him againſt the Lords: and further, that whereas he meant ſhortly to call a Parliament, they ſhould ſo uſe the matter, that no Knight or Burgeſs ſhould be choſen, but ſuch as the King and his Council ſhould name. To which the Sheriffs made anſwer, that it lay not in their power to aſſemble any forces againſt the Lords, who were ſo well beloved: And as for chooſing Knights and Burgeſſes, the Commons would undoubtedly look to enjoy their antient liberties, and could not be hindered. But yet the King and the Duke of Ireland ſent into all parts of the Realm, to raiſe men in this quarrel againſt the Lords; whereof the Duke of Gloceſter being advertiſed, he came ſecretly to conference with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby: who upon conſultation determined to talk with the King, with their Forces about them, and the King on the other part, took advice how he might apprehend them apart; and thereupon ſent the Earl of Northumberland, and others, to the Caſtle of Rygate, to take the Earl of Arundel, who lay there at that time: but howſoever it fortuned, they failed of their purpoſe. After this he ſent others to apprehend him: but he being warned by a Meſſenger from the Duke of Gloceſter, conveyed himſelf away by night; and by morning was come to Haringey Park, where he found the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earl of Warwick with a great power of men about them. The King hearing of this Aſſembly at Haringey Park, called his Councel, to hear their opinion what was fit to be done. Some were of opinion, that the King ſhould aſſemble his friends, and joyning them with the Londoners, give them Battel; the chiefeſt of this minde was the Archbiſhop of York. Others thought beſt, the King ſhould ſeek to appeaſe the Lords with fair promiſes, till a fitter opportunity to ſuppreſs them. But the King not yet reſolved what courſe to take, cauſed only order to be taken that no Citizen of London ſhould ſell to the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earl of Arundel, or to any other of the Lords, any Armour or furniture of War, under a great pain. But for all this the Lords proceeded in their courſe and ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord John Lovel, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Devereux, requiring to have delivered to them ſuch as were about the King, that were Traitors and Seducers both of him and the Realm: and further to declare, that their aſſembling was for the honour and wealth both of him and the Kingdom. The Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and two or three other about the King, perſwaded him to offer Callice to the King of France, to have his aſſiſtance againſt the Lords. Withal, the King ſent to the Mayor of London, requiring to know how many able men the City could make? To which the Mayor anſwered, that he thought it could make fifty thouſand men at an hours warning. Well then (ſaid the King) go and prove what will be done. But when the Mayor went about it, he was anſwered, They would never fight againſt the Kings friends, and defenders of the Realm. At the ſame time the Earl of Northumberland ſaid to the King: Sir, there is no doubt but theſe Lords have alwayes been, and ſtill are your true and faithful Subjects, though now diſtemper'd by certain perſons about you, that ſeek to oppreſs them; therefore my advice is, that you ſend to them, to come before your preſence in ſome publick place: and I verily believe they will ſhew ſuch reaſons of their doings, that you will hold them excuſed. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Ely Lord Chancellour, and other of the Biſhops there preſent, approved all of the Earls advice; whereupon the King ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Ely to the Lords, requiring them to come to him to Weſtminſter, on Sunday then next following: which upon oath given by the Archbiſhop and the Chancellour, that no fraud nor evil practice ſhould be uſed againſt them, they were content to do. But when the Lords were ready to come at the day appointed, they heard of an Ambuſh laid to entrap them at the Mews; and thereupon ſtayed, ſo as they came not at the time appointed: Whereupon the King asking why they came not according to their promiſe? It was anſwered, Becauſe he kept not his promiſe: there being an Ambuſh of a thouſand armed men laid to ſurprize them at the Mews. The King hearing this, was aſtonied, and ſwore he knew of no ſuch thing, and commanded preſently the place ſhould be ſearched: but it was true, an Ambuſh was laid; but not at the Mews, but in a place about Weſtminſter, where Sir Thomas Tryvet, and Sir Nicholas Brember had aſſembled them. This one action might have made the King ſenſible of his favourites abuſing his Authority; but that where affection makes the conſtruction, all things are taken in a good ſenſe. Or was it perhaps they had a Warrant Dormant, to proſecute the Kings ends without the Kings knowledge? Yet the Lords after this, receiving a ſafe conduct from the King, came to Weſtminſter; of whoſe coming when the King heard, he apparelled himſelf in his Royal Robes, and with his Scepter in his hand, came into the great Hall, before whom, the Lords upon their knees preſented themſelves, the King bidding them welcome, and taking each of them by the hand. Then the Lord

The King requires the Lords to come unto him; but they hearing of an Ambuſh laid for them, forbore.

But upon ſafe conduct from the King they came, and the King receiveth them in ſhow kindely.

Lord Chancellour making a ſpeech; wherein he blamed them for raiſing of Arms, and requiring to know the cauſe; they anſwered, They had done it for the good of the King and Kingdom, and to take away the Traitors about the King. Upon this the King himſelf ſpake, asking them whether they thought to compel him by ſtrong hand. Have not I (ſaith he) ſufficient men to beat you down? truly in this behalf I make no more account of you then of the baſeſt skullion in my Kitchin. Yet after theſe great words he lift up the Duke of Gloceſter, who all this while was kneeling, and commanded the reſt alſo to riſe; and then led them curteouſly to his Chamber, where they ſate and drank together. And finally it was concluded they ſhould all meet again, as well theſe Lords, as thoſe they accuſed at the next Parliament; which the King promiſed to call ſpeedily, and each party to receive there according to Juſtice, and in the mean time all parties to be in the Kings protection. But when the Favourite-Lords heard this, they told the King plainly, they neither durſt nor would put themſelves to the hazard of ſuch a meeting; and therefore the Duke of Ireland, and the reſt of that faction left the Court to be out of the way: But the King not enduring their abſence, appointed Thomas Molineux Conſtable of the Caſtle of Cheſter, to raiſe an Army, and to ſafe-conduct the Duke of Ireland to him. But they being come as far as Radcoat-Bridge, were encountred by the Earl of Derby; and the Duke of Ireland not daring to joyn Battel with him, fled, and being to paſs a River, caſt away his Gantlets and Sword (to be the more nimble) and giving his horſe the ſpur, leapt into the River, and ſo eſcaped: but when theſe things were afterward found, it was verily thought that he had been drowned, till news came he was got into Holland; where being no very welcome gueſt, he went from thence into the Biſhoprick of Utrecht, and after two or three years ſcambling about in manner of a fugitive, at Lovain in Brabant he ended his life. A man of many good parts, and worthy enough of his Princes favour, if with that favour he had not grown proud, and in that pride, injurious and inſulting over others no leſs deſerving then himſelf. He was valiant enough againſt any man but the Earl of Derby, and of him indeed both the Genius of the Duke of Ireland, and of King Richard himſelf ſeemed to ſtand in fear; for neither of them durſt meet him in the field, though encouraged to it by thoſe about them.

1388. It is concluded that at the next Parliament all parties ſhould be heard.

The Duke of Ireland flies into Holland, and after two or three years died at Lovain.

The Earl of Derby a terror both to the Duke of Ireland, and to the King himſelf.

About this time the Duke of Suffolk doubting ſome plots laid to ſurprize him, fled over to Callice in diſguiſe, ſhaving his beard, and counterfeiting himſelf a Poulterer, to ſell certain fowl which he had gotten; but being come to Callice, was by the Lord William Beauchamp, Deputy of the Town, ſent back into England: whom the King notwithſtanding permitted to go at large, to make it be thought he was more afraid then hurt, more ſuſpicious then he needed. By this time the Lords had gotten matter enough againſt the King, at leaſt to juſtifie their Arms; and thereupon with an Army of forty thouſand men, they came to London, where after ſome debate, they were received: and then the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Derby and Notingham, went to the King in the Tower. To whom, after humble ſalutations, they ſhewed the Letter which he had written to the Duke of Ireland, to levy an Army for their deſtruction; likewiſe the Letters which the French King had written to him, containing a ſafe conduct for him to come into France, there to do acts to his own diſhonour and the Kingdoms.

The Lords with an Army of forty thouſand, came to the King at London, and ſhew their grievance.

This done, upon the Kings promiſe that he would come the next day to Weſtminſter to treat further of theſe matters, the Lords departed; only the Earls of Notingham and Derby, at the Kings inſtance, ſtayed all night: but before the King went to bed, his mind was clean altered for keeping his promiſe to meet the Lords the next day at Weſtminſter: which the Lords underſtanding, they ſent peremptorily to him, that if he came not according to his promiſe, they would chooſe another King, that ſhould hearken to the faithful counſel of his Lords. This touched the King ſo to the quick, that the next morning he went and met the Lords; who there declared to him, how much it concerned the good of the Kingdom, that thoſe Traitors ſo often ſpoken of, ſhould be removed from the Court. To which the King, though much againſt his will, yet at laſt condeſcended; And thereupon preſently Alexander Nevil Archbiſhop of York, and Thomas Ruſhoke, Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Confeſſor to the King, were expelled the Court: who not willing to come to after-reckonings fled no man knew whether. They expelled alſo John Fordham, Biſhop of Durham, Lord Treaſurer; the Lord Zouch of Haringworth, the Lord Burvel, the Lord Beaumont, Albery de Vere, Baldwin de Bereford, Richard Adderbury, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Lovel, Knights: but conſtrained to put in ſureties to appear at the next Parliament. Alſo certain Ladies were expelled the Court; as the Lady Poynings, the Lady Mouling, and others, bound to appear at the next Parliament. There were alſo arreſted and committed to ſeveral Priſons, Sir Simon Burley, William Elmham, John Beauchamp, Steward of the Kings Houſe, Sir John Salisbury, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Berneys, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brembar, Knights. Alſo Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, Richard Mitford, the Kings Chaplains: Nicholas Sclake, Dean of the Kings Chappel, and John Blake a Lawyer.

They threaten to chooſe a new King.

Hereupon the King removes or puts in priſon all thoſe whom the Lords required.

Shortly after the Parliament began, (called afterward, The Parliament that wrought wonders.) On the firſt day whereof, were arreſted as they ſate in their places, all the Juſtices (but only Sir William Shipwith:) as Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Sir Robert Belknappe, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brook, and John Alacton, the Kings Serjeant at Law; and were all ſent to the Tower for doing contrary to an Agreement made the laſt Parliament. Alſo in the beginning of this Parliament, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevil Archbiſhop of York, Michael de la Poole, Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Treſilian Lord Chief Juſtice of England, were openly called to anſwer Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Gloceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Henry Earl of Derby, and Thomas Earl of Notingham, upon certain Articles of High Treaſon: and becauſe none of them appeared, it was ordained by whole conſent of Parliament, that they ſhould be baniſhed for ever, and all their Lands and Goods ſeized into the Kings hands (their intailed Lands only excepted.) Shortly after the Lord Chief Juſtice Robert Treſilian, was found in an Apothecaries houſe in Weſtminſter: where being taken, he was brought to the Duke of Gloceſter, who cauſed him the ſame day to be had to the Tower, and from thence drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged. On the morrow after Sir Nicholas Brembar was brought to his anſwer; who being found guilty, was beheaded with an Axe which himſelf had cauſed to be made for beheading of others. After this Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berneys, luſty young men, were drawn and hanged; as alſo Sir John Beauchamp, Lord Steward of the Kings Houſe, John Blake, Eſquire: and laſtly, Sir Simon Burley, Son to the great Sir John Burley, Knight of the Garter, was beheaded on Tower-Hill; whoſe death the King took more heavily and more hainouſly then all the reſt. Alſo all the Juſtices were condemned to dye, but by the Queens interceſſion they were only baniſhed the Realm, and all their Lands and Goods confiſcate, only a ſmall portion of money was aſſigned them for their ſuſtentation. Finally in this Parliament an Oath was required and obtained of the King, that he ſhould ſtand unto, and abide ſuch rule and order as the Lords ſhould take: and this Oath was required alſo of all the Inhabitants of the Realm.

Divers others executed.

All the Judges baniſhed the Realm.

The King bound by Oath to ſtand to ſuch order as the Lords ſhould take.

In the latter end of the Kings eleventh year, the Earl of Arundel was ſent to Sea, with a great Navy of Ships and Men of War: with whom went the Earls of Notingham and Devonſhire, Sir Thomas Piercy, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Cameis, Sir William Elmham, and divers other Knights, to aid the Duke of Britain againſt the King of France: but before they came, the Duke of Britain was reconciled to the King of France; and ſo needing not their aid, all this great Fleet returned with doing nothing. And it was indeed a year of doing nothing, unleſs we reckon ſome petty Inroads of the Scots: and that Sir Thomas Tryvet died with a fall off his horſe: and that Sir John Holland, the Kings Brother by the Mother, was made Earl of Huntington: and that there was contention in Oxford, between the Northern and the Southern Scholars, which was pacified by the Duke of Gloceſter.

In his twelfth year, Commiſſioners were appointed to meet at Balingham, betwixt Callice and Boloigne, to treat of a Peace between the Realms of England, France, and Scotland: and after long debating, a Truce was at laſt concluded, to begin at Midſummer next, and to laſt three years. But now the King to ſhew his plenary Authority of being at full age, removed the Archbiſhop of York from being Lord Chancellour, and put in his place William Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter: alſo he removed the Biſhop of Hereford from being Treaſurer, and put another in his place: The Earl of Arundel likewiſe unto whom the Government of the Parliament was committed and the Admiralty of the Sea, was removed, and the Earl of Huntington put in his room.

A Truce for three years between England, France, and Scotland.

William Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter made Lord Chancellour.

About this time the Lord John Haſtings, Earl of Pembroke, as he was practicing to learn to Juſt, was ſtricken about the privy parts, by a Knight called Sir John St. John; of which hurt he ſoon after died. In whoſe family, It is memorable, that for many generations together, no Son ever ſaw his Father, (the Father being alwayes dead before the Son was born.) The Original of this Family was from Haſtings the Dane, who in the Reign of King Alured, long before the Conqueſt, about the year 890. came with Rollo into England. But howſoever, in this John Haſtings ended the then honourable Titles of the Haſtings; for this man dying without iſſue, his Inheritances were diſperſed to divers perſons: The honour of Pembroke came to Francis at Court, by the Kings gift: the Baronies of Haſtings and Welford came to Reynold Gray of Ruthin: the Barony of Abergavenny was granted to William Beauchamp of Bedford.

A ſtrange accident in the family of the Haſtings, Earls of Pembroke, and the original of their Family.

About this time John Duke of Lancaſter was created Duke of Aquitain, receiving at the Kings hands the Rod and the Cap, as inveſtitures of that Dutchy. Alſo the Duke of York's Son and Heir was created Earl of Richmond.

In his thirteenth year a Royal Juſts was proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on Sunday next after the Feaſt of St. Michael: which being publiſhed, not only in England, but in Scotland, in Almain, in Flanders, in Brabant, and in France, many ſtrangers came hither; amongſt others Valeran Earl of S. Poll, that had married King Richard's Siſter; and William the young Earl of Oſtervant, Son to Albert de Baviere Earl of Holland and Heinault. At the day appointed there iſſued forth of the Tower, about three a clock in the afternoon, ſixty Courſers apparelled for the Juſts; and upon every one an Eſquire of honour, riding a ſoft pace: After them came forth four and thirty Ladies of Honour, (Froiſſard ſaith threeſcore) mounted on Palfries, and every Lady led a Knight with a Chain of Gold. Theſe Knights being on the Kings part, had their Armour and Apparel garniſhed with white Harts, and Crowns of Gold about their necks; and ſo they came riding through the ſtreets of London unto Smithfield. The Juſt laſted divers dayes; Fabian ſaith, four and twenty: All which time the King and Queen lay at the Biſhops Palace by Pauls Church, and kept open houſe for all comers.

A royal Juſts held in Smithfield, and the ſolemnity of it.

In his fifteenth year the Duke of Lancaſter went into France, having in his train a thouſand horſe; and met the King of France at Amiens, to treat of a peace between the two Kingdoms: but after long debate, a Truce only was concluded for a year.

About this time the King required the Londoners to lend him a thouſand pounds: which they refuſed to do; and not only ſo, but they abuſed an Italian Merchant, for offering to lend it. This moved the King to ſome indignation: to which was added the complaint of a Riot committed by the Citizens, againſt the Servants of the Biſhop of Salisbury Lord Treaſurer; for that where one of the Biſhops Servants, named Walter Roman, had taken a horſe-loaf out of a Bakers Basket as he paſſed in the ſtreets, and ran with it into his Lords houſe; the Citizens thereupon aſſaulted the houſe, and would not be quieted, till the Mayor and Aldermen were fain to come, and with much ado appeaſed them. Upon complaint hereof hereof, urged againſt the Citizens, by the Biſhop of Salisbury Lord Treaſurer, and Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of York Lord Chancellour, the Mayor and Aldermen, and divers other ſubſtantial Citizens are arreſted; the Mayor is committed to the Caſtle of Windſor, and the other to other Caſtles; the liberties of the City are ſeized into the Kings hands, and the authority of the Mayor utterly ceaſed, the King appointing a Warden to govern the City, firſt Sir Edmund Derligrug, and afterward Sir Baldwin Radington: till at length, by the ſpecial ſuit of the Duke of Gloceſter, the King was contented to come to London, to ſo great joy of the Citizens, that they received him with four hundred on horſe-back, clad all in one Livery, and preſented the King and Queen with many rich gifts; yet all gave not ſatisfaction, to have their liberties reſtored, till they afterwards paid ten thouſand pounds. This it is to provoke a Lion. It may be fortune enough to us, if by any means we can but keep him quiet; for if once we provoke him to lay his paw upon us, it will be hard geting from him, and not be torn in pieces.

1393. In his ſixteenth year, the Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, are once again ſent into France, to treat of a peace: but when they could not agree with the French Commiſſioners upon Articles propounded, there was only a Truce concluded for four years; though perhaps a further agreement had then been made, but that the King of France fell newly again into his old fit of Frenſie, which called away the French Commiſſioners from further Treaty.

1395. All Iriſh men commanded to avoid the Realm, and why.

In his eighteenth year, a Proclamation was ſet forth, That all Iriſh men ſhould avoid this Realm, and return home. The occaſion was, becauſe ſo many Iriſh were come over, that Ireland in a manner was left unpeopled: inſomuch, that where King Edward the third had received from thence yearly the ſum of thirty thouſand pounds, the King now laid forth as much to repel Rebels. Whereupon at Michaelmas King Richard went himſelf into Ireland, attended with the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of March, Notingham, and Rutland, the Lord Thomas Piercy Lord Steward, and divers others of the Engliſh Nobility; to whom came in the great Oneal King of Meth, Bryan of Thomond King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur King of Leymſter, and Conhur King of Cheveney and Darpe: and theſe King Richard ſtayed all that Winter, and after Chriſtmas called a Parliament. At which time alſo the Duke of York, Lord Warden of England, in the Kings name called a Parliament at Weſtminſter; to the which was ſent forth of Ireland the Duke of Gloceſter, that he might declare to the Commons the Kings great occaſions for ſupply of money: whoſe words ſo far prevailed, that a whole tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity.

King Richard goes into Ireland.

1397. A famous Enterview between the two Kings of England and France, and the manner of it.

In his twentieth year was a famous Enterview between the two Kings of England and France: where was ſet up for King Richard a rich Pavilion, a little beyond Guyſnes, within the Engliſh pale; and another the like for the French King, on this ſide Arge. The Diſtance betwixt the two Tents was beſet on either ſide with Knights armed with their ſwords in their hands, four hundred Engliſh on one ſide, and four hundred French on the other. The two Kings before their meeting took a ſolemn oath for aſſurance of their faithful and true meaning, to obſerve the ſacred laws of amity one toward another, in this enterview. After the two Kings were come together, it was accorded, that in the ſame place where they met, there ſhould be builded at both their coſts a Chappel for a perpetual memory, which ſhould be called, the Chappel of our Lady of Peace. On Simon and Jude's day, the Kings talked together of Articles concerning the Peace; and having concluded them, they received either of them an Oath, upon the holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve and keep them. This done, the French King brought his Daughter Iſabel, and delivered her to King Richard, who ſhortly after at Callice married her; and upon the 17 of January following, ſhe was Crowned Queen at Weſtminſter. A match of great honour, but of little conveniency, and leſs profit; for the Lady being but eight years of age, there could be no hope of Iſſue for a long time, which was King Richard's greateſt want; and as little ſupply of his wants otherwiſe, her Portion perhaps ſcarce paying the charges of his journey to fetch her, which coſt him three hundred thouſand Marks.

King Richard marries Iſabel the King of France's daughter, being but eight years of age.

The Duke of Lancaſter, in the thirteenth year of King Richard's reign, had been created Duke of Aquitain; but when the Gaſcoigners would not receive him, ſhewing reaſons why that Dukedome ought not to be ſeparated from the Crown of England, his Grant was revoked, and ſo it remained ſtill in Demeſn of the Crown.

The Duke of Lancaſter's iſſue by Katharine Swinford, legitimated by Parliament.

At this time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancaſter cauſed to be legitimated, the Iſſue he had by Katherine Swinford, before he married her; of whom Thomas Beaufort was created Earl of Somerſet.

This year alſo, the King receiving the money back, which had been lent to the Duke of Britain, upon Breſt, delivered up the Town unto him; and thereupon, the Engliſh ſouldiers that were there in Garriſon, were all diſcharged and ſent home: who, at a Feaſt which the King kept at Weſtminſter, coming in companies together into the Hall; as ſoon as the King had dined, and was entring into his Chamber, the Duke of Gloceſter asked him, if he did mark thoſe men that ſtood in ſuch troops in the Hall: yes marry (ſaid the King) who were they? They were (ſaid the Duke) thoſe Souldiers, who by your rending up of Breſt have been ſent home, and now muſt either ſtarve or ſteal; and therewithall, very unadviſedly in words, taxed the King with unadviſedneſs of his deed. To whom the King in great anger replied, Why Unkle, do you think me either a Merchant, or a Fool, to ſell my land? By S. John Baptiſt, No: But could I refuſe to render the Town, when tender was made upon the money lent upon it? Indeed nothing could more diſcover the Duke of Gloceſter's either weakneſs if he knew not that Breſt was but only a morgage; or injuſtice, if knowing it, he would have had the King, though the money were tendred, to have kept it ſtill: but ſuch is the courſe of many, to take part with the Politicks againſt the Ethicks; work their ends by doing unjuſtly, when doing juſtly ought to be their chiefeſt end. However it was, the multiplying of words about this matter, kindled in the King ſuch a diſpleaſure againſt the Duke, that it could never afterwards be quenched, but by his bloud. And firſt he complained to his other two Unkles, the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, of his undutiful behaviour towards him; who told the King, their Brother perhaps might let fall ſome unadviſed words, but they knew his heart to be true and faithful. Yet doubting how far the King might preſs upon them to anſwer for their brothers faithfulneſs, they retired from Court: which gave the Dukes enemies time to incenſe the King farther againſt him.

The Duke of Gloceſter and other Lords conſpire to ſeize upon King Richard, but are diſcovered.

It happened that the Duke of Gloceſter had with him one day at his houſe, the Abbot of S. Albans that was his Godfather, and the Prior of Weſtminſter; and after dinner falling in talk with them, amongſt other communications the Duke required the Prior to tell truth, whether he had any Viſion the night before? To which the Prior was loth at firſt to make a direct Anſwer; but at laſt, being earneſtly requeſted, as well by the Abbot as the Duke, he confeſſed that he had a Viſion indeed, which was, that the Realm of England ſhould be deſtroyed through the miſgovernance of King Richard. By the Virgin Mary (ſaid the Abbot) I had the very ſame Viſion. Whereupon the Duke preſently diſcloſed to them all the ſecrets of his minde; and by their devices contrived an Aſſembly of divers great Lords of the Realm, to meet at Arundel Caſtle that day fortnight: at which time he appointed to be there himſelf, with the Earls of Derby, Arundel, Marſhall, and Warwick; alſo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Abbot of St. Albans, the Prior of Weſtminſter, with divers others. And accordingly all theſe met at Arundel Caſtle, at the day appointed; where receiving firſt the Sacrament, by the hands of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be aſſiſtant each to other, in all ſuch matters as they ſhould determine, They reſolved to ſeiſe upon King Richard, and upon the Dukes of Lancaſter and York, and commit them to Priſon: and all the other Lords of the Kings Council, they determined ſhould be drawn and hanged. But the Earl Marſhal, that was Deputy of Callice, and had married the Earl of Arundel's daughter, diſcovered all their counſel to the King; who thereupon, by a plot deviſed by his Council, took his Brother the Earl of Huntington with him: and riſing from ſupper, rode that night to the Duke of Gloceſter's houſe at Plaſhey in Eſſex. When the King came thither, the Duke was a-bed; but informed of it, caſt his Cloak about his ſhoulders, and came down, bidding the Kings grace, with all reverence, welcome. The King courteouſly requeſted him to go and make himſelf ready, for that he muſt needs ride with him a little way, to confer of ſome buſineſs. The Duke preſently made him ready and came down; and as ſoon as the King and his company was gone a little way from the houſe, and the Duke with him, the Earl Marſhal arreſted the Duke, as he had been appointed to do by the King, who immediately was ſent to Callice: where after ſome time he was diſpatched of his life, either ſtrangled, or elſe ſmothered with Pillows, as ſome write.

The King by a wile, ſeizeth upon the Duke of Gloceſter, and ſends him preſently to Callice, where ſoon after he loſt his life.

At the very ſame time was the Earl of Arundel apprehended by the Earls of Rutland and Kent: the Earl of Warwick alſo, when the King had invited him to dinner, and ſhewed him very good countenance, was taken and arreſted in the place: as likewiſe at the ſame time were apprehended, and committed to the Tower, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheyny. Shortly after, the King procured them to be indicted at Nottingham, ſuborning ſuch as ſhould appeal them in Parliament; namely Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marſhal, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, John Montacute Earl of Saliſbury, Thomas Lord Spencer, and the Lord William Scroope Lord Chamberlain: and in the mean time, the King ſent for a power of Cheſhire men, to keep Watch and Ward about his Perſon.

Divers other Lords committed to the Tower.

On the 17. of September, a Parliament began at Weſtminſter; wherein the King complained as well of many things done by the Lords in his Minority, as alſo of the hard dealing which they had uſed towards the Queen, who was three hours at one time on her knees, before the Earl of Arundel, for one of her Eſquires, named John Calverley, who nevertheleſs had his head ſmitten from his ſhoulders: and all the anſwer ſhe could get, was this, Madam, pray for your ſelf and your Husband, and let this ſuit alone. Thoſe that ſet forth the Kings grievances in this Parliament, were John Buſhie, William Bagot, and Thomas Green. The cauſe of aſſembling the Parliament was ſhewed, That the King had called it for reformation of divers tranſgreſſions againſt the peace of this Land, by the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and others. Then Sir John Buſhie, Speaker of the Parliament, made requeſt on behalf of the Commonalty, that they might be puniſhed according to their deſervings: and ſpecially the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who then ſat next the King, whom he accuſed of high Treaſon. When the Archbiſhop began to anſwer, Sir John Buſhie beſought the King, That he might not be admitted to anſwer, leſt by his great wit and cunning he might lead men away to believe him. And here Sir John Buſhie in all his talk did not attribute to the King titles of honour due and accuſtomed, but ſuch as were fitter for the Majeſty of God than for any earthly Prince. And when the Archbiſhop was conſtrained to keep ſilence, Sir John Buſhie proceeded; requiring on the behalf of the Commons, That the Charters of Pardon, granted to the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, ſhould be revoked. The King for his part proteſted that they were drawn from him by compulſion; and therefore beſought them to deliver their opinions, what they thought thereof. Whereupon, the Biſhops firſt gave their ſentence, that the ſaid Pardons were revokable, and might be called in; but pretending a ſcrupuloſity, as if they might not with ſafe conſciences be preſent, where judgment of blood ſhould paſs, they appointed a Lay-man to be their Prolocutor for that turn. The Temporal Lords likewiſe gave their ſentence, That the Pardons were revokable: only the Judges and Lawyers

Sir John Buſhie Speaker of the Parliament, attributes divine titles to the King.

The Lords ſpiritual and Temporal, give their opinions one way, and the Judges and Lawyers another.

Lawyers were not of this opinion. But howſoever the Archbiſhop of Canterbury is hereupon condemned to perpetual Exile, and appointed to avoid the Realm within ſix weeks. Alſo the Earl of Arundel is by the Duke of Lancaſter, who ſate that day as High Steward, condemned of Treaſon, and on the Tower-hill beheaded. There went to ſee the execution, divers Lords, amongſt whom was the Earl of Nottingham, that had married his Daughter; and the Earl of Kent, that was his Daughters Son: to whom, at the place of his execution he ſaid, Truly it would have beſeemed you rather to be abſent, then here at this buſineſs; but the time will come ere long, that as many ſhall marvel at your misfortune, as they do now at mine. After his death, a fame went, that his head was grown to his body again: whereupon, the tenth day after his burial, his body by the Kings appointment was taken up, and then found to be a Fable. After this, the Lord Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was brought forth, and charged with the like Treaſons; but by the interceſſion of the Duke of Lancaſter and other Lords, after confeſſion of his fault, was only confin'd into the Iſle of Man. Likewiſe the Lord Cobham, and Sir John Cheney were only baniſhed; or (as Fabian ſaith) condemned to perpetual Priſon. The Parliament after this was held at Shrewsbury; where, for the love the King bore to the Gentlemen and Commons of the Shire of Cheſter, he cauſed it to be Ordained, that from thenceforth it ſhould be called and known by the name of the Principality of Cheſter: and herewith intituled himſelf Prince of Cheſter. At this Parliament alſo, called the Great Parliament, he created five Dukes, and a Dutcheſs; one Marqueſs, and four Earls. The Earl of Derby was created Duke of Hereford; the Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; the Earl of Rutland Duke of Albemarle; the Earl of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earl of Huntington, Duke of Exceter; and the Lady Margaret Marſhall Counteſs of Norfolk, was created Dutcheſs of Norfolk; the Earl of Somerſet was created Marqueſs of Dorſet; the Lord Spencer was made Earl of Gloceſter; the Lord Nevil, Earl of Weſtmerland; the Lord Scroop, Earl of Wiltſhire: and the Lord Thomas Piercy Lord-Steward of the Kings houſe, was made Earl of Worceſter; and for the better maintenance of their eſtate, he divided amongſt them a great part of thoſe lands that belonged to the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick. Alſo in this Parliament, the Judges gave their opinions, That when Articles are propounded by the King to be handled in Parliament, if other Articles be handled before thoſe be firſt determined, that it is Treaſon in them that do it. And in this Parliament, the King brought it ſo about, that he obtained the whole power of the Parliament to be conferred upon certain perſons, namely, John Duke of Lancaſter, Edmund Duke of York; Edmund Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marqueſs of Dorſet, Roger Earl of March, John Earl of Salisbury, and divers others, or to any ſeven or eight of them; and theſe, by vertue of this Grant, proceeded to conclude upon many things, which concerned generally the things of the whole Parliament, to the great prejudice of the State, and a dangerous example in time to come. A general Pardon was alſo granted for all offences, to all the Kings ſubjects, but only to fifty, whoſe names he would not expreſs, but reſerved them to his own knowledge, That when any of the Nobility offended him, he might at his pleaſure name him to be one of the number excepted, and ſo keep them ſtill within his danger. And for the more ſtrengthening the Acts of his Parliament, the King purchaſed the Popes Bulls, containing grievous cenſures and curſes to them that ſhould break them. And now the Heads of the oppoſite Faction having loſt their heads, and all things as well ſetled as could be deſired, the King was ſecure, as thinking himſelf ſafe; and he had indeed been ſafe, if Time and Fortune were not Actors in Revenge, as well as men: or rather, if a ſuperiour power did not enterpoſe, whoſe wayes are as ſecret as himſelf is invincible.

It now fell out, (though writers differ what it was fell out) for Some write, that Thomas Mowbray accuſed the Duke of Hereford; Others, that Henry Duke of Hereford accuſed Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, for ſpeaking words ſounding highly to the Kings diſhonour; to which the Duke of Norfolk, being called to anſwer, charged the Duke of Hereford before the King, that he lyed falſly. Whereupon a Combat was agreed upon between them. The King laboured to make them friends, but not prevailing, he gave way to proceed in Combat, and the place to be at Coventry; where at the day and hour appointed, the Duke of Hereford, mounted on a white Courſer, barded with green and blew Velvet, imbroidered ſumptuouſly with Swains and Antelops of Goldſmiths work, approached the Liſts. Of whom the Marſhal, being the Duke of Surrey, demanding who he was? he anſwered; I am Henry of Lancaſter, Duke of Hereford, that am come hither to do my endeavour againſt Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, as a Traitor, untrue to God, the King, his Realm, and me: Then incontinently he ſwore upon the holy Evangeliſts, that his quarrel was true and juſt; and thereupon required to enter the Liſts, where in a Chair of green Velvet he ſat down and repoſed himſelf. Then came the Duke of Norfolk, his Horſe barded with Crimſon Velvet, imbroydered richly with Lions of Silver, and Mulbery-trees; and when he had taken his Oath before the Conſtable the Duke of Aumerle, that his quarrel was juſt, he entered the Liſts, and ſate him down in his chair of Crimſon Velvet, curtained about with white and red Damask. Then the Marſhal viewed their Spears, to ſee that they were of equal length; and the Heralds proclaimed, on the Kings behalf, they ſhould mount on Horſeback, and addreſs themſelves to the Combat: but when they were ſet forward, and had their Spears in their Reſts, the King caſt down his Warder, and the Heralds cryed Stay, Stay. Then the King cauſed their Spears to be taken from them, and deliberated with his Council, what was fit to be done in ſo weighty a cauſe. After two long hours it was at laſt concluded, that Henry Duke of Hereford ſhould within fifteen Whereupon a Combat is agreed upon between them, and in what manner.

But the King interposeth and banisheth the Duke of Norfolk for ever: the Duke of Hereford for six years.

fifteen dayes depart out of the Realm, and not return before ten years were expired, upon pain of death; And that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk should likewise avoid the Realm, and never return into England, upon the like pain. It is observable, that this Censure was passed against the Duke of Norfolk, the very same day twelve month in which he had taken order to put the Duke of Glocester to death at Callice, whereof he was then Governour. When these Judgements were once read, the King called before him both the Dukes, and made them swear that the one should never come in place where the other was. After this, the Duke of Norfolk went into Almain, and from thence went to Venice; where after some time he dyed with sorrow. The Duke of Hereford, at the taking his leave of the King, had four years of his Banishment released; and then went to Callice, and from thence to Paris: where, of the French King he was so kindely received, that by his favour he had obtained in marriage the only daughter of the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, if King Richard by Messengers had not hindered him. The Duke might have made his banishment, in manner of a visitation, if he had gone into Spain; for there he had two sisters married, the one to the King of Portugal, the other to the King of Spain, to whom his coming would have been most welcome: but he chose rather to make his stay in France, as the place where he might soonest have intelligence out of England; and indeed before a year came about, he heard of the death of his Father, the Duke of Lancaster: and heard withal that King Richard had seised into his hands, all the Lands descended upon him, contrary to his promise.

The delinquencies of great men punished only with banishment; and the danger of it.

It was a custom in those dayes, to punish the delinquencies of great men by banishment out of the Realm, a Custom not more grievous to the Subject then dangerous to the Prince: for by this course they had means to work so closely in their mines of revenge, that the Fabrick of a Kingdom was in danger to be blown up before their working could be perceived. An example whereof was never more plainly seen then at this time, in the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Hereford; For they in their banishment meeting often together, and aggravating the grievances of King Richard's Government, fell at last to consult by what means he might best be removed, seeing there was no hope he could ever be reclaimed. In the time of their consultation about it, as if Fortune her self meant to do their work for them, sollicitations came from many parts of England, to move the Duke of Hereford to come now and take the Government upon him, wherein they would be ready to assist him. The Duke heated before by the Archbishop's instigation, and now set on fire by this solicitation, gives Fortune no leisure to alter her minde, by delaying the time; but without further deliberation prepares to be going: and taking with him the Archbishop, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington, and Sir Thomas Ramston, Knights; John Norbury, Robert Waterton, and Francis Coynt Esquires, and about some threescore other persons, as many as he could readily get, in three Ships which the Duke of Britain lent him, he put to Sea: where hovering about the Coast a while, to mark the countenance of the shores, he landed at last, about the beginning of July, at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire. Which no sooner was known, but there repaired to him the Lords, Willoughby, Ross, Darcy, and Beaumont; and shortly after, at Doncaster, the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Sir Henry Piercy, with the Earl of Westmerland, and great numbers of the Gentry and common sort: of whom though some had invited him to come to take the Government of the Realm upon him, yet he forbore to pretend that, for any cause of his coming, but made a solemn protestation, that he came only to take possession of the inheritances descended upon him from his Father, which King Richard most unjustly, and contrary to his promise, had seised into his hands: for this was a reason had no objection: the other he reserved, till his power should not need to regard objections. And indeed, no snow-ball ever gathered greatness so fast by rolling, as his Forces increased by marching forward; for by that time he came to Berkley, he had got a mighty Army: and within three dayes after, all the Kings Castles in those parts were surrendred to him. The Duke of York left Governour of the Kingdom, used his best means to raise Forces to resist him; but found few willing to bear Arms against him: whereupon, and perhaps hearing withal that the Dukes coming was but only to take possession of his Inheritance, he thought good to go to Berkley to him, to have there some communication about it. At Berkley at that time was arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham, and Sir Walter Burleigh, Knights; Lawrence Drew, and John Golofer Esquires. From Berkley the two Dukes went forward towards Bristow, where in the Castle were the Lord William Scroop, Earl of Wiltshire, and Treasurer of England; Sir Henry Green, and Sir Henry Bushy, who were taken and brought forth bound before the Duke of Lancaster: and the day after arraigned before the Constable and Marshal, found guilty of Treason for misgoverning the King and the Realm, and presently had their heads smitten off. Sir John Russel also was taken there; but he feigning himself to be out of his wits, escaped for that time.

1399 He lands with three ships at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire.

He pretends his coming to be only to claim the inheritance descended upon him from his Father.

1399 Many Lords repair to him, and all the Kings Castles are surrendred to him.

The Lord Scroope Treasurer of England, with Sir Henry Green and Sir Henry Bushie have their heads smitten off.

The Duke of Hereford is solicited to return into England.

All this while King Richard was in Ireland, where he performed Acts in repressing the Rebels there, not unworthy of him; and having with him amongst other of the great Lords, the Duke of Lancaster's Son Henry, he there for his towardlinesse in service, Knighted him. By which it appeared that he had no great fear of the Father, when he graced the Son; and indeed he needed not have feared him, if his own absence out of England had not given him advantage. Six weeks were now passed after the Dukes arrival in England; in all which time King Richard had no notice of it, by reason the windes were contrary to come forth of England: But as soon as he heard it, and in what hostile manner he proceeded, he then determined to return instantly into England; and had done it but that the Duke of Aumerle

King Richard being in Ireland, had no notice in six weeks of the Dukes arrival in England.

Hearing it, he prepares presently to return;

Hearing it he prepares presently to return; but is otherwise counselled by the Duke of Aumerle.

Aumerle his principal Counsellour (whether out of a good meaning, but grounded upon errors; or out of an ill meaning, but shadowed with colours) by all means perswaded him to stay so long till things fitting for his journey might be made ready. It was King Richard's ill luck to hearken to this ill counsel: but yet he presently sent the Earl of Salisbury into England, to provide him an Army out of Wales and Cheshire, against his own coming; which he promised faithfully should be within six dayes at the most. The Earl landed at Conway in Wales, and had soon gotten to the number of forty thousand men: but the six dayes passed and no news of the King; which made the Souldiers suspect that he was dead, and thereupon were ready to disband; but at the Earl of Salisburies perswasion, they were contented to stay for some dayes longer, and when the King came not in that time neither, they then would stay no longer, but departed and went home. At length, about eighteen dayes after that the King had sent away the Earl of Salisbury, he took shipping, together with the Dukes of Aumerle, Exeter, and Surrey, and divers others of the Nobility; with the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carlile; and landed at Barklowly in Wales. He had about him some Cheshire men, and was at first in no great doubt of prevailing; but when he heard that all the Castles from the Borders of Scotland unto Bristow were delivered to the Duke of Lancaster, and that the greatest part of the Nobility and Commons took part with him, and specially that his principal Counsellours had lost their heads at Bristow; then, solvuntur frigore membra, he fell so utterly to despair, that calling his Army together, he licenced every man to be gone, and so shift for himself. The Souldiers besought him to be of good chear, swearing they would stand with him to the death: but this encouraged him not at all; so as the next night he stole from his Army, and with the Dukes of Exeter, and Surrey, the Bishop of Carlile, Sir Stephen Scroop, and some half a score others, he got him to the Castle of Conway, where he found the Earl of Salisbury determining there to stay, till he might see the world at some better stay. Here the Earl of Worcester Steward of the Kings house, broke his white staffe, and without delay went to the Duke of Lancaster; who understanding that King Richard was returned out of Ireland, he left the Duke of York at Bristow, and came back with his power to Berkeley, and from thence the next day came to Gloucester, and then to Rosse, after to Hereford, where came to him the Bishop of Hereford, and Sir Edmund Mortimer: on the Sunday following he went to Leymster, and there the Lord Carleton came to him: from thence he went to Ludlow, and the next day to Shrewsbury, and thither came to him Sir Robert Leigh, and Sir John Leigh, and many other, being sent from Chester, to offer their service; thither also came to him the Lord Scales, and the Lord Bardolph, forth of Ireland: From Shrewsbury he went to Chester and from thence sent for his Son and Heir, and likewise for the Duke of Gloucester's Son and Heir (whom King Richard had left in custody in Ireland, with all speed to come into England; but the Duke of Gloucester's Son through misfortune perished at Sea, or as some write, died of the plague; the sorrow whereof caused, shortly after, his Mothers death. After this, the Duke sent the Earl of Northumberland to the King, who upon safe conduct coming to him, declared, that if it might please his Grace to undertake, that there should be a Parliament assembled, in which Justice might be had, and herewith pardon the Duke of Lancaster of all things wherein he had offended, the Duke would be ready to come to him on his knees and as an humble Subject obey him in all dutiful services. Yet upon this conference with the Earl, some say the King required only, that himself and eight more, whom he would name, might have honourable allowance, with assurance of a private quiet life, and that then he would resign his Crown; and that upon the Earls Oath that this should be performed, the King agreed to go with the Earl to meet the Duke: but after four miles riding, coming to the place where they laid an Ambush, the King was enclosed, and constrained to go with the Earl of Rutland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint to bed. The King had very few of his friends about him, but only the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlile, the Lord Scroop, Sir Nicholas Ferebye, and James d' Artois a Gascoine, who still wore a white Hart, the Cognisance of his Master King Richard, and neither for Promises nor Threats would be drawn to leave it off.

The King coming over and finding the Army disbanded, falls to despair, and secretly the next night gets him to Conway Castle.

He sends the Earl of Salisbury before, and promiseth to come himself within six dayes. The Earl provides an Army of forty thousand; but when the King came not at his time, they all disbanded and went away.

The Duke of Lancaster offers conditions to the King.

Which the Earl of Northumberland undertakes upon his Oath should be performed.

Hereupon the King goes to meet the Duke, but is entrapped in an Ambush, and carried to Flint Castle.

The King being in the Castle of Flint, and Duke Henry with his Army approaching near the Town, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Duke of Aumerle and the Earl of Worcester, went before to the King; whom the King spying from the Walls where he stood, went down to meet, and finding they did their due reverence to him on their knees, he took them up, and taking the Archbishop aside, talked with him a good while; and as it was reported, the Archbishop willed him to be of good comfort, for he should be assured not to have any hurt as touching his person. After this the Duke of Lancaster came to the Castle himself, all armed; and being within the first gate he there stayed till the King, accompanied with the Bishop of Carlile, the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir Stephen Scroop, who bore the Sword before him, came forth, and sate down in a place prepared for him. As soon as the Duke saw him, he came towards him bowing his knee; and coming forward, did so the second time, and the third, till the King took him by the hand, and lift him up, saying dear Cousin, you are welcome. The Duke humbly thanking him, said: My Sovereign Lord and King, the cause of my coming at this present is, (your Honour saved) to have restitution of my Person, my Lands, and Heritage: whereto the King answered, Dear Cousin, I am ready to accomplish your will, so that you may enjoy all that is yours without exception. After this coming forth of the Castle, the King called for Wine; and after they had drunk, they mounted on horseback, and rode to Chester, the next day to Nantwich, then to Newcastle, from thence to Stafford, and then to Litchfield, and there rested Sunday: after that they they rode forward, and lodged first at Coventry, then at Daintree, then at Northampton, next day at Dunstable, then at St. Albans, and so came to London. In all which journey they suffered not the King to change his apparel, but made him ride still in one sute of rayment; and that but a simple one, though he in his time was exceeding sumptuous in Apparel, having one Coat which was valued at thirty thousand Marks: and in this sort he was brought the next day to Westminster, and from thence the next day had to the Tower, and committed to safe Custody. After this, a Parliament was called by the Duke of Lancaster, but in the nam: of King Richard; in which many heinous points of Mis-government were laid to his charge, and were ingrossed up in three and thirty Articles, the chief were these.

But yet is basely carried away and committed to the Tower.

Articles delivered to the Parliament against King Richard.

That he had wastefully spent the Treasure of the Realm.

That without Law or Justice, he had caused the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earl of Arundel to be put to death.

That he had borrowed great sums of money, and given his Letters Patents to repay the same, and yet not one peny ever paid.

That he had said, The Laws of the Realm were in his head, and in his breast: by reason of which fantastical opinion, he destroyed Noblemen, and impoverished the Commons.

That he changed Knights and Burgesses of the Parliament at his pleasure.

That most tyrannously he said, That the lives and goods of all his Subjects were in his hands, and at his disposition.

That whereas divers Lords were by the Court of Parliament appointed to treat of matters concerning the state of the Kingdom; they being busied about the same Commission, he went about to appeach them of high Treason.

That by force and threats, he enforced the Judges of the Realm, at Shrewsbury, to condescend to his way, for the destruction of divers of the Lords.

That he caused his Fathers own Brother, the Duke of Gloceſter, without Law to be attached and sent to Callice, and there without reason, secretly murthered.

That notwithstanding the Earl of Arundel, at his arraignment pleaded his Charter of Pardon, yet he could not be heard, but was shamefully and suddenly put to death.

That he assembled certain Lancaſhire and Cheſhire men, to make War upon his Lords; and suffered them to rob and spoil, without prohibition.

That though he had made Proclamation That the Lords were not attached for any crime of Treason, yet afterward in the Parliament he laid Treason to their charge.

That notwithstanding his Pardon granted to them, he inforced divers of the Lords partakers, to be again intolerably Fined, to their utter undoing.

That without the assent of the Peers, he carried the Jewels and Plate of this Kingdom into Ireland.

He is by Parliament deposed.

Upon these, and some other Articles, he was by Parliament adjudged to be deposed from all Kingly Honour, and Princely Government. And thereupon, the King being advised by his own servants, rather voluntarily to resign the Crown, then by compulsion to be forced to it, on the Monday before the nine and twentieth day of September, in the year 1399. he made a solemn resignation, before divers Lords and others, sent to him for that purpose; and an instrument of his resignation being made, he would needs read it before them all himself, and then subscribed it: and withal, made it his suit, that the Duke of Lancaster might be his Successour, and King after him; and for a sign of his desire hereof, he took his signet Ring of Gold from his finger, and put it upon the Duke of Lancaster; that never man who had used a Kingdom with such violence, gave it over with such patience, or rather such willingness, that he seemed rather to affect it, then that he was any way forced to it. This Resignation of King Richard being shewed to the Parliament, both Houses gave their assent; and then Commissioners were appointed to pronounce openly the sentence of his deposing, which was done by the Bishop of Asaph, and all Allegiance renounced to him.

He voluntarily resigns his Crown to the Duke of Lancaster.

And now it is easie to be observed, what a wonderful concurrence of fortunes, in behalf of the Duke of Lancaster, and against King Richard, happened together; whereof if any one had been missing, he had never been turned out of his Throne in such manner as he was: For first, if it had not happened that King Richard had been in Ireland at the time when the Duke began his attempt, it had not been possible for him to compass his design as he did: And then if King Richard being in Ireland, he hast not by misfortune of weather been kept six weeks from hearing of the Dukes arrival, he had not given him so large a time for raising of Forces, and so more easily might have resisted him: Or after King Richard heard of the Dukes arrival, if he had followed the Earl of Salisbury, and not stayed so many dayes longer then he promised, he had found an Army ready to receive him, sufficient at least to have given a stop to the Dukes proceedings: Or when at last he came over, and found his Army to fail him, if withal his own courage had not failed him, but that he had manfully put it to the hazard of a Battel, as his Souldiers themselves would have had him to do, he could not choose but have made a better end of his business then now he did. But when all is done, there is no warding the blows of Fortune; or to say better, no resisting the Decree of Heaven: but seeing that Decree is an Abyssm to us, and may perhaps but be conditional, we shall manifestly be Traitors to our selves, if we use not our uttermost endeauours to divert it: that it may truly be said, King Richard lost his Crown, more by his own Treason, then by the Treason of any other.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second year, in a Parliament held at Gloceſter, was granted to be paid by the Merchants, upon every sack of Wool a Mark, for this present year; and for every pounds-worth of Wares brought from beyond Sea, and sold here, six pence of the buyer. In his third year, in a Parliament at Westminster, a Subsidy was granted to be levied of the great men men of the Realm, to the end the Commons might be ſpared: The Dukes of Lancaſter and Britain paid twenty Marks; every Earl ſix Marks; Biſhops and Abbots with Miter, as much: every Monk three ſhillings four pence: alſo every Juſtice, Sheriff, Knight, Eſquire, Parſon, and Vicar, were charged after a certain rate; but no Commons of the Laity. Alſo this year in another Parliament, was granted a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity; but with this condition, that from thenceforth, which was in March, 1380. till the Feaſt of St. Michael, which ſhould be in the year 1381. there ſhould be no more Parliaments: but yet was not obſerved. In his fourth year, in a Parliament at Northampton, a new kinde of Subſidy was granted; of every Prieſt Secular or Regular, ſix ſhillings eight pence; and as much of every Nun; and of every man or woman, married or not married, being ſixteen years of age (beggers only excepted) four pence. In his fifth year a Subſidy was granted by the Merchants of certain Cuſtoms of their Wools which they bought and ſold, called a Maletot, to endure for four years. In his ſeventh year was granted him one Moiety of a Fifteenth by the Laity; and ſhortly after a Moiety, of the Tenth by the Clergy. In his ninth year, half of a Tenth, and half of a Fifteenth by the Laity. In his eleventh year, there was granted him a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity. In his twelfth year at a Parliament was granted of every ſack of Wool, forty ſhillings; whereof, ten ſhillings to be applied preſently to the Kings uſe; the other thirty to remain in the hands of Treaſurers, towards the charges of Wars, if any ſhould happen. Alſo there was a Subſidy granted, of ſix pence in the pound; whereof, four pence to the uſe laſt mentioned; the other two pence to be at the Kings pleaſure. In his fifteenth year, at a Parliament, was granted a tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity, towards the charges of John Duke of Lancaſter, ſent into France. In his eighteenth year a Tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity, towards his own journey into Ireland. In his twentieth year the Clergy granted him a Tenth, to be paid that year. In his one and twentieth year, upon pretence of having aided the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick againſt him, he cauſed blank Charters to be made, which he compelled both Citizens and Gentlemen in the Countrey to ſeal, whereby he might charge them afterward to pay whatſoever he required. In his two and twentieth year a Fifteenth and a half was granted; and for the Cuſtoms of Wools, fifty ſhillings upon every ſack, of Engliſh men born, and three pounds of ſtrangers.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

IN his ſecond year, in a Parliament at Gloceſter, it was enacted, That Merchant-ſtrangers might buy and ſell in Groſs, or by Retail, within this Realm. In his third year, in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, it was ordained, that the Priviledges and Immunities of the Abbey of Weſtminſter ſhould remain inviolate; but with this Proviſo, againſt thoſe that took Sanctuary with purpoſe to defraud their Creditors, That their Lands and Goods ſhould be liable to their Debts. In his ſixth year, a Parliament was holden, in which the Mayor of London, upon ſuggeſtion that the Fiſhmongers uſed great deceit in uttering of their Fiſh, obtained to have it Enacted, That from thenceforth, none of that Company, nor of the Vintners, Grocers, Butchers, or other that ſold any proviſion of Victuals ſhould be admitted Mayor of the City: but in the Parliament next following were reſtored to their liberty again, ſaving that they might not keep Courts among themſelves, but that all tranſgreſſions of their Cuſtoms ſhould be tried at the Mayors Court. In his eleventh year, King Richard created John Beauchamp of Holt, Baron of Kederminſter, by his Letters Patents; the firſt that was ſo made: for before this time, Barons were alwayes made by calling them to Parliaments by the Kings Writ. Till this time women uſed to ride aſtride as men do.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the ſecond year of this Kings Reign, there came meſſengers from the new elected Pope Urban, to require the Kings aid againſt ſuch Cardinals as he named Schiſmaticks, that had elected another Pope, whom they named Clement: which Cardinals ſent Meſſengers likewiſe to crave his aid for them, but through perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Urban's requeſt was granted, and Clement rejected. In his fourth year, John Wickliffe ſet forth his opinion touching the Sacrament of the Altar, denying the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, in ſuch ſort as the Church of Rome did then teach. In his ſixth year, Henry Spencer, Biſhop of Norwich received Bulls from Pope Urban, to grant all priviledges of the Cruſado to all ſuch as would come over and aſſiſt him againſt the Anti-Pope Clement; which being debated in Parliament, it was after much oppoſition agreed, that it ſhould go forward: and thereupon the Biſhop not only gathered much money from ſuch as would contribute to the expedition, but drew many great Captains to go themſelves in perſon; as namely, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Farington, the Lord Henry Beaumont, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Tryvet, and divers others. The money raiſed by contribution, came to 20000. Franks, and the Army to 3000. Horſe, and 15000. Foot; with which Forces, the Biſhop paſſing over into Flanders, won the Towns of Graveling, Dunkirk, and Newport: but at laſt encountred by a mighty Army of the French, he was put to the worſt, and returned into England. In the twelfth year of this Kings Reign, an Act was made that none ſhould paſs the Seas to purchaſe promotions or proviſions (as they termed them) in any Church or Churches. Alſo in this year Thomas the late Earl of Lancaſter, by reaſon of miracles reported to be done by him, was Canonized for a Saint. At this time alſo the Wickleviſts marvellouſly increaſed, Preaching againſt Pilgrimages and Images, whoſe greateſt oppoſer was the Biſhop of Norwich. In his thirteenth year Proclamation was made, that all beneficed men abiding in the Court of Rome, ſhould return into England by a certain day, under pain of forfeiting their Benefices: and all other not Beneficed, under a certain pain likewiſe. Alſo about this time a Statute was made, that no Eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhould poſſeſs Manours, Houſes, Lands, Revenues, or Rents whatſoever at the hands of the Feoffee, without the Kings Licence and the chief Lords. In his eighteenth year, the Wickleviſts perſecuted, and Excommunication pronounced againſt them by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In this Schiſm of the two Popes, the French Clergy wrote in behalf of Clement their Pope, and ſent it into England: The Clergy of England on the contrary wrote in behalf of Pope Urban, and ſo nothing was agreed.

Works of Piety in his time.

IN the twentieth year of this Kings Reign, William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. In the third year of his Reign, John Philpot, Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements, for the which the Chamberlain payeth yearly to thirteen poor people, to every of them ſeven pence the week for ever; and as any of thoſe thirteen perſons dieth, the Mayor appointeth one to ſucceed, and the Recorder another. In the one and twentieth year of his Reign, King Richard cauſed the great Hall at Weſtminſter to be repaired, both the Walls, Windows, and Roof. In his time, Simon Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſlain by the Rebels upon Tower-Hill, built the Weſt-gate of Canterbury, and from thence to the North-gate, commonly called the long Wall. Thomas Fitz-Alan, or Arundel, being Biſhop of Ely, built the great Gate-houſe of Ely Houſe in Holborn; and being after Biſhop of Canterbury, he built a fair Spire Steeple at the Weſt end of his Church there, called to this day, Arundel Steeple, and beſtowed a tunable ring of five Bells upon the ſame.

Of Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his third year, ſo great a mortality afflicted the North parts of England, that the Countrey became almoſt deſolate. In his ſixth year; on the 24th. day of May, there happened ſo great an Earth-quake, or (as ſome write) a Water-ſhake, that it made Ships in the Havens to beat one againſt the other. In July, in the year 1389. whilſt the King was at Sheene, there ſwarmed in his Court ſuch multitudes of Flies and Gnats, skirmiſhing with one another, that in the end they were ſwept away with Brooms by heaps, and Buſhels were filled with them. In his twelfth year, in March, firſt there were terrible Windes; afterwards followed a great mortality, and after that a great dearth, that a buſhel of Wheat was ſold for thirteen pence, which was then thought a great price; for the years before it was ſold for ſix pence, and Wool was ſold for two ſhillings a ſtone. In his fourteenth year, on Chriſtmas day, a Dolphin was taken at London-Bridge, being ten foot long, and a monſtrous grown Fiſh. In his eighteenth year, an Exhalation, in likeneſs of fire appeared in the night in many places of England; which when a man went alone, went as he went, and ſtayed as he ſtayed; ſometimes like a Wheel, ſometimes like a Barrel, ſometimes like a Timber-log: but when many went together, it appeared to be afar off. Alſo in a Parliament time, there was a certain Image of Wax made by Necromancy (as was ſaid) which at an hour appointed, uttered theſe words.

The Head ſhall be cut off; the Head ſhall be lift up aloft; the feet ſhall be lift up above the Head: and then ſpake no more. This happened in the Parliament called the Marvellous Parliament, not long before the Parliament that wrought Wonders. In his one and thirtieth year, a River not far from Bedford, ſuddenly ceaſed his courſe, ſo as the channel remained dry by the ſpace of three miles; which was adjudged to ſignifie the revolting of the Subjects from their natural Prince. In his two and twentieth year, almoſt through all England, all Bay-trees withered, and afterwards grew green again; which was ſuppoſed to import ſome ſtrange event. About the year 1280. the making of Guns was found by a German, which may well be reckoned amongſt caſualties, ſeeing it was found by caſualty; for this German having beaten Brimſtone in a Mortar to powder, and covered it with a ſtone, it happened that as he ſtruck fire, a ſpark chanced to fall into the powder; which cauſed ſuch a flame out of the Mortar, that it raiſed a ſtone a great height: which after he perceived, he made a Pipe of Iron, and tempered the powder with ſome other ingredients, and ſo finiſhed that deadly Engine. The firſt that uſed it were the Venetians againſt the Inhabitants of Genoa.

Of his VVives.

KIng Richard in his time had two Wives, the firſt was Anne Daughter to the Emperour Charles the Fourth, and Siſter to the Emperour VVenceſlaus; who lived his Wife ten years, and died without iſſue at Sheene in Surrey, in the year 1392. Whoſe death King Richard took ſo heavily, that he cauſed the buildings of that Palace to be thrown down and defaced; as though to revenge himſelf upon the place, could eaſe his minde, and mitigate his ſorrow. His ſecond Wife was Iſabel, Daughter to Charles the ſixth King of France; She was married to him at eight years of age, and therefore never co-habited. After King Richard's death ſhe was ſent home, and married afterward to Charles Son and Heir to the Duke of Orleance.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was the goodlieſt perſonage of all the Kings that had been ſince the Conqueſt; tall of ſtature, of ſtreight and ſtrong limbs, fair and amiable of countenance; and ſuch a one as might well be the Son of a moſt beautiful Mother. Concerning his conditions, there was more to be blamed in his Education, then in his Nature; for there appeared in him many good inclinations, which would have grown to be abilities, if they had not been perverted by corrupt flatterers in his youth. He was of a credulous diſpoſition, diſpoſition, apt to believe, and therefore eaſie to be abuſed. His greateſt tranſgreſſion was, that he went with his friends ultra aras, where he ſhould have gone but uſque ad aras. His greateſt imbecility, that he could not diſtinguiſh between a flatterer and a friend. He ſeemed to have in him both a French Nature and an Engliſh; violent at the firſt apprehenſion, calm upon deliberation. He never ſhewed himſelf more worthy of the Government, then when he was depoſed as unworthy to Govern; for it appeared, that his Regality was not ſo dear unto him, as a private quiet life: which if he might have enjoyed, he would never have complained that Fortune had done him wrong.

Of his Death and Burial.

KIng Richard after his Reſignation, was conveyed to the Caſtle of Leeds in Kent, and from thence to Pomfret; where the common fame is, that he was ſerved with coſtly meat, like a King, but not ſuffered once to touch it, and ſo died of forced Famine: But Thomas Walſingham referreth it altogether to a voluntary piniṅg of himſelf, through grief of his misfortunes. But one Writer, well acquainted with King Richard's doings, ſaith, that King Henry ſitting one day at his Tables ſaid ſighing, Have I no faithful friend that will deliver me of him who will be my death? This ſpeech was ſpecially noted by one Sir Piers of Exton, who preſently with eight perſons in his company went to Pomfret, commanding the Eſquire that took the Aſſay before King Richard, to do ſo no more, ſaying, Let him eat now, for he ſhall not eat long. King Richard ſitting down to dinner, was ſerved without Aſſay; whereat marvelling, he demanded of his Eſquire, why he did not his duty? Sir (ſaid he) I am otherwiſe commanded by Sir Piers of Exton, who is newly come from King Henry. When King Richard heard that word, he took the Carving Knife in his hand, and ſtroke the Squire on the head, ſaying, The Devil take Henry of Lancaſter, and thee together: And with that word Sir Piers entred the Chamber, with eight armed men, every of them having a Bill in his hand. King Richard perceiving this, put the Table from him; and ſtepping to the foremoſt man, wrung the Bill out of his hands, and ſlew four of thoſe that thus came to aſſail him: but in concluſion was felled with a ſtroke of a Poll-axe, which Sir Piers gave him upon the head, with which blow he fell down dead: Though it be ſcarce credible, that a man upon his bare word, and without ſhewing any warrant, ſhould be admitted to do ſuch a fact. Sir Piers having thus ſlain him, wept bitterly: a poor amends for ſo hainous a treſpaſs. King Richard thus dead, his body was embalmed, and covered with lead, all ſave the face, and then brought to London; where it lay at Pauls three dayes together, that all men might behold it, to ſee he was dead. The Corps was after had to Langley in Buckinghamſhire, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers: but afterward by King Henry the fifth, it was removed to Weſtminſter, and there honourably entombed, with Queen Anne his Wife; and that beautiful Picture of a King, ſitting Crowned in a Chair of State, at the upper end of the Quire in S. Peters at Weſtminſter, is ſaid to be of him: although the Scots untruly write, that he eſcaped out of Priſon, and led a ſolitary and vertuous life in Scotland; and there died, and is buried (as they hold) in the Black-Friers at Sterling. He lived three and thirty years, reigned two and twenty and three months.

Starved.

Murthered.

Men of Note in this Kings time.

MEN of Valour in his time were ſo many, that to reckon them all would be a hard task; and to leave out any would be an injury: yet to give an inſtance in one, we may take John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe valour was no leſs ſeen abroad then at home: In France, in Germany, in Spain; in all which places, he left Trophies of his Victories. But of learned men, we may name theſe: William Thorne an Auguſtine Frier of Canterbury, an Hiſtoriographer; Adam Merimouth, a Canon of Pauls Church in London, who wrote two Hiſtorical Treatiſes; one intituled Chronicon 40. annorum; another Chronicon 60. annorum. William Packington ſometimes Secretary to the Black Prince, an excellent Hiſtoriographer. William Badby a Carmelite Frier, Biſhop of Worceſter, and Confeſſour to the Duke of Lancaſter: John Bourg, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge: William Sclade, a Monk of Buckfaſt Abby in Devonſhire: John Thoriſby Archbiſhop of York, Lord Chancellour of England, and a Cardinal: William Berton Chancellour of Oxford, an adverſary to Wickliffe: Philip Peplngton Abbot of Leiceſter, a Defender of Wickliffe: Walter Brit, a Scholar of Wickliff's, a Writer both in Divinity and other Arguments: John Sharp, a great adverſary to Wickliffe, who wrote many Treatiſes: Peter Pateſhul, a great favourer of Wickliffe. Marcel Ingelno, an excellent Divine, one of the firſt Teachers in the Univerſity of Heydelberg: Richard Withee a learned Prieſt, and an earneſt follower of Wickliffe: John Swaſham Biſhop of Bangor, a great adverſary to the Wickleviſts: Adam Eſton, a great Linguiſt, and a Cardinal: John Treviſe, a Corniſh man, and a ſecular Prieſt, who tranſlated the Bible: Bartholomew, De Proprietatibus Rerum; Polychronicon of Ranulph Higden, and divers other Treatiſes: John Moon, an Engliſh man, but a Student in Paris, who compiled in the French Tongue, The Romant of the Roſe; tranſlated into Engliſh by Geoffry Chaucer, and divers others.

The Romant of the Roſe tranſlated into Engliſh by Geoffry Chaucer, by whom compoſed.

THE

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE FOURTH.

Of his coming to the Crown.

Anno Dom. 1399.

AFter the Reſignation of King Richard, and the ſentence of his Depoſing openly read in Parliament, Henry Duke of Lancaſter riſeth up from his ſeat; and firſt, making the Sign of the Croſs upon his forehead and breſt, he ſaid, In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: I Henry of Lancaſter claim the Crown of England, as deſcended by right line from King Henry the third: And having thus ſpoked, he ſate down again. Upon this, the Archbiſhop conferred with the Lords, and having heard their opinions, he turned to the Commons, asking them, if they would joyn with the Lords, in chooſing Henry of Lancaſter for their King; who all with one voice cryed, Yea, Yea: whereupon going to the Duke, he bowed his knee, and taking him by the hand led him to the Royal Seat; and then began a Sermon, taking for his Text, out of the firſt Book of the Kings, cap. 9. Vir dominabitur in populo: wherein he declared what a happineſs it is to a Nation to have a King of Wiſdome and Valour, and ſhewed the Duke of Lancaſter to be ſuch a one; and as much the defects in both, of the late King Richard. The Sermon ended, the King thanked them all for his Election; and teſtified to them, that he meant not to take advantage againſt any mans eſtate, as coming in by Conqueſt: but that every one ſhould freely enjoy his own, as in times of lawful ſucceſſion. And now a time was appointed for his Coronation; and accordingly, upon the 13 day of October following, the very day wherein the year before he had been baniſhed, he was Crowned at Weſtminſter, by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with all Rights and Ceremonies accuſtomed. At his Coronation he was anointed with an Oyl which a religious man had given to Henry the firſt Duke of Lancaſter, together with this Propheſie, That the Kings anointed with this Oyl, ſhould be the Champions of the Church. This Oyl coming to the hands of King Richard, as he was looking amongſt his jewels, going then into Ireland, he was deſirous to be anointed with it, but that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury told him, it was not lawful to be anointed twice: whereupon putting it up again, at his coming afterwards to Flint, the Archbiſhop got it of him, and kept it till the Coronation of King Henry, who was the firſt King of the Realm that was anointed with it. The day before the Coronation, the King in the Tower made one and forty, ſome ſay but twelve Knights of the Bath, whereof four were his own Sons, Henry, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, all then alive; and with them, three Earls, and five Barons. Upon the Feaſt-day, many claimed Offices, as belonging to their Tenures, to which, upon ſhewing their right, they were admitted. And now the King made divers new Officers: The Earl of Northumberland he made Conſtable of England; the Earl of Weſtmerland was made Lord Marſhal; Sir John Serle, Chancellour; John Newbery Eſquire, Treaſurer: and Sir Richard Clifford was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal. The Lord Henry his eldeſt Son, being then about thirteen years of age, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, and Earl Cheſter, and ſoon after alſo Duke of Aquitain: and the Crown was by Parliament Entailed to King Henry, and the Heirs of his body lawfully begotten.

King Henry claims the Crown as deſcended from King Henry the third.

He is Crowned the very day wherein the year before he had been baniſhed.

Anointed with a ſpecial Oyl.

After this a Parliament is holden, in which the Acts made in the eleventh year of King Richard were revived, and the Acts made in his one and twentieth year were wholly repealed; and they who by that Parliament were attainted, were reſtored to their Lands and Honours: whereupon Richard Earl of Warwick was delivered out of Priſon, and the Earl of Arundel's ſon recovered his Inheritance; and many other alſo that were baniſhed, or impriſoned by King Richard, were then fully reſtored to their liberty and eſtates. Alſo the King gave to the Earl of VVeſtmerland the County of Richmond and to the Earl of Northumberland the Iſle of Man, to be holden of him by bearing the ſword wherewith he entred into England. And now was the time for ſhewing of ſpleens. Sir John Bagot then Priſoner in the Tower, accuſed the Earl of Aumerle for ſpeaking words againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, now King: alſo the Lord Fitz-water accuſed him for the death of the Duke of Gloceſter. The Lord Morley appealed the Earl of Salisbury of Treaſon; and one Hall accuſed the Duke of Exeter, for conſpiring the death of John of Gaunt the King's Father: but King Henry having entred a Throne in a ſtorm, was willing now to have a calm; and therefore laying aſide the ones Accuſations, he accepted of the others Excuſes, and received Accuſations againſt many, but connived at by the King.

ceived the Duke of Aumerle, and the Duke of Exeter into as much favour, as if they had never been accuſed.

King Henry acquaints foreign Princes by what Title he came to the Crown.

And to qualifie the hard opinion which forein Princes might conceive of King Richard's Depoſing, he ſent Ambaſſadours into divers Countreys, to make it known, by what title, and by what favour of the people he came to the Kingdom. To the Court of Rome he ſent John Trenevant Biſhop of Hereford, Sir John Cheyny Knight, and John Cheyny Eſquire: into France he ſent Walter Sherlow Biſhop of Durham, and Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter: Into Spain he ſent John Trevor Biſhop of Aſaph, and Sir William Parre: and into Germany he ſent the Biſhop of Bangor, and certain others. Moſt of theſe Princes ſeemed either not to regard what was done, or were eaſily perſwaded that all was done well: only Charles King of France was ſo diſtemper'd with this indignity offered to his ſon in Law King Richard, that by violence of his paſſion he fell into his old pangs of Erenſie; but ſomewhat recovered, he reſolved to revenge it; wherein many Lords of France ſhewed themſelves forward, but ſpecially the Earl of St. Paul, who had married King Richard's half ſiſter: yet having prepared an Army in readineſs, when afterward they heard of King Richard's death, they diſſolved it again, as conſidering the time was then paſt. The Aquitains alſo, and ſpecially the Citizens of Burdeaux, as being the place where King Richard was born, were mightily incenſed: but Sir Robert Knolls Lieutenant of Guyen, and afterward Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter, being ſent to them by the King, ſo perſwaded them, that with much ado they continued in obedience.

It was about this time moved in Parliament, what ſhould be done with King Richard, (for he was not as yet murthered:) whereupon Thomas Mercks Biſhop of Carlile, a learned man and wiſe; and who had never given allowance to the depoſing of King Richard, now that he was in a place of freedome of ſpeech, roſe up and ſaid:

The Biſhop of Carlile's bold ſpeech in behalf of King Richard, and againſt King Henry.

"My Lords, The matter now propounded "is of marvellous weight and conſequence; "wherein there are two points chiefly to be "conſidered: the firſt, Whether King Richard "be ſufficiently put out of his Throne: the ſe- "cond, Whether the Duke of Lancaſter be "lawfully taken in. For the firſt, how can that "be ſufficiently done, when there is no power "ſufficient to do it? The Parliament cannot, "for of the Parliament the King is the head; "and can the body put down the Head? You "will ſay, But the head may bow it ſelf down; "and may the King reſign? It is true; but "what force is in that which is done by force? "and who knows not that King Richard's Re- "ſignation was no other? But ſuppoſe he be "ſufficiently out, yet how comes the Duke of "Lancaſter to be lawfully in? If you ſay by "Conqueſt, you ſpeak Treaſon; for what Con- "queſt without Arms? and can a Subject take "Arms againſt his lawful Soveraign, and not "be Treaſon? If you ſay, by Election of the "State, you ſpeak not reaſon; for what power "hath the State to elect, while any is living "that hath right to Succeed? But ſuch a Suc- "ceſſour is not the Earl of Lancaſter, as deſcen- "ded from Edmund Crouchback, the elder ſon "of King Henry the Third, though put by the "Crown for deformity of his body; for who "knows not the falſneſs of this allegation? "ſeeing it is a thing Notorious, that this Edmund "was neither the elder brother, nor yet crook- "backt, (though called ſo for ſome other rea- "ſon) but a goodly perſonage, and without a- "ny deformity. And your ſelves cannot for- "get a thing ſo lately done, who it was that in "the fourth year of King Richard was decla- "red by Parliament to be Heir to the Crown, "in caſe King Richard ſhould die without iſſue. "But why then is not that claim made? becauſe "Silent leges inter arma, What diſputing of Ti- "tles againſt the ſtream of Power? But how- "ſoever it is extreme injuſtice, that King Ri- "chard ſhould be condemned, without being "heard, or once allowed to make his de- "fence. And now, my Lords, I have ſpoken "thus at this time, that you may conſider of it "before it be too late; for as yet it is in your "power to undo that juſtly, which you have "unjuſtly done.

Much to this purpoſe was the Biſhop's ſpeech; but to as little purpoſe as if he had gone about to call back Yeſterday. The mater was too far gone; and ſcarce a perſon there preſent, that had not a hope of either a private or a publick benefit by that which was done. Yet againſt this ſpeech of the Biſhop there was neither Proteſting nor Excepting; It paſſed in the Houſe as but one mans opinion: And as for the King, it was neither fit he ſhould uſe much ſeverity againſt any Member of that Parliament which had ſo lately ſhewed ſo much indulgence towards him; nor indeed ſafe, to be too hot in his Puniſhment, when he was yet ſcarce warm in his Government. Yet for a warning to uſe their liberty of ſpeech with more moderation hereafter, the Biſhop was arreſted by the Marſhal, and committed to priſon in the Abbey of S. Albans, but afterward without further cenſure ſet at liberty, till upon a conſpiracy of Lords, wherein he was a party, he was condemned to dye, though through extremity of grief he prevented execution. But as for King Richard, and Edward Mortimer Earl of March, enough was ſpoken by the Biſhop in both their behalfs to undo them both; and indeed King Richard was ſoon after made away: the Earl ſecured himſelf by retiring far off, to his Lordſhip of Wigmore; avoiding the danger of Contention, by not entring the Liſts of Aſpiring. But although the Divine Providence, for cauſes hidden from humane knowledge, gave way at this time to the advancement of the younger, the Houſe of Lancaſter; yet in the third Generation after, the elder, the Houſe of Clarence recovered its right in King Edward the Fourth: that we may know it is but ſtaying the leiſure of Heaven, for every one to have his Right, either in Perſon, or by Proxie.

But did King Richard more hurt then good.

But whether incited by this ſpeech of the Biſhop, or otherwiſe out of the rancor of envy in ſome, and malice in others, it was not long after, before there grew in the minds of many both Lords and other, a malignant inclination towards towards King Henry; and came first to be a Conspiracy in the House of the Abbot of Westminster. This Abbot was a kinde of a Book-statesman, but better read in the Politicks of Aristotle then of Solomon; who remembring some words of King Henry, which he had spoken long before, when he was but Earl of Darby, That Princes had too little, and Religious men too much; and fearing, lest being now King, he should reduce his words into act, he thought it better to use preventing Physick beforehand, then to stand to the hazard of a curing afterward: and thereupon invited to his house the discontented Lords; as namely, John Holland Duke of Exeter, Thomas Holland his brothers son, Duke of Surrey, Edward Duke of Aumerle, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Spencer Earl of Gloucester, John Bishop of Carlile, Sir Thomas Blunt, and Maudlin one of King Richard's Chappel: who after dinner conferring together, and communicating their spleens against King Henry one with another, they resolved at last, both to take away the Kings life, and of the way how to do it. The device was this: They would publish a solemn Justs to be holden at Oxford, at a day appointed, and invite the King to honour it with his presence; and there, in the time of acting the Justs, when all mens intentions should be otherwise busied, they would have him be murthered. This device was resolved on; Oaths for secrecy were taken; and Indentures sextipartite for performing conditions agreed upon between them, sealed and delivered: The Justs are proclaimed; the King is invited, and promiseth to come; secrecy of all hands kept most firmly to the very day. But though all other kept counsel, yet Fortune would not, but she discovered all; For it fortuned, that as the Duke of Aumerle was riding to the Lords at Oxford, against the day appointed, he took it in the way to go visit his Father the Duke of York; and having in his bosome the Indenture of Confederacy, his Father as they sate at dinner chanced to spy it, and asked what it was? to whom his son answering, It was nothing that any way concerned him; By S. George saith his Father, but I will see it; and therewithal snatching it from him, read it; and finding the Contents, and reviling his son for being now the second time a Traitor, before to King Richard, and now to King Henry, he commanded his Horses instantly to be made ready, and with all the speed he could make, rode to Windsor, where the King then lay: but the younger years of his son out-rid him, and came to the Court before him; where locking the Gates, and taking the Keys from the Porter, pretending some special reason, he went up to the King and falling on his knees, asked his Pardon, The King demanding, for what offence? he then discovered the whole Plot: which he had scarce done, when his Father came rapping at the Court-gates, and coming to the King, shewed him the Indenture of Confederacy which he had taken from his son. This, though it amazed the King, yet it informed him of the truth of the matter, whereof he was before doubtful; and thereupon lays aside his journey to see the Justings of others in jest, and takes care that he be not justled in earnest out of his Throne himself. In the mean time the confederate Lords being ready at Oxford, and hearing nothing of the Duke of Aumerle, nor seeing any preparation for the Kings coming, were certainly perswaded that their Treason was discovered. Whereupon falling into consideration of the case they were in, they found there was no place left for them of Mercy; and therefore were to stand upon their Guard, and provide the best they could for their safety. To which purpose, the first thing they did was to apparel Maudlin in Princely Robes, a man as like to King Richard in countenance and personage, as one man lightly can be to another; and to give forth that he was King Richard escaped out of Prison, thereby to countenance their proceedings: The next thing was to dispatch messengers to the King of France, and require his assistance. This done they set forward in Battel-array towards Windsor, against King Henry; but finding him gone to London before they came, they then deliberated what course to take: Some advised to set King Richard at liberty before their counterfeit Richard should be discovered: Others thought best to follow the King to London, and set upon him unprovided, and before he had gathered Forces. In this division of Advices, when they could not do both, they did neither; but as men amazed, marched on, though they knew not well whither, till they came to Colbrook: by which time the King had gathered an Army of twenty thousand, and was marching towards them: but they not thinking so well of their cause, that they durst put it to the trial of a battel; or perhaps staying for aid out of France, withdrew themselves back to Sunnings near to Reading, where the young Queen lay: to whom their coming gave some flashes of comfort, but quenched before they were throughly kindled: and from thence they march to Cicester, where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury took up their lodging in one Inne; the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Gloucester in another. And now a strange Accident, beyond the reach of all consultation, gave a period to their Design; for who would think that a private company durst oppose those Lords having their Army so near them? Yet the Bayliff of the Town upon Intelligence (no doubt that these Lords were up in Arms against the King,) taking with him a company of Townsmen, in the night assaulted the Inne where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury lay; who thus assaulted made shift to defend themselves till three a clock in the afternoon: but then, being in danger to be taken, a Priest one of their company, set divers houses in the Town on fire, thinking thereby to divert the Assailants from prosecuting the Lords, to save their houses: but this inflamed them the more; and so hotly they pursued their assault, that they wounded the Duke and the Earl to death; who dying that night their heads were stricken off and sent up to London. With them also were taken, Sir Bennet Shelly, Sir Bernard Brocas, Sir Thomas Blunt, and eight and twenty other Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who were sent to Oxford, where the King then lay,

A Conspiracy of Lords, begun in the house of the Abbot of Westminster

Which was to invite the King to a Justs at Oxford, and there to seize upon him.

How discovered.

The Lords provide an Army, but are by the the King dispersed.

By what accident.

day, and there were put to execution. The Duke of Exeter in the other Inne, hearing of this assault, fled out of the backside towards the Camp, intending to bring the whole Army to the rescue; but the souldiers having heard a clamour, and seeing fire in the Town, supposing the King had been come with all his Forces, out of a sudden fear dispersed themselves and fled: which the Duke seeing, he also with Sir John Shelly, fled into Essex, where wandring and lurking in secret places, he was at last apprehended as he sate at supper in a friends house, and led to Plashey, and there shortly after beheaded, the place, where by his counsel and countenance, the Duke of Gloucester formerly had been apprehended: That we may observe how the Divine Providence in revenging of injuries, takes notice, and makes use of the very circumstance of place where the injuries are done. The Earl of Gloucester fled towards Wales, but was taken and beheaded at Bristow. Maudlin the counterfeit King Richard, was apprehended and brought to the Tower, and afterward hanged and quartered; with Mr. Fereby, another of King Richard's Chaplains. Divers other Lords, and Knights, and Gentlemen, and a great number of mean persons, were in other places put to death; that so much Noble blood, at one time, and for one cause, hath scarce been heard or read of. The Abbot of Westminster, in whose house the plot was contrived, hearing of these misfortunes, as he was going between the Monastery and his Mansion, fell suddenly into a Palsie; and shortly after, without speech, ended his life. About this time also, a strange piece of Treason is reported to have been practiced againg the Kings life: that there was found in his bed-cloaths an Iron with three sharp pikes standing upright; that when the King should have laid him down, he might have thrust himself upon them. But seeing there is no farther mention of inquiring after it; it seems to have been but an idle rumour not worth believing.

Maudlin the counterfeit King Richard is hanged and quartered.

Another Treason is practiced against the King.

1402.

But now that the hot English blood was well allayed, the Welsh blood springs up as hot; For now Owen Glendour an Esquire of Wales, brought up at the Innes of Court in London: partly out of a desire to revenge a wrong done him (as he conceived) in a suit for lands in controversie between the Lord Grey of Ruthin and him; but chiefly out of an humour of aspiring, endeavoured to draw the Welshmen to a general defection, telling them, that the English being at variance amongst themselves, now was the time to shake off their yoak, and to resume their own ancient Laws and Customs. To whose perswasions the Welsh men hearkening, made him their King and Captain; and he having gotten a competent Army, sets first upon his old Adversary Reynold Lord Grey of Ruthin, and takes him prisoner; yet with promise of releasement, if he would marry his daughter, which offer though the Lord Grey at first not only refused, but scorned: yet out of necessity at last he was contented to accept; when notwithstanding his deceitful Father in law trifled out the time of his enlargement till he died. But the Welshmen growing confident upon this success, break into the borders of Herefordshire, making spoil and prey of the Countrey as freely if they had leave to do it; for indeed none opposed them but only the Lord Edmund Mortimer, who had formerly withdrawn himself to his Castle at Wigmore; and having assembled the forces of the Countrey, and joyning battel with them, was taken Prisoner, and then fettered and cast into a deep and vile Dungeon. It was thought if Glendour had as well known how to use his victory, as to get it, he might at this time have put the English yoak into a great hazard to be shaken off: but he having killed 1000. of the English, thought he had done enough for that time, and so giving over the pursuit, retired. The inhumanity of the Welsh Women was here memorable, who fell upon the dead carkasses of the English, first stripping them, and then cutting off their privy parts and noses; whereof the one they thrust into their mouths, the other they pressed between their buttocks. Many noble men, specially his Kinsmen the Piercies solicited King Henry to deliver Mortimer; but the King was deaf of that ear, he could rather have wished both him and his two Sisters in Heaven, for then he should be free from conceal'd Competitors.

Owen Glendour stirreth up the Welsh to rebel.

These affronts were at this time suffered in the Welsh, because the King was now imployed in a more dangerous service with the Scots; for they taking advantage of the distraction in the Kingdom (as it was alwayes their custom to do) had made an In-rode into the County of Northumberland; and suddenly one night set upon the Castle of Werk, took and spoiled it, and then returned. In revenge whereof, the English invaded and spoiled certain Islands of the Orkneys. Then the Scots set forth a Fleet, under the conduct of Sir Robert Logon; but before he came to any action, he was encountred, and the greatest part of his Fleet taken. But these were but such affronts, as often happen between troublesome neighbours; for all this while the Peace was still in being between the Nations: but at last it brake out into an open war upon this occasion. Robert King of Scots had offered to match his Son David with a Daughter of George Earl of Dunbarre, and had received money of him in part of her portion; and afterward, would neither suffer the Match to proceed, nor yet pay back the money: but married his son to a daughter of Archibald Earl of Dowglass. Upon which indignity, George of Dunbarre, flies into England to King Henry, and with his aid, makes divers incurlions into Scotland: Whereupon Robert King of Scots sent to King Henry, that if he would have the Truce between them to continue, he should deliver to him George of Dunbarre. King Henry answered, that he had given him a safe conduct, and could not now recall it with his Honour; but as for continuing the Truce, King Robert might do in that what he thought best. Upon this answer, the King of Scots presently proclaimed warr against him; But King Henry as ready in that matter as he, stayed not for King Robert's invading of England: but himself with a puissant Army invaded Scotland, burning Castles and Cities, and not sparing Churches and Religious Houses. About the

the end of September, he beſieged the Caſtle of Maydens in Edinburgh; where Prince David, and the Earl of Douglaſs were: At which time, Robert D. of Albany, who in the King of Scots ſickneſs managed the buſineſs, ſent an Herald to K. Henry, proteſting upon his honour, that if he would ſtay but ſix dayes he would give him battel. K. Henry rewarded the Herald, and ſtayed; but ſix times ſix dayes paſſed, but neither Duke of Albany, nor any other for him appeared. And now Winter came on, victuals grew ſcant, and which was worſt, a mortality began in the Engliſh Camp; for which cauſes, King Henry removed his ſiege, and returned into England. As ſoon as he was gone, Sir Patrick Hepborne a Scottiſh man, having a good opinion of his valour, thought to do great matters; and with a competent Army of the men of Lough-dean, he invaded Northumberland, making great ſpoil, and loading his ſouldiers with prey, and priſoners: but in the Retreat marching looſly, and licentiouſly, was ſet upon by the Earl of Northumberland Vice-Warden, at a Town called Neſhie, where Hepborne himſelf and all the flower of Lough-dean were ſlain; Sir John and William Cockburne, Sir Will. Buſſe, John and Tho. Hablington, Eſquires, and a multitude of common Souldiers taken Priſoners: on the Engliſh part few ſlain, and none of any rank or quality. In revenge whereof Archibald Douglaſs with an Army of twenty thouſand entred Northumberland; but in a place called Hamildon, were encountered by the Engliſh, under the leading of Henry L. Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpurre, and George Earl of March, who put them to flight; and after the ſlaughter of ten thouſand of them, took five hundred priſoners: whereof the chief were Mordack Earl of Fife, (ſon of the General, who in the fight loſt one of his eyes) Thomas Earl of Murrey, Robert Earl of Angus, the Earls of Athol and Mentith; and amongſt the ſlain, were Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gourdon, Sir John Leviſton, Sir Alexander Ramſey, and three and twenty other Knights.

The French aid Owen Glendour, but without ſucceſs.

In this mean time, Glendour of Wales had ſolicited the King of France for aid, who ſent him twelve hundred men of quality; but the windes were ſo contrary, that they loſt twelve of their Ships, and the reſt returned home. The Engliſh deriding this ill ſucceſs of the French, ſo exaſperated the French King, that preſently after he ſent twelve thouſand, who landed ſafely, and joyned with the Welſh; but as ſoon as they heard of the Engliſh Armies approach, whether miſtruſting their own ſtrength, or ſuſpecting the Welſh mens faithfulneſs, they ran to their Ships and diſgracefully went home.

King Henry marries the Lady Jane de Navarre, the relict of John Montford ſurnamed the Conquerour.

King Henry's Ambaſſadors lately ſent into Britain to fetch the Lady Jane de Navarre, Dutcheſs of Britain, the relict of John de Montford ſurnamed the Conquerour, with whom the King by Procurators had contracted Matrimony, in the beginning of February returned with her in ſafety: The King met her at Wincheſter, where the ſeventh of February the marriage was ſolemnized.

About this time ſome affronts were offered by the French. Valerian Earl of S. Paul, with ſeventeen hundred men, landed in the Iſle of Wight, where he burnt two Villages and ſome few Cottages; but hearing the people of the Iſland to have aſſembled, he made haſte to his Ships, and returned home. Alſo John Earl of Clermont (the heir of Bourbon) won from the Engliſh the Caſtles of St. Peter, St. Mary, and the New-Caſtle: The Lord de la Brett, won the Caſtle of Calaſin; places of great conſequence to the Engliſh.

Another conſpiracy hatching againſt King Henry, and why.

And now to make King Henry ſenſible that a Crown can hardly ever ſit eaſie upon the head, if it be not ſet on right at firſt, a new Conſpiracy is hatching againſt him. The Piercies Earls of Northumberland & Worceſter, with Henry Hotſpur, began about this time to fall off from K. Henry; their reaſon was, Firſt, becauſe the King at their requeſt refuſed to redeem their kinſman Mortimer from Glendour's ſlavery; and then becauſe he denied them the benefit of ſuch priſoners as they had taken of the Scots, at Hamildon, or Neſhie: whereupon they went of themſelves, and procured Mortimer's delivery, and then entred into a League offenſive and defenſive with Glendour; and by their Proxies, in the houſe of the Archdeacon of Bangor, they agreed upon a Tripartite Indenture under their hands and ſeals, to divide the Kingdom into three parts; whereby all England from Severn and Trent, South and Eaſtward was aſſigned for the portion of the E. of March: all Wales and the lands beyond Severn Weſtward, were aſſigned to Owen Glendour; and all the remainder of Land from Trent Northward, to be the portion of the Lord Piercy. In this, as Glendour perſwaded them, they thought they ſhould accompliſh a Propheſie; as though King Henry were the Mould-warp curſed of Gods own mouth; and they were the Lion, the Dragon and the Wolf which ſhould divide the Land among them. In this mean time King Henry, not acquainted with this Conſpiracy, cauſed a Proclamation to be made, intimating that the Earl of March had voluntarily cauſed himſelf to be taken Priſoner, to the end, the Rebels having him in their cuſtody, might pretend ſome colour for their Conſpiracy; and therefore he had ſmall reaſon to take care for his deliverance. Hereupon the Piercies aſſiſted with a company of Scots, and drawing to their party the Earl of Stafford, and Richard Scroope Archbiſhop of York and many other, purpoſed to joyn with the Captain of the Welſh; but firſt they framed certain Articles againſt the King, and ſent them to him in writing. That he had falſifyed his Oath given at his landing, ſwearing that he came but only to recover his Inheritance, and would not meddle with the King, or with the Crown. That moſt traiterouſly he had taken Arms againſt his Soveraign Lord, impriſoned him, and then moſt barberouſly cauſed him to be murthered. That ever ſince the death of King Richard he had unjuſtly kept the Crown from his kinſman Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, to whom of right it belonged. That upon no occaſion he had impoſed divers Taxes upon the people. That by his Letters he procured Burgeſſes and Knights of the Parliament to be choſen; for which cauſes and many other, they defied him, and vowed his deſtruction, and the reſtoring of the Earl of March to his right. King Henry could not but know that all theſe Articles againſt him were true; yet ſeeing the knowing it hindred him not from ſeeking to get the Crown when he had it not, it could leſs hinder him from ſeeking to keep it now that he had it: and if he were able, being a private man, to get it from a King, he was likely to be more able, being now a King, to keep it from private men; and as for any objections that Conſcience could make, he had enough to anſwer them all: For, if his Title were good againſt King Richard, by his Reſignation, it was good againſt Mortimer by his ſwearing Allegiance; and upon theſe grounds, with a minde as confident as if all circumſtances were of his ſide, he raiſed an Army, and marched towards the Lords, taking care they might by no means joyn with the Welſh, and about Shrewsbury on Saturday S. Mary Magdalens Eve he encountred them: in which fight though the Scots and Henry Hot-ſpur ſhewed much valour, yet the victory reſted on the Kings ſide; Hotſpur himſelf was ſlain, the Earl of Worceſter was taken priſoner, together with Sir Richard Vernon, Sir Theobald Truſſel, the Baron of Kinderton; and the reſt fled. On the Kings part (beſides the Earl of Stafford, who had that morning revolted from the Conſpirators) were ſlain, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Cockayn, Sir Nicholas Cauſell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverley, Sir John Maſſie of Puddington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, and Sir Robert Gauſell, all which had been but that morning dubbed Knights, with Sir Thomas Wendſley, who dyed afterwards of his wounds; of common ſouldiers about ſixteen hundred, but of the Conſpirators above ſix thouſand, whereof 36 the King ſlew with his own hands; but was once unhorſed by Dowglaſſe, who in his preſence ſlew Sir Walter Blunt, with divers others, that day in all things attired like to the King; for which exploit, Dowglaſſe (being after by the fall of his horſe taken priſoner) was by the Kings command carefully attended, and without ranſome ſet at liberty. In this battel, the young Prince Henry, though wounded in the face with an Arrow; yet was not wounded in his courage, but continued fighting ſtill. After this victory the King cauſed publick thanks to be given to God, and then cauſed the Earl of Worceſter to be beheaded, and many others of that Rebellion to be drawn, hanged and quartered, and their heads placed on London Bridge: And then the King ſent his Son Henry Prince of VVales, with his whole Army into that Countrey; but before his coming Owen Glendour was abandoned by all his Company: and lurking in the Woods was there famiſhed: many of his aſſociates were taken and put to death. Whileſt the Prince was in VVales, Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, of his own accord, came and ſubmitted himſelf to the King, proteſting his innocency, as not being once acquainted with any intent of Treaſon and Rebellion; whoſe excuſe the King received for the preſent with gentle language, the rather for that he had the poſſeſſion of Berwick Caſtle and other places of ſtrength in his power: but yet he wiped not off the ſcore of his miſdemeanors out of his minde.

Owen Glendour lurking in the Woods, is famiſhed.

And now with the fourth year of his Reign ended all the great Troubles of this King Henry the fourth: thoſe that follow are but ſuch accidents as are frequent in all times both abroad and at home. The Britains under the leading of the Lord of Du Caſtile, ſpoiled the Town of Plimouth, In revenge whereof, the Weſtern-men, under command of VVilliam VVilford, ſet forth a Fleet, which arriving in Britain, took forty Ships laden with Oyl and Wines, and burnt forty more. Again the French landed a thouſand men in the Iſle of VVight, where they got together a great booty of Cattel; but the Iſlanders coming upon them took away their booty, and made many of them leave their Carkaſes for a booty to the Iſland. Yet the French would not leave ſo, but a while after, as having gotten new ſpirits, they caſt Anchor before the Iſle of Wight; and require no leſs then to have the Iſland into their poſſeſſion: but a reſolute anſwer of the Iſlanders frighted them away, and made them glad they were gone. Soon after this the Duke of Orleance, brother to the French King, in a vaunting ſtyle, ſent a challenge to King Henry to meet him in the field, each of them to have a hundred in his Company: to which the King anſwered, that for his own valour it had ſufficiently been tried, and for this challenge of the Dukes, neither the perſon nor the cauſe were worthy of his undertaking. Upon this refuſal of the Kings, divers taunts and jeers were bandied between them, till at laſt the Duke in great paſſion, falls upon Vergie a Town in Guyen, but after three months aſſaulting it, being valiantly defended by Sir Robert Antfield and three hundred Engliſh men, he was glad to give over with loſs, and return into France. Preſently upon this the Admiral of Britain, accompanied with the Lord Du Caſtile, and thirty ſail of Ships, attempted to land at Dertmouth in Devonſhire, but were repelled, and the Lord Du Caſtile, and two of his Brothers, and four hundred of his men were ſlain, beſides two hundred taken priſoners; of whom the L. Baquevile Marſhal of Britain, was one. After this five hundred men of arms, five hundred Croſs-Bows, and a thouſand Flemmings, under the conduct of the Earl of St. Paul, laid ſiege to the Caſtle of Marck, three leagues from Callice; but firſt by Sir Philip Hall Captain of Callice, and after by Sir Richard Aſton Lieutenant of the Engliſh pale, they were forced to retire and flie: The Earl of St. Paul eſcaped to S. Omers, but left many of his men of quality behinde him, and more taken Priſoners. After this, Thomas D. of Clarence, the Kings ſecond Son, and the Earl of Kent, with competent Forces entred the Haven of Sluce, where they burnt four Ships riding at Anchor, and returned to the relief of Callice, beſieged at that time by the French; and in the way took three Carricks of Genoua richly laden, and brought them into the Chamber of Rye. And theſe were the troubles of this King abroad. About this time a Parliament was aſſembled at Coventry; which by ſome was called, the Lay-mens Parliament, becauſe the Sheriffs were appointed, that none ſhould be choſen Knights for the Counties, nor Burgeſſes for the Cities and Towns, that had any skill in the Laws of the Land.

1404.

The Duke of Orleance ſends a challenge to King Henry: and how he anſwers it.

But now at home the Reliques of the former Northern Rebellion began to revive; for now Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland, Richard Scroop Archbiſhop of York, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marſhal, the Lords, Haſtings, Faulconbridge, and Bardolf, with divers others, conſpired at a time appointed, to meet upon Yorks-Would Downs, and there bid defiance to King Henry. Articles of Grievances were framed, and ſet up in all publick places, which drew multimultitudes to be partakers of the enterprize. But now Ralph Nevil Earl of Weſtmerland, with the Lord John the Kings third Son, the Lord Henry Fitz-Hughes, Ralph Evers, and Robert Humphrevile make head againſt them; and coming into a Plain in the Foreſt of Galltree, they ſate down right againſt the Archbiſhop and his Forces, which were twenty thouſand; and Weſtmerland perceiving the Enemies Forces to be far more then theirs, he uſed this Policy: he ſent to the Archbiſhop, demanding the reaſon why he would raiſe Forces againſt the King? who anſwering, that his Arms were not againſt the King, but for his own defence, whom the King upon the inſtigation of Sycophants, had threatned: withal he ſent him a ſcrowl of their grievance, which Weſtmerland read, and ſeemed to approve, and thereupon deſired a conference with him. The Archbiſhop more credulous then wiſe, perſwaded the Earl Marſhal to go with him to the place appointed to confer. The Articles are read and allowed of; and thereupon Weſtmerland ſeeming to commiſerate the Souldiers, having been in armour all day, and weary, wiſhed the Archbiſhop to acquaint his party, as he would his, with this their mutual agreement; and ſo ſhaking hands, in moſt Courtly friendſhip drank unto him. Whereupon the Souldiers were willed to diſband, and repair home; which they had no ſooner done, but a Troop of Horſe, which in a colourable manner had made a ſhew to depart, wheeled about, and afterward returned: and being come in ſight of the Earl of Weſtmerland, arreſted both the Archbiſhop and the Earl Marſhal, and brought them both Priſoners to the King at Pomfret; who paſſing from thence to York, the Priſoners likewiſe were carried thither, and the next day both of them beheaded. At Durham the Lords Haſtings and Fauconbridge, with two Knights, were executed. Northumberland, with the Lord Bardolfe, fled firſt to Berwick, and after into Scotland, where they were entertained by David Lord Flemming: whereupon the King gave ſummons to the Caſtle of Berwick, which at firſt they refuſed to obey, but upon the planting & diſcharging of a Piece, they preſently yielded without compoſition: and here William Grayſtock, Henry Baynton, and John Blinkenſop, Knights, and five other were preſently put to execution, and many others committed to ſeveral Priſons. About this time James Son and Heir of Robert King of Scotland, a childe of nine years old, attended by the Earl of Orkney, as he was ſailing into France, was taken by certain Mariners of Norfolk, who brought him to the King at Windſor, the 30. of March, 1408. and the King ſent them to the Tower of London.

Northumberland and Bardolfe, after they had been in Wales, France, and Flanders, to raiſe a power againſt King Henry, returned back into Scotland; and after a year with a great power of Scots entred England, and came into Yorkſhire, making great ſpoil and waſte as they paſſed: but Sir Thomas Rokesby Sheriff of York, levying the forces of the County, upon Bramham-moor gave them Battel; in which Northumberland was ſlain, Bardolfe taken, but wounded to death, and the reſt put to flight. About this time alſo, Sir Robert Umphrevile Vice-Admiral of England, with ten men of War entred Scotland, burnt their Gallot, and many other ſhips over againſt Leith, and brought away with him fourteen tall Ships laden with Corn and other ſtaple commodities, which at his return he ſent into the Markets round about; and thereby brought down the prices of all things, and purchaſed to himſelf the name of Mend-market.

The Prince had been a ſtudent in Queens Colledge in Oxford, under the tuition of his Unkle Henry Beaufort, Chancellour of that Univerſity, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln and Wincheſter, and laſtly made a Cardinal, by the title of Euſebius. From Oxford the Prince was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Piercy Earl of Worceſter was made his governour: but coming afterward to be at his own diſpoſing, whether being by nature valorous, and yet not well ſtayed by time and experience; or whether incited by ill companions, and emboldened by the opinion of his own greatneſs, he ran into many courſes ſo unworthy of a Prince, that it was much doubted what he would prove when he came to be King once. It is ſaid he lay in wait for the Receivers of his Fathers Rents, and in the perſon of a thief ſet upon them and robbed them. Another time, when one of his companions was arraigned for felony before the Lord Chief Juſtice, he went to the Kings Bench Bar and offered to take the Priſoner away by force; but being withſtood by the L. Chief Juſtice, he ſtepped to him, and ſtruck him over the face: whereat the Judge nothing abaſhed, roſe up and told him, that he did not this affront to him, but to the King his Father, in whoſe place he ſate; and therefore to make him know his fault, he commanded him to be committed to the Fleet. You would have wondered to ſee how calm the Prince was in his own cauſe, who in the cauſe of his companion had been ſo violent; for he quietly obeyed the Judges ſentence, and ſuffered himſelf to be led to Priſon. This paſſage was not a little pleaſing to the King, to think that he had a Judge of ſuch courage, and a Son of ſuch ſubmiſſion: but yet for theſe and ſuch other pranks he removed him from being Preſident of the Council, and placed in it his third Son John. This made the Prince ſo ſenſible of his Father's diſpleaſure, that he thought it neceſſary to ſeek by all means to recover his good opinion; which he endeavoured to do by a way as ſtrange as that by which he loſt it; for attiring himſelf in a garment of blue Sattin, wrought all with elyt-holes of black ſilk, at every hole the needle hanging, by which it was ſowed, and about his arm a thing in faſhion of a hounds collar, ſtudded with SS. of Gold, he came to the Court at Weſtminſter: to whom the King (though not well in health) cauſed himſelf, in a Chair, to be brought into his Privy Chamber; where in preſence of but three or four of his Privy Council, he demanded of the Prince the cauſe of his unwonted habit and coming? who anſwered, That being not only his ſubject but his ſon, and a ſon ſo tenderly alwayes regarded by him, he were worthy of a thouſand deaths, if he ſhould intend or but imagine, the leaſt offence to his ſacred Majeſty; and therefore had fitted himſelf to be made a ſacrifice: and therewithal reached his dagger, holding it by the point to his Father, For (ſaid he) I deſire not to live longer, then I may be thought to be what I am and ſhall ever be, your faithful and obedient Vaſſal. With this or the like anſwer, the King was ſo moved, that he fell upon his Sons neck, and with many tears imbracing him, confeſſed that his ears had been too open to receive reports againſt him, and promiſing faithfully, that from thenceforth no reports ſhould cauſe any dif-affection towards him. The King about this time, made his Son John, Duke of Bedford, and his Son Humfrey, Duke of Glocester; he made alſo Sir Thomas Beaufort Earl of Dorſet, and the Earl of Arundel he created Duke of York.

The reſt of King Henry's dayes, from this time forward, being ſcarce a year, was free from all trouble both abroad and at home, unleſs perhaps he might be troubled in minde for having ſhed ſo much Engliſh and Noble blood; for expiation whereof, or elſe to the end he might joyn Valour and Devotion in one action together, which hitherto he but uſed ſingly, he took upon him the Cruſado; and at a Council in White-Fryers, order was taken, and great preparation was made for his journey to Jeruſalem: But it was otherwiſe decreed in Heaven, and yet not ſo otherwiſe, but that he ended his life in Jeruſalem, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Of his Taxations.

IN the very beginning of his Reign, it might paſs inſtead of a Taxation, that he found in King Richard's Coffers, in Money and Jewels, to the value of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds. In his fourth year, an extraordinary Subſidy was granted him; twenty ſhillings of every Knights Fee, and of every one that had twenty ſhillings a year in Land, twelve pence and upward, according to that rate; and of every one that had twenty pounds in goods, twelve pence, and upward according to that rate; but with this caution and proteſtation, that it ſhould not hereafter be drawn for a Precedent; and that no Record thereof ſhould be made. In his ſixth year the Clergy granted to the King a Tenth. In his ſeventh year, the Clergy granted a Tenth and a half, and the Commons two fifteens. In a Parliament holden the ninth year of his Reign, the King moved to have allowed him in every year, wherein there was no Parliament kept, a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity; to which demands the Biſhops aſſented, but the Commons would not. In his ſeventh year, a Parliament began which laſted almoſt a whole year, in which a Subſidy was at laſt granted; ſo ſharp, that even Prieſts and Friers who lived of Alms, were forced every one to pay a Noble.

Of Laws and Ordinances made in his time.

Controverſies in Religion firſt puniſhed by burning.

IN this Kings dayes, burning and execution by fire for controverſies in Religion was firſt put in practice.

Alſo in the firſt year of his Reign, an Act was made, that no perſon of what degree ſoever, ſhould after that day alledge for his excuſe, any conſtraint or coarcting of his Prince, for doing of any unlawful act; and that ſuch excuſe, after that day, ſhould ſtand him in no ſtead.

Alſo an Act was made, that no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their houſehold and menial Servants. In his twelfth year, the King cauſed a new Coin of Nobles to be made, which was of leſs value then the old Noble by four pence.

Alſo that all Ripiers, and other Fiſhers from any of the Sea-coaſts ſhould ſell their Fiſh in Cornhill and Cheapſide themſelves, and not to Fiſhmongers that would buy to ſell again.

Alſo this King inſtituted the Dutchy Court, which he did in honour of the Houſe of Lancaſter, to the end the Lands belonging to the Dutchy, might in all following times be diſtinguiſhed and known from the Lands of the Crown. In his ſixth year, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and ſent Proceſs to the Sheriffs, that they ſhould chooſe no Knights nor Burgeſſes that had any knowledge in the Laws of the Realm; by reaſon whereof, it was called, the Lay-mens Parliament. In his ſeventh year, the Mayor of London, for preſervation of Fiſh, obtained, that all Wears which ſtood between London and ſeven mile beyond Kingſton; as alſo ſuch as ſtood between London and Graveſend, ſhould be pulled up and taken away.

The Dutchy Court inſtituted by K. Henry.

The Lay-mens Parliament, and why ſo called.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

BY reaſon of diſcord between John of Gaunt, and Wickham Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Biſhop either in durance, could not, or in fear, durſt not come to the Parliament Houſe, at a time when the King required a ſupply of money; but the Clergy unanimouſly affirming, that without their Brother, the Biſhop of Wincheſters preſence, they neither can nor will conſult of any thing, he is preſently ſent for, and by the King ſecured. After this, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and ſent Proceſs to the Sheriffs that they ſhould chooſe no Knights or Burgeſſes that were Lawyers, and was therefore called the Laymens Parliament: And ſhortly after another Parliament was called, and named the unlearned Parliament; either for the unlearnedneſs of the perſons; or for their malice to learned men. In which the Commons preſented a Petition to the King and the upper Houſe, deſiring that the King might have the Temporal poſſeſſions of the Biſhops and Clergy; the value whereof they pretended would be ſufficient maintenance for a hundred and fifty Earls, one thouſand five hundred Knights, ſix thouſand two hundred Eſquires, and a hundred Hoſpitals for maimed Souldiers. They craved likewiſe, that Clerks convict ſhould not be delivered to the Biſhops Priſon; and that the Statute made in the ſecond year of the King againſt Lollards might be repealed. But the King denied their Petition, and in perſon commanded them from thenceforth, not to preſume to trouble their Brains about any ſuch buſineſs; for he was reſolved to leave the Church in as good ſtate as he found it. In the twelfth year of his Reign certain learned men in Oxford, in their Sermons maintained the Opinions of Wickliffe; but the Biſhops and Doctors of the Univerſity inhibited and condemned them. In his time was a great Schiſm in the Church, by reaſon of two Anti-Popes; but afterwards in an Aſſembly of Cardinals and Biſhops, Works of Piety done in his time.

KING Henry founded a Colledge at Battlefield in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Piercy. In his third year, the Conduit upon Cornhil was begun to be built. Also in his time Sir Robert Knolls made the Stone Bridge of Rochester in Kent; and founded in the Town of Pomfret a Colledge and an Hospital: He also re-edified the body of the White-Friers Church in Fleet-street, where he was afterward buried: Which Church was first founded by the Ancestors of the Lord Grey of Codnor. In the eighth year of his Reign, Richard Whittington Mayor of London erected an house or Church in London, to be a house of Prayer, and named it after his own name, Whittington Colledge; with lodgings and weekly allowance for divers poor people. He also builded the Gate of London, called Newgate, in the year 1420. which was before a most loathsome prison: He builded also more then half of St. Bartholomews Hospital in West-Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Gray-Friers in London, now called Christs Hospital: He also builded a great part of the East-end of Guild-Hall, and a Chappel adjoyning to it, with a Library of Stone, for the custody of the Records of the City. But he that exceeded all at this time in Works of Piety, was William Wickham Bishop of Winchester; his first work was the building of a Chappel at Titchfield, where his Father, Mother, and Sister Perrot were buried: Next he founded at Southwick in Hampshire, near the Town of Wickham, the place of his birth, as a supplement to the Priory of Southwick, a Chauntry, with allowance for five Priests for ever: He bestowed twenty thousand Marks in repairing the houses belonging to the Bishoprick: He discharged out of Prison in all places of his Dioceſs, all such poor Prisoners as lay in execution for Debt, under twenty pounds: He amended all the High-wayes from Winchester to London, on both sides the River. After all this, on the fifth of March, 1379. he began to lay the foundation of that magnificent Structure in Oxford, called New-Colledge, and in person laid the first stone thereof; in which place before, there stood Natus-Colledge, built by Alver, at Natus intreaty; and for the affinity of the name, came to be called New-Colledge. In the year 1387. on the 36. of March, he likewise in person laid the first Stone of the like foundation in Winchester, and dedicated the same, as that other in Oxford, to the memory of the Virgin Mary. The Grocers in London purchased their Hall in Cunny-hope-Lane for 320. Marks; and then laid the foundation thereof on the tenth of May. King Henry founded the Colledge of Foderinghey in Northamptonshire; to which King Henry the fifth gave Land of the Priories of Monks Aliens, by him suppressed.

John Gower the famous Poet, new builded a great part of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, where he lies buried. In the second year of this King, a new Market in the Poultrey, called the Stocks, was builded for the free sale of Foreign Fishmongers and Butchers. In his twelfth year the Guildhal of London was begun to be new edified; and of a little Cottage made a goodly house, as now it is. Also in this Kings time John Colepepper, one of the Justices of the commons Pleas founded a Free-School with competent yearly maintenance in West Peckham in Kent.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN his third year, in the month of March, appeared a blazing Star; first betwixt the East and the North, and then sending forth fiery beams towards the North: fore-shewing perhaps the effusion of blood that followed after in Wales and Northumberland. In the same year at Danbury in Essex, the Devil appeared in likeness of a Gray Frier; who entring the Church, put the people in great fear, and the same hour with a Tempest of Whirl-winde and Thunder, the top of the Steeple was broken down, and half the Chancel scattered abroad. In his seventh year, such abundance of water brake suddenly over the banks in Kent, that it drowned Cattel without numbers Also this year the Town of Royston in Hartfordshire was burnt. In his ninth year was so sharp a Winter and such abundance of Snow, continued December, January, February, and March, that almost all small Birds died through hunger.

The Devil appears in the likeness of a Gray-Fryer.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE had two Wives, the first was Mary, one of the Daughters and Heirs of Humfrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton; she died before he came to the Crown, in the year 1394. His second Wife was Jone, Daughter to Charles the first King of Navarre, she being the Widow of John de Montford surnamed Streany, or the Conquerour, Duke of Britain; who died without any Issue by King Henry, at Havering in Essex, the year 1437. in the fifteenth year of King Henry the sixth, and lieth buried by her Husband at Canterbury. He had four Sons and two Daughters; of his Sons Henry his eldest was Prince of Wales, and after his Father, King of England. His second Son was Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Steward of England; who was slain at Beaufort in Anjou, and died without issue. His third Son was John Duke of Bedford; he married first with Anne Daughter of John Duke of Burgundy: and secondly with Jacoba Daughter of Peter of Luxemburg, Earl of St. Paul, but died also without Issue. His fourth Son was Humfrey, by his Brother King Henry the fifth created Duke of Gloceſter, and was generally called the good Duke: he had two Wives, but died without issue, in the year 1446. and was buried at St. Albans; though the vulgar opinion be, that he lies buried in St. Pauls Church. Of King Henry the fourths Daughters, Blanch the elder was married to Lewis Barbatus, Palatine of the Rhene, and Prince Elector: Philippa his younger daughter, was married to John King of Denmark and Norway.

Of

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

COncerning his body, He was of middle ſtature, ſlender limbs, but well proportioned. Concerning his minde, of a ſerious and ſolid diſpoſition, and one that ſtood more upon his own legs then any of his Predeceſſors had done: in caſes of difficulty not refuſing, but not needing the advice of others; which might confirm, but not better his own. He was neither merry nor ſad, but both: beſt pleaſed when he was oppoſed, becauſe this was like to do him good, by ſharpening his invention: moſt angry when he was flattered, becauſe this was ſure to do him hurt, by dulling his judgement. No man ever more loved, nor leſs doated upon a Wife then he. A good Husband, but not uxorious; that if there be reins to that paſſion, we may know he had them. It may be thought he affected the Crown, not ſo much out of Ambition as out of Compaſſion, becauſe the oppreſſions of his Countrey he could not ſo well help being a Subject, as a King; for otherwiſe we may truly ſay, he was a loſer by the Crown, being not ſo great for a King, as he was before for a Subject. The Crown rather was a gainer by him, which hath ever ſince been the richer for his wearing it. We may think he was either weary of his life, or longing for death; for why elſe would he take upon him the Cruſado, having been told by a skilful Soothſayer, that he ſhould dye in Jeruſalem? but it ſeems he did not believe him.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the forty ſixth year of his Age, having Peace both at home and abroad, and being of too active a ſpirit to be idle, he took upon him the Cruſado, and great proviſion was made for his journey to Jeruſalem: but alas, his journey to Jeruſalem required no ſuch proviſion; for being at his Prayers at St. Edward's ſhrine, he was ſuddenly taken with an Apoplexy, and thereupon removed to the Abbot of Weſtminſter's houſe; where recovering his ſenſes, and finding himſelf in a ſtrange place, he asked what place it was? and being told that he was in the Abbots houſe, in a Chamber called Jeruſalem: Well then (ſaid he) Lord have mercy upon me, for this is the Jeruſalem where a Soothſayer told me I ſhould dye. And here he died indeed, on the 20. day of March, in the year 1413. when he had lived ſix and forty years, reigned thirteen and a half. It is worth remembring, that all the time of his ſickneſs, his will was to have his Crown ſet upon his bolſter by him; and one of his fits being ſo ſtrong upon him, that all men thought him directly dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crown: when ſuddenly the King recovering his ſenſes, miſſed his Crown; and asking for it, was told, the Prince had taken it: whereupon the Prince being called, came back with the Crown, and kneeling down, ſaid, Sir, to all our judgements, and to all our griefs, you ſeemed directly dead, and therefore I took the Crown as being my Right: but ſeeing to all our comforts, you live, I here deliver it much more joyfully then I took it, and pray God you may long live to wear it your ſelf. Well (ſaith the King ſighing) what right I had to it, God knows. But (ſaith the Prince) if you dye King, my Sword ſhall maintain it to be my Right againſt all oppoſers. Well (ſaith the King) I refer all to God: but I charge thee on my Bleſſing, that thou adminiſter the Laws indifferently, avoid Flatterers, defer not to do Juſtice, or be ſparing of Mercy: And then turning about, ſaid, God bleſs thee, and have mercy on me: and with thoſe words, gave up the Ghoſt. His body with all Funeral pomp was conveyed to Canterbury, and there ſolemnly buried.

He dies of an Apoplexy.

His admonitions to the Prince.

Of Men of Note in his time.

OF men of Valour in his time, of whom there was ſtore, I ſhall need to ſay no more then what hath already been ſaid in the body of the ſtory; only I cannot but remember Sir Robert Knolls, who was born of mean parentage, made himſelf famous over all Chriſtendom; and dying at a Manour of his in Norfolk, was brought to London, and buried in the Church of the White-Friers in London, which himſelf had re-edified. But for men of learning, I muſt ſet in the firſt place, William Wickham, a man of no learning, yet well worthy to hold the place. In relating of whoſe life, I muſt have leave to expatiate a little. His Fathers name was John Long, or as ſome ſay, Perot; but as Campian proveth, Wickham; and not from the place of his dwelling, though he was Pariſh Clerk of VVickham in Hampſhire, where he taught Children to write: In which quality his Son VVilliam proved ſo excellent, that Nicholas VVoddal, Conſtable of VVincheſter Caſtle, took him from his Father, and kept him at School, firſt at VVincheſter, afterward at Oxford; till himſelf being made Surveyor-General of the Kings Works, he ſent for this VVilliam to ſerve him as his Clerk: who in ſhort time grew ſo expert in that imployment, that Adam Tarleton Biſhop of VVincheſter, commended him to the King, who imployed him preſently in ſurveying his Fortifications at Dover, and Queenborough Caſtles, and afterward made him Surveyor of his Buildings at VVindſor Caſtle, and his houſes of Henly and Eaſt-Hamſtead. And here firſt envy roſe up againſt him, for having cauſed to be engraven on a ſtone of a Wall at VVindſor Caſtle, theſe words, This made VVilliam VVickham. Some that envied his riſing, complained to the King of his inſolency, as arrogating to himſelf, that excellent piece of Building to be done at his charge: but VVickham called before the King about it made anſwer, that his meaning was not, neither by any indifferent conſtruction could it import that VVickham made that Building, but that the ſame Building made VVickham, as being a means of the Kings great favour towards him: This anſwer pacified the King, who took him daily more and more into his favour; and being now entred into the Miniſtry, was firſt made Parſon of St. Martins in the Fields, then Mini- of St. Martins le Grand, afterwards Archdeacon of Lincoln, Provoſt of VVells, and Rector of Manyhens in Devonſhire; ſo as at one time he had had in his hands ſo many Eccleſiaſtical Livings, that the value of them in the Kings Books amounted to eight hundred ſeventy ſix pounds, thirteen ſhillings: beſides which, he was honoured with many Temporal places of great profit and reſpect, as to be his principal Secretary, Keeper of the Privy Seal, Maſter of the Wards and Liveries, Treaſurer of the Kings Revenues in France, and ſome other Offices. After which, the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter falling void, means was made to the King to beſtow that place upon him. And here, the ſecond time, did envy riſe up againſt him, informing the King that he was a man of little or no learning, and no way fit for ſuch a dignity; Whereupon the King made ſtay of granting it: but when Wickham came before the King, and told him, that what he wanted in perſonal learning, he would ſupply with being a Founder of Learning, This ſo ſatisfied the King that he beſtowed the place upon him. After this he was made Lord Treaſurer of England; and here the third time did envy riſe up againſt him: for the King requiring of his Subjects a ſupply of money, it was anſwered, that he needed no other ſupply then to call his Treaſurer to accompt. This blow ſtrook deep upon the Biſhop; for he was preſently charged to give accompt for eleven hundred ninety ſix thouſand pounds: and whilſt he was buſie in preparing his accompt, all his Temporalties, upon importunity of John of Gaunt, were ſeiſed into the Kings hands, and given to the Prince of Wales, and himſelf upon pain of the Kings diſpleaſure, commanded not to come within twenty miles of the Court. In this caſe he diſmiſſeth his train, and ſendeth copies abroad of his accompt, if it might be received; but was hindred by the working of John of Gaunt againſt him upon this ground (as was thought.) Queen Philippa Wife to King Edward the Third, upon her death-bed, by way of Confeſſion, told Wickham, that John of Gaunt was not the lawful Iſſue of King Edward, but a ſuppoſititious Son: for when ſhe was brought to bed at Gaunt of a Daughter, knowing how deſirous the King was to have a Son, ſhe exchanged that Daughter with a Dutch Woman for a Boy, whereof ſhe had been delivered about the ſame time with the Queen. Thus much ſhe confeſſed, and withal made the Biſhop ſwear, that if the ſaid John of Gaunt ſhould at any time either directly or indirectly attempt the Crown; or that rightfully, through want of Iſſue, it ſhould devolve unto him; that then he ſhould diſcover this matter, and make it known unto the King, and Council. Afterward the Queen being dead, and the Biſhop finding John of Gaunt, as he thought, too much aſpiring, he ſecretly told him this relation, and this adjuration of his ſuppoſed Mother, adviſing him not to ſeek higher then a private ſtate; for elſe he was bound by Oath to make it known to all the World. Thus far the Biſhop did well; but when he ſaw the Son of John of Gaunt not only aſpiring, but poſſeſſed of the Crown, why did he not then diſcover it, and joyn at leaſt with the Biſhop of Carlile, in oppoſing it? Certainly, we may know, that either the whole relation was but a Fable, or that Wickham was a Temporizer, or that John of Gaunt was a moſt patient man, to ſuffer the affront of ſuch an indignity, with leſs then the death of him that did it. But howſoever it was, it is certain, the Duke bore a mortal grudge to the Biſhop; who had no way to withſtand ſuch an enemy, but by making Alice Pierce his friend, by whoſe means, after two years, he was reſtored to all his livings; and afterward K. Edward being dead, and Alice Pierce baniſhed; by the means of a greater friend then Alice Pierce (his full purſe) he obtained in the ſecond year of King Richard, a general pardon under the great Seal of England; and from that time forward enjoyed a quiet life, and died in the fourth year of this King Henry the fourth, being then of the age of above 80 years, and lieth buried in the Church of St. Swithins in Wincheſter, in a monument of his own making in his life time; leaving for his heir Thomas Perrot, the ſon of his ſiſter Agnes, married to William Perrot.

John of Gaunt ſaid to be a ſuppoſititious ſon.

Another great example of the volubility of Fortune, in Profeſſors of Learning, was Roger Walden, who died in the ninth year of this King: He was at firſt a poor Scholar in Oxford; and the firſt ſtep of his riſing, was to be a Chaplain in the Colledge there of St. Maries; from thence by degrees he got to be Dean of York; and after this, a high ſtep, to be Treaſurer of England; and yet a higher after that upon the baniſhment of Thomas Arundel, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury: But being now at the top, he came down again; for in this Kings time, Thomas Arundel being reſtored to the Archbiſhoprick, Walden was not only put out of that place, but was called to accompt for the Treaſureſhip: and though he ſhewed his Quietus eſt, yet all his Temporalties were ſeized, and his perſon impriſoned, till by the mediation of the now Archbiſhop Arundel, he was made Treaſurer of Callice, and after promoted to be Biſhop of London.

Roger Walden his Riſing and Fall.

The next place after theſe, is juſtly due to Geoffry Chaucer, and John Gower, two famous Poets in this time, and the Fathers of Engliſh Poets in all the times after. Chaucer died in the fourth year of this King, and lieth buried at Weſtminſter: Gower, in this Kings ninth year, and was buried at S. Mary Overies Church in Southwark. And now come others to be remembred, who lived and died in this Kings time. Hugh Legate born in Hartfordſhire, a Monk of St. Albans, who wrote Scholies upon Boetius de Conſolatione. Nicholas Gorham, born alſo in Hartfordſhire, a Dominick Frier, and the French Kings Confeſſor, though an Engliſh man. Walter Diſſe, ſo called of a Town in Norfolk, where he was born, Confeſſor to the Duke of Lancaſter. Lawrence Holbeck, a Monk of Ramſey, who wrote an Hebrew Dictionary. John Cotton Archbiſhop of Armagh. Richard Scroop, brother to William Scroop Lord Treaſurer of England, made Archbiſhop of York; and writing an invective againſt King Henry, loſt his head. William Thorpe, an earneſt follower of John Wickliffe, for which he was committed to Saltwood Caſtle, where he died. Stephen Patrington, born in Yorkſhire, and Robert Maſcal, a Carmelite Frier of Ludlow; both of them Confeſſors to King Henry the fifth. Boſton a Monk of the Abbey of Bury in Suffolk, who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church, and other Treatiſes. John

Purvey

Purvey, who was convented for teaching Doctrine contrary to the Church of Rome, and compelled to recant. Thomas Rudburn Biſhop of St. Davids, who wrote a Chronicle. Nicholas Riſton who conſidering the ſtrife between the then Anti-Popes, wrote a Book, De tollendo ſchiſmate. Robert Wanſham a Monk in Dorſetſhire, who wrote a Book in Verſe, Of the Original and Signification of words, Robert Wimbledon an excellent Preacher, as appeareth by the Sermon he made upon this Text, Redde rationem Villicationis tuæ.

THE

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE FIFTH.

Anno Dom. 1412.

HENRY of Monmouth (ſo called from the place in Wales, where he was born) eldeſt Son of King Henry the fourth, ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom of England, to whom the Lords of the Realm ſwore Homage and Allegiance, before he was yet Crowned; an Honour never done before to any of his Predeceſſors: and afterwards on the ninth of April, in the year 1412. he was Crowned at Weſtminſter, by Thomas Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Solemnities in ſuch caſe accuſtomed: And as the Scripture ſpeaks of Saul, That as ſoon as Samuel had anointed him King, he had a new heart given him, and he became another man then he was before: ſo was it with this King Henry. For preſently after his Coronation, he called before him all his old Companions, who had been fratres in malo with him, ſtrictly charging them not to preſume to come within ten miles of his Court, until ſuch time as they had given good proof of their amendment in manners; and leſt any of them ſhould pretend want of maintenance to be any cauſe of their taking ill courſes, he gave to every one of them a competent means whereby to ſubſiſt. And knowing (as he did) the faſhion of the Scots and Welſh, that in times of change they would commonly take advantage, to make Inroads upon the Borders, he therefore cauſed Forts and Bulwarks in fit places to be erected, and placed Garriſons in them, for preventing or repelling any ſuch Incurſions. Immediately after this, he called a Parliament, where a Subſidy was granted without asking; and in this Parliament the Commons began to harp upon their old ſtring, of taking away the Temporalties of the Clergy: and the Biſhops fearing how it might take in the Kings ears, thought it beſt to divert him, by ſtriking upon another ſtring, which they knew would be more pleaſing to him, which was to ſhew him the great right he had to the Crown of France. And thereupon Chichely Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in a long narration, deduced the King's right from Iſabel Daughter to Philip the fourth, married to King Edward the ſecond; from whom it deſcended by direct line to his Majeſty, and no hinderance of enjoying it but pretenſion of the Salique Laws; which (ſaid he) was neither according to the law of God, nor yet intended at firſt to that Nation: and though his Predeceſſors by reaſon of other incumbrances forbore to proſecute their claim, yet he being free from all ſuch incumbrances, had no leſs power then right to do it. This indeed ſtruck upon the right ſtring of the Kings inclination; for as he affected nothing more then true glory, ſo in nothing more then in warlike actions. Hereupon nothing was now thought of, but the Conqueſt of France. Firſt therefore he begins to alter in his Armes the bearing of Semy-de-Luces, and quarters the three Flower-de-Luces, as the Kings of France then bare them; and that he might not be thought to ſteal advantage, but to do it fairly, he ſent Ambaſſadours to Charles the ſixth then King of France, requiring in peaceable manner the ſurrender of the Crown of France: which if he would yield unto, then King Henry would take to Wife his Daughter Katharine; but if he refuſed to do it, then King Henry would with Fire and Sword enforce it from him, or loſe his life. The Ambaſſadours ſent, were the Duke of Exeter, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Lord Grey, the Lord High Admiral, and the Biſhop of Norwich, with five hundred Horſe; who coming to the Court of France, were at firſt received and feaſted, with all the honour and ſhew of kindeneſs that might be: but as ſoon as their Meſſage was delivered, and that it was known what they came about, the Copy of their entertainment was altered, and they were ſent away with as little Complement, as they were before received with honour; only told that the King would ſpeedily make anſwer to the King their Maſter by his own Ambaſſadours: and ſpeedily indeed he did it; for the Earl of Vendoſme, William Baratier Archbiſhop of Bourges, Peter Freſnel, Biſhop of Lyſeaux, with others, were arrived in England, as ſoon almoſt as the Engliſh were returned. But being come, the Arbhbiſhop of Bourges made a long Oration in the praiſe of Peace, concluding with the tender of the Lady Katharine, and 50000. Crowns with her in Dower, beſides ſome Towns of no great importance: To which K. Henry by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury made anſwer, That theſe offers were trifles, and that without yielding to his Demands, he would never deſiſt from that he intended; and with this anſwer the French Ambaſſadours were diſmiſſed. It is ſaid, that about this time, the Dauphin (who in the King of France his ſickneſs managed the State) ſent to King Henry a Ton of Tennis Balls, in deriſion of his youth, as fitter to play with them, then to manage Arms; which King Henry hath homage ſworn to him before he was Crowned.

Being once Crowned, he diſcharged all his diſorderly companions.

A Subſidy granted him without asking.

The Biſhops ſhew him his right to the Crown of France.

He quarters in his Arms the three Flower-de-luces.

He ſends Ambaſſadours into France to claim the ſurrender of the Crown.

The King of France returns anſwer by his Ambaſſadours.

The Dauphin of France ſends King Henry a Ton of Tennis Balls in deriſion, and King Henry's Anſwer.

King Henry took in ſuch ſcorn, that he promiſed with an Oath, it ſhould not be long e're he would toſs ſuch Iron Balls amongſt them, that the beſt Arms in France ſhould not be able to hold a Racket to return them. And now all things are prepared and in a readineſs for the Kings Journey into France, his men ſhipped, and himſelf ready to go on Shipboard; when ſuddenly a Treaſon was diſcovered againſt his perſon, plotted by Richard Earl of Cambridge, Henry Lord Scroop of Maſham, Lord Treaſurer, and Thomas Grey Earl of Northumberland, and plotted and procured by the French Agents. Theſe being apprehended, and upon examination confeſſing the Treaſon, and the money (which was ſaid to be a Million of Gold) by them for that end received, were all of them immediately put to death. From this Richard Earl of Cambridge, ſecond Son of Edmund of Langley, did Richard afterward Duke of York claim and recover the Crown from the Lancaſtrian Family. This Execution done, and the winde blowing fair, King Henry weighs Anchor, and with a Fleet of 1200. Sail, (Grafton ſaith but 140. Ships) but Enguerant ſaith, 1600. attended with ſix thouſand Spears, and 24000. Foot, beſides Engineers and Labourers, he puts to Sea; and on our Lady Eve landed at Caux, where he made Proclamation, that no man upon pain of death ſhould rob any Church, or offer violence to any that were found unarmed: and from thence paſſing on, he beſieged Harflew; which when no ſuccour came within certain dayes agreed upon, the Town was ſurrendred and ſacked. Of this Town he made the Duke of Exeter Captain, who left there for his Lieutenant, Sir John Falſtoffe, with a Garriſon of 1500. men. It is ſaid that when King Henry entred Harflew, he paſſed along the ſtreets bare-foot, until he came to the Church of St. Martin; where with great devotion he gave moſt humble thanks to God for this firſt atchieved Enterprize. From thence he marched forward, and coming to the River of Soame, he found all the Bridges broken; whereupon he paſſed on to the Bridge of St. Maxenæ, where 30000. French appearing, he pitcht his Camp, expecting to be fought with; and the more to encourage his men, he gave the Order of Knighthood to John Lord Ferrers of Groby, Reynold Grayſtock, Piercy Tempeſt, Chriſtopher Morisby, Thomas Pickering, William Huddleſton, Henry Mortimer, John Hosbalton, Philip Hall: but not perceiving the French to have any minde to fight, he marched by the Town of Amyens to Bowes, and there ſtayed two dayes, expecting Battel; and from thence marched to Corby, where the Peaſants of the Countrey, with certain men of Arms ſent from the Dauphin, charged the right wing of the Engliſh, which was led by Hugh Stafford Lord Bourchier, and won away his Standard, but was recovered again by John Bromeley of Bromeley, a Commander in the Lord Stafford's Regiment, who with his own hand ſlew him that had taken the Colours; and then taking them up, diſplayed the ſame, with ſight whereof, the Engliſh were ſo encouraged, that they preſently routed the French, and put them to flight; which valiant exploit, the Lord Stafford recompenſed, by giving to Bromely an Annuity of fifty pounds a year out of his Lands in Staffordſhire. After this the King marched towards Callice, ſo ſtrictly obſerving his Proclamation againſt Church-robbing; that when one was complained of for having taken a ſilver Pixe out of a Church, he not only cauſed the ſame to be reſtored, but the Souldier alſo to be hanged: which point of Diſcipline both kept the reſt from offending in that kinde, and drew the people of the Countrey, underhand to relieve his men with all things neceſſary. The French King hearing that King Henry had paſſed the River of Soame, by advice of his Counſel (who yet were divided in Opinion) ſent Montjoy the French King at Arms to defie King Henry, and to let him know he ſhould be fought with; which King Henry, though his Army was much infected with Fevers, whereof the Earl of Stafford, the Biſhop of Norwich, the Lord Molines and Burnel, were lately dead: yet he willingly heard, and rewarded the Herald for his meſſage; and firſt having cleared a paſſage over a Bridge, where of neceſſity he was to paſs, on the 22. of October, he paſſed over with his Army. At which time the Duke of York that led the Rereward, had diſcovered the Enemy to come on apace; whereof he ſent word to the King, who thereupon made a ſtand: and appointing his Officers what courſe to hold, and encouraging his Souldiers, they all attended when the Battel ſhould begin. The French Army was divided into three Battels; in the firſt were placed eight thouſand men at Arms, four thouſand Archers, and fifteen hundred Croſs-bows, the wings conſiſting of two thouſand two hundred men at Arms. This Battel was led by the Conſtable of France himſelf, the Dukes of Orleance and Bourbon, the Earls of Ewe, Richmond, and Vendoſme, the Lord Dampier, the Lord Admiral of France, the Admiral Bouciqualt, and others. The middle Battel wherein were more men at Arms, was commanded by the Dukes of Barre and Alanſon, and by the Earls of Vaudemont, Salings, Blamont, Grantpee, and Rouſey. In the Rereward were all the Remainder of the French Forces, guided by the Earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauconbridge, and the Lord Lonrey, Captain of Ardy: The Frenchmen thus ordered, being ſix times, ſome ſay ten times, as many as the Engliſh, (who were not above nine thouſand) thought of nothing but of the booty they ſhould get. In the mean time King Henry having made choice of a piece of ground half fenced on his back with the Village, wherein they had reſted the night before, on both ſides having ſtrong hedges and ditches, begun there to order his Battel: but firſt he appointed an ambuſh of two hundred Archers, which upon a watch-word given, ſhould diſcharge their whole flight upon the whole flank of the Enemies Horſe. The Vaunt-guard conſiſting of Archers only, was conducted by the Duke of York, who out of an heroick courage made ſuit for that place; with whom were joyned the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The main Battel was led by the King himſelf, which conſiſted of Bill-men, and ſome Bow-men: with him were the Duke of Gloceſter his Brother, ther, the Earl Marshal, Oxford, and Suffolk. The Rereward was led by Thomas Duke of Exeter, the Kings Unkle, consisting of all sorts of weapons; the horsemen, as wings guarded the companies on both sides. The King to prevent the fury of the French Cavalry, by the direction of the Duke of York, appointed divers stakes studded with iron at both ends, of six foot long, to be pitched behinde the Archers, and appointed Pioneers to attend to remove them, as they should be directed. These things thus ordered, publick Prayers were humbly made, and the on-set was presently given by the French Horsemen; whereupon Sir Walter Orpington, according to direction, caused the Bow-men behinde the hedges to let flie their Arrows; which so galled the French horses, that either they cast their Riders, or through their unrulinesse, so opened their Ranks, that the right wing of the English horse had way to come in upon the French foot; and withal, the French horse disorderly retiring, they were miserably trodden down and dis-ranked by their own company. Upon which, the King with his main Battel came on with such resolution, that himself in person charged the Duke of Alanson, by whom he was well-near unhorsed; but afterward, having first slain two of the Dukes men, he charged the Duke again, and with his Sword beat him from his horse; whom the King's Guard, notwithstanding the King cried out to the contrary, slew out-right: and with his fall the main Battel of the French first gave ground, then turned their backs, and lastly cast away their Weapons and fled. But then certain of the French horsemen that first ran away, led on by Robert Bondile and the Captain of Agincourt, meaning to wipe away the blot of running away from Souldiers, by fighting with Boyes, set upon the Pages and Laundresses that were left in the Camp; who gave such a lamentable shreek, that King Henry verily thought some fresh forces had been come: whereupon he caused all the Arrows that were sticking in the field, to be gathered, and the stakes to be plucked up, and made ready to be again used: amongst which the Duke of York's body was found, miserably hacked and defaced: the sight whereof, together with danger of a second Charge, made King Henry give order, the Prisoners should be all slain, except only some principal men, whom he caused to be bound back to back, and so left. For which fact, though done in cold blood, yet the King could not justly be taxed with cruelty, seeing the number of the Prisoners was more then of his own Souldiers; and nothing could give assurance of safety, but their slaughter. But all was not yet done; for the Earls of Marle and Fauconbridge, with six hundred men at Arms, who had stood still all day, began now to stir, and gave a brave charge upon King Henry's Army: but being but few, and their horses galled with the stakes, they had only the honour to dye bravely; and indeed they slew more of the English, then the whole Army had done before. And now at last, the King being satisfied by the scouts, that no Enemy was more to be seen, he asked what the place was called? and being told, Agincourt; Well then (said he) this shall be from henceforth called the Battel of Agincourt: and presently he caused the whole Army, in their array as they were, to give God thanks; causing the Clergy there present, to sing the Psalm of David, In exitu Israel de Ægypto; and made Proclamation, that every one at the verse, Non nobis Domine, sed nomini tuo da gloriam, should kneel down, and the horsemen bow their bodies: and then singing Te Deum and other Holy Hymns, they marched to the enemies Camp, where the Souldiers had liberty given them to take the spoil.

The prisoners taken were all slain: how justified.

This Battel was fought at Agincourt 1415.

His devotion after the Victory.

A great Victory no doubt, but yet a victory by which the English gained not one foot of ground in France, more then they had before; and which Monshelet attributeth not so much to the valour of the English, as to the indiscretion of the French, who had so straightned the Vantguard of their Army, and pent them up so close together, that they had not room to draw out their Swords; so true is that saying, Quos Deus vult perdere dementat. The next day after the Battel, French Heraulds came to ask leave to bury their dead, and had it, and the English Heraulds appointed to make search, made return that there were slain of the French above ten thousand, whereof a hundred twenty six were of the Nobility bearing Banners, of Knights and Gentlemen of Coat Armour, seven thousand eight hundred seventy four, whereof five hundred were Knighted the night before the Battel; and of common Souldiers, about sixteen hundred. Amongst the slain of the Nobility, were Charles le Brets, High Constable, Jaques of Chatillon, Admiral of France, the great Master of France, the Master of the Cross-Bows, the Duke of Alanson, Brabant, and Barre; the Earls of Neuers, Marle, Vaudemont, Beaumont, Grandpee, Rousey, Fauconbridge, Foys, and L'estrenck: There were taken Prisoners, Charles Duke of Orleance, John Duke of Bourbon, the Lords Danvert, Fosseux, Humiers, Roy, Cawny, Fancourt, Noel, Bouciqualt; to the number in all of fifteen hundred. On the English part were slain, Edward Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk, and not full six hundred in all; but (saith Caxton) not above six and twenty in all; and Paulus Æmilius saith, besides the two Lords, only two Knights, and but ten private Souldiers in all: a Miracle rather then a Victory. But not only King Henry was the death of the French Lords before named, in the field with his Sword: but of another great Prince at home, with his Victory; for Lewis the Dauphin, eldest Son of Charles the sixth, King of France, presently upon it, without any other cause apparent, fell sick and died. Yet King Henry, to make his enemies the better contented with their overthrow, and to take away the envy of his Victory, at his return into England with his Prisoners, which was on the sixth of November following, presently gave strait order, that no Ballad or Song should be made or sung, more then of Thanksgiving to God for his happy Victory and safe return; but without words of either disgracing the French, or extolling the English. At his entrance into London, the City presented him with a thousand pounds, and two Basons of Gold worth five hundred pounds more. The bodies of the Duke of York and the Earl Suffolk were

The Emperour Sigiſmund comes into England.

About this time the Emperour Sigiſmund, Couſin-german to King Henry, having been firſt in France, came accompanied with the Archbiſhop of Rhemes, Ambaſſadour from the French King, into England; for whom there were thirty great Ships ſent from the King to waft him over: but approaching to land at Dover, the Duke of Gloceſter, with a company of Gentlemen, having their Swords drawn, ſtept up to the knees in water, ſaying to him, That if he came as the Kings friend, he ſhould be welcome; but if as claiming any Juriſdiction, they would reſiſt him: whereupon the Emperour renounceth all Imperial Authority, and is thereupon admitted to land, and received with as much honour as could be done him; and afterward together with Albert Duke of Holland, who was lately likewiſe arrived at VVincheſter, is elected companion of the Order of the Garter, and ſate in their Cells at the ſolemnity of the Feaſt. A principal cauſe of the Emperour's coming, was to mediate a Peace between England and France; wherein he had brought King Henry to a good degree of inclination; till news came of the beſieging of Harflew by the French, and of the Earl of Arminiacks ſetting upon the Duke of Exeter, being Governour there: and then he preſently grew ſo averſe from Peace, that he would hearken no more to any Treaty of it. Not that he miſliked they ſhould treat of Peace with their Swords in their hands, as all wiſe men would do; but that to treat of Peace, and in the time of the Treaty to do acts of Hoſtility, was an affront to all honeſty, and not to be tolerated with any patience.

Harflew beſieged by the Earl of Arminiack.

And now the Earl of Arminiack having ſet down before the Town, the Vice-Admiral of France brought up the whole Navy of the French, with intent whilſt the Earl ſhould aſſail it by land, to have entred the Town by the waters ſide: but of this purpoſe the valour and diligence of the Duke of Exeter prevented them. As ſoon as King Henry had intelligence hereof, he would preſently have gone himſelf; but being diſſwaded by the Emperour, he ſent his Brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Earls of March, Oxford, Huntington, VVarwick, Arundel, Salisbury, Devonſhire, and divers others, with two hundred Sail, to the reſcue of Harflew; who upon the Feaſt of the Aſſumption of our Lady, came to the mouth of the River Seyne: whereupon, Norbon the French Admiral ſet forward, and got the mouth of the Haven: and here began a fight, which was reſolutely maintained on both ſides, until the Engliſh having ſunk five hundred Veſſels one and other of the French, and taken three great Carricks of Genoua, won the Harbour; and at laſt, though with ſome oppoſition made by their Gallies, relieved Harflew, and made the Earl of Arminiack glad to raiſe his ſiege. Upon the news hereof, the Emperour deſiſted from mediating any further for Peace with France; and entring into a League Defenſive and Offenſive with King Henry, wherein only the Pope was excepted, on the 19. of October he departed towards Germany, whom King Henry accompanied to Callice, whither the Duke of Burgundy came to confirm the League coucluded onbefore by the Earl of VVarwick and him, concerning Flanders and Artois only. In the mean time the French had hired divers Carricks and other great Ships of the Genoeſe and Italians, which joyning with the French Fleet, lay at the mouth of the River of Seyne, under the command of Jaques Baſtard of Bourbon, to hinder all ſuccours from coming to Harflew; but John Earl of Huntington (Son to the Duke of Exeter beheaded at Chicheſter) being ſent to ſcowre the Coaſts, encountred with him, and after a long fight, took him Priſoner, and three of his great Carricks, with all the money for the half years pay of the Fleet, and ſinking three other of his Carricks, and diſperſing the reſt, cleared the mouth of the River, and then returned to the King at Southampton.

The Emperour enters League Offenſive and Defenſive with King Henry.

And now upon the twenty third of July, in the fourth year of his Reign, the King himſelf, with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, the Earls of Huntington, VVarwick, Devonſhire, Salisbury, Suffolk, and Somerſet, the Lords Roſſe, VVilloughby, Fitz-Hugh, Clynton, Scroop, Matrevers, Bourchier, Ferrers of Croby, Ferrers of Chartley, Fanhope, Grey of Codnor, Sir Gilbert Umphreville, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and an Army conſiſting of twenty five thouſand five hundred and twenty eight fighting men, beſides a thouſand Artificers and Pyoneers, took ſhipping at Portſmouth, and upon the firſt of Auguſt landed in Normandy near to the Caſtle of Tonque, which he preſently beſieged, and upon the ninth of Auguſt had it yielded to him, at which time the Earl of Salisbury took the Caſtle of Albervilliers which the King gave to him and to his heirs, being the firſt land given by the King in France.

King Henry with a great Army paſſeth in perſon into France, and beſiegeth Tonque Caſtle, and takes it.

At the winning of Tonque, the King made eight and twenty Knights; and from thence marched with his Army to Caen; where to prevent the Citizens from ſallying out, he caſt up a Mount; and then making many aſſaults, but finding them to do little good, he cauſed his Pyoneers to undermine the Walls: which being done, upon the fourth of September, he offered the Beſieged their lives, if they would ſubmit; which they refuſing, he thereupon made a ſhew of a general aſſault, whilſt many of his men entred the City under the foundation, of whom the Duke of Clarence with his Company was the firſt: and they coming upon the backs of thoſe that defended the Walls, eaſily overcame them; and then the whole Army entred without reſiſtance. The next day the King cauſed all the principal men of the Town to come before him at their Senate houſe, where ſome of them for their ſtubborn refuſing the grace he had offered them, were adjudged to death, and the reſt fined: The ſpoil of the Town was diſtributed amongſt the Souldiers. The Captain of the Caſtle ſtood out a while: but being advertiſed that the King had ſworn to ſhew no mercy, if he did not ſurrender, he gave twelve Hoſtages, that if it were not relieved before the twentieth of September, he would then give it up; which not coming he performed; and ſo the King had poſſeſſion both of Caen and the Caſtle.

Five hundred French ſhips ſunk by the Engliſh.

Harflew reſcu'd by the Duke of Bedford.

And now Charles the new Dauphin, being but ſeven-seventeen years of age, and bare of money, had got into his possession all the Jewels, Plate, and Money of the Queen his Mother; which so incensed her against him, that to do him a spight; she placed the Duke of Burgundy in chief authority about the King, who by reason of his infirmity, was unable himself to manage the State; and the Duke having now the Sword in his hand, meant first to repress the growing boldness of the Dauphin, and afterward to repel the common Enemy: And the Dauphin likewise, envying the Dukes advancement above him, meant first to take down his swelling greatness, and afterward to fall upon the foreign Adversary. And thus while private respects were preferred before publick, whilst the Duke and the Dauphin had their first intentions one against another, not looking after King Henry, but in the second place, after their own turns served, an easie way was left for King Henry's proceedings, and he went on at his pleasure with small opposition. He sent the 1418. Duke of Clarence, who took in the City of Bayeux, as likewise the Duke of Gloceſter the City of Lyseux; whilst himself remaining still at Caen, put out of the City the Natives that were impotent or young Infants, to the number of 1500. and in their places put English people, and finding a great mass of Money and Plate, deposited by the Citizens in the Castle, he caused the same upon proof, to be respectively delivered to the right owners, upon condition they would acknowledge him for their Sovereign; which moderate and just dealing won him more hearts then the force of his Arms had won him knees; specially with the Normans, who are easier to be drawn with gentleness and love, then forced by violence and compulsion. From hence the King marched the first of October to Corfye Castle, which within three dayes yielded. The fourth of October he came to Argenton, which not relieved by a day agreed upon, was likewise surrendred. The Town of Alanson endured eight dayes siege, but in the end did as other their neighbour Towns had done. From Alanson the Earl of Salisbury was sent to Fayles, to view the strength thereof, whom the King presently followed, where the besieged concluded, if it were not relieved before the second of January, then to yield up the Town. No relief coming, the Town was yielded up, and soon after upon the like terms, the Castle. From hence the King returned to Caen, to put in execution a Proclamation he had formerly made; That if the Inhabitants of Normandy that were fled, returned not by a day assigned, he would then grant their Lands to his Souldiers: and thereupon he gave to the Duke of Clarence, during life, the Vicounties of Auge, Orver, and Pontius, with all the Lands of those that were not returned according to the Proclamation. All the Lent the King lay at Bayeux, whilst his Navy still kept the Seas, and daily took many French Ships, but on the sixteenth of July such a Tempest took them, that they were driven to fall in with Southampton; and yet, with all their diligence, could not so save themselves, but that two Ballingers, and two great Carricks laden with Merchandize were in the very Haven drowned. In the mean time the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Talbot besieged the strong Castle of Damfront: the Duke of Clarence took Courton and Burney; and many other being taken, as Chambois, Becheloutyn, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Crevener, Anvyillers, Bagles, in all of them he placed Captains and Garrisons, and particularly in Fresny, Sir Robert Brent, lately made Viscount: The Duke of Gloceſter also, with the Earl of March, and the Lord of Codnor, took in all the Isle of Constantine, except Chereburg, and then returned to the King but was sent back to take in that City also; which after some time, when no relief came, was, together with the Castle, likewise surrendred; although by this time the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin, by mediation of the Pope, were reconciled and began to joyn their Forces to make resistance. And now the Duke of Exeter the King's Uncle, with a supply of fifteen thousand men out of England, came to the King, who presently took in the City of Eureux; and the Earl of Ryme, the strong Castle of Mille le Vesco.

King Henry's liberal dealing with the Citizens of Caen.

King Henry besiegeth Roan. His policies in the siege.

The next thing attempted, was the siege of Roan, a City strongly fortified, both with Walls and Ditches; and to which there was no convenient passage, but by the City of Lovies; to this City therefore he first layes siege, which when relief came not within a time agreed on, was surrendred; and yet there was another impediment to be removed, a stone-bridge which hindred the approach to Roan, being exceeding strongly guarded: For this, King Henry devised floats of wicker covered with Beasts Hides, by which the Duke of Clarence with his quarter passed the River, and then laid siege to the Town on that side; and for the other side, he had other devices made with Hogsheads and Pipes, fastned to Fir Poles and Barges, with which he passed his men over at pleasure; and in the mean time he caused divers of his Souldiers that could swim, to make shew of passing the River three miles off another way; with which the French men being deluded, drew all their Forces thither, and by this means the Fort being left unfurnished of sufficient guard, was presently forced to surrender, and the Souldiers were taken to the Kings Grace. The Bridge being thus gained, the Duke of Exeter was sent, and with him Windsor the Herald, to summon the Citizens to surrender the Town; who not only gave proud answers, but also made a sally forth, though with the loss of thirty of their men. Upon this obstinacy of theirs, the King presently orders his siege; his own quarter was the Charteux, the Duke of Clarence at St. Gervase, the Duke of Exeter at Port St. Dennis, and every great Commander had his quarter assigned, so as the City was begirt round, and a great chain of Iron set upon piles, and a strong wooden Bridge for passage from one Camp to the other, was made over the River. At this time the Earl of Kilmayne with sixteen hundred Irish, came to the King, and had their quarter assigned them, who behaved themselves with great valour. The Kings Cousin german, the King of Portugal, sent likewise a Navy of Ships to the mouth of the River Seyne, which stopped all passage of succour to Roan. Many policies and practices were used uſed againſt the City, but none prevailed, till famine forced it; for there being in Roan, 210000. perſons at the beginning of the ſiege, and the ſiege continuing long, it grew to that extremity, that the Citizens drank nothing but vinegar and water, and had little to eat but Rats and Mice, Cats and Dogs, and ſuch like: Great numbers of the poorer ſort were thruſt out of the City, who not ſuffered to paſs the Engliſh Army, miſerably periſhed; only upon Chriſtmaſs day, in honour of Chriſts Birth, the King relieved and ſuffered to paſs as many as were at firſt put out, but not others that were put out the ſecond time, but ſuffered them to periſh.

But nothing prevailed till at last, Famine.

In this diſtreſs, a Parley is required by the Citizens; who notwithſtanding their miſery, yet ſtood upon ſuch high terms, that nothing was concluded, only a Truce for eight dayes was granted them; the eight dayes ended, and nothing yet agreed upon amongſt themſelves, they crave one day longer, and neither in that day could any thing be agreed on: then they crave four dayes more, in which the multitude and common people ſo preſſed the Magiſtrates, and Governours of the City, that on the fourth day, being about the nineteenth of January, the City was ſurrendred, and the Inhabitants themſelves, and all their Goods were yielded to the Kings mercy; the Duke of Exeter was appointed to take poſſeſſion, who accordingly entred with his Souldiers. The next day after being Friday, the twentieth of January, the King himſelf made his entry, with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Biſhops, ſixteen Barons, and others, and was by the Clergy conducted to our Lady Church; where after publick thankſgiving, he took Homage and Fealty of the Burgeſſes and Inhabitants; making Proclamation, that all that would come and acknowledge him to be their Sovereign, ſhould enjoy the benefit of his Protection, and retain their poſſeſſions: whereupon many came in, and many Towns were ſurrendred. In this time of the Kings lying at Roan, the Earl of Salisbury took in Hunflew, Munſter de Villiers, Ewe, and New Caſtle; the Duke of Clarence took Vernon, and Naunt; and the Earl of Warwick, la Roche Guyon.

Roan is yielded up to King Henry.

And now the Duke of Burgundy ſeeing the great ſucceſſes of King Henry, could think of no better way for his own ſafety, then to make a reconciliation between the two Kings; to which end, Ambaſſadors are ſent to procure their meeting: at which time, King Henry for their ſervice already performed, and in hope of more hereafter, made the valiant Gaſcoigne Captain le Beauff, Earl of Longueville, Sir John Gray Earl of Tankervile, and the Lord Bourchier Earl of Ewe. Upon the laſt of May, King Henry accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence, Gloceſter, and Exeter, his Unkle Beaufort, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, with the Earls of March, and Salisbury, and a thouſand men at Arms, entred the place appointed for the meeting of the two Kings. The French Queen (her Husband being taken with the Frenzy) with the Duke of Burgoigne, and the Earl of St. Paul, and a company of Ladies: amongſt whom, as a bait to intangle the Kings affection, was the Kings Daughter, the beautiful Lady Katharine; with whoſe ſight, though the King was marvellouſly taken, yet he made no ſhew thereof, till other things ſhould be agreed upon; but the Dauphin having made means to the Duke of Burgoigne to hinder all agreement, nothing was effected; whereupon at their parting, the King told the Duke, that he would have both the Lady, and all his other demands; or elſe drive the King of France out of his Kingdom, and him out of his Dukedom. Upon this, the Duke thought it beſt to agree with the Dauphin; and upon this, the ſixth of July, Articles of their reconcilement are ſigned and ſealed. In the mean time the Earl of Longuevile ſurprized the Town of Ponthoyſe, but had ſcarce been able to make good the ſurprize, if the Duke of Clarence had not come to his ſuccour. From thence the Duke marched to Paris, and there ſtayed two dayes; but perceiving no ſhow of ſally to be made, he returned to Ponthoyſe, whither the King himſelf came; and from thence marching on, took in the Caſtle of Vaynon Villeirs; and on the laſt of Auguſt, the Caſtles of Gyſors, and Galyard, and Dumal: ſo that now all Normandy (Mount St. Michael only excepted) was reduced to the poſſeſſion of the King of England, which had been wrongfully detained from him, ever ſince the year 1207.

A meeting for reconciliation appointed between the two Kings of England and France.

The Dauphin all this while, though outwardly having made a reconcilement with the Duke of Burgoigne, yet inwardly bearing a ſpleen againſt him, intended nothing ſo much as his deſtruction: which to effect, he procured a meeting between the Duke and him, and all the Peers of the Realm at Mounſtrew; where the Duke though humbling himſelf in reverence to the Dauphin on his knee, was moſt barbarouſly murthered; which act, was ſo much the leſs to be pitied in the Duke, by how much in the like kinde, upon the like interview, he had cauſed Lewis the Duke of Orleance to be murthered. But though this barbarous act might juſtly incenſe Philip Earl of Carolois the Duke of Burgoigne's Heir to ſeek revenge; yet as a wiſe and politick Prince, he forbore for the preſent, to make any ſhew of choler or diſtemperature; and conſidering with himſelf, that difference between the Dauphin and him, would but give King Henry the greater advantage, he endeavoured to propoſe an overture of Peace between the two Kings: And to that end Ambaſſadors are ſent from the King of France, and the young Duke of Burgoigne, whom the King kindly entertained, but ſeemed to intimate unto them, that he could give no great credit to their propoſitions, unleſs the Lady Katharine would joyn in them, whoſe innocence he knew would never abuſe him. Whilſt theſe things are in agitation, the Earl of Salisbury took in Freſney, and the Earls Marſhal and Huntington, entred into Mayn, who approaching to Mentz, was encountred by the Forces of the Dauphin, whereof they ſlew five thouſand, and took two hundred priſoners; for which, news being brought to Roan, whither King Henry was come to ſolemnize the Feaſt of Chriſt's Birth, thankſgiving to God was publickly made; and in the inſtant thereof, arrived other Ambaſſadors from the King and Queen of France, and a Letter from the the Lady Katharine to King Henry, was ſecretly by the Biſhop of Arras delivered. The concluſion of all was, that the King of England ſhould ſpeed himſelf to Troyes, there to be eſpouſed to the Lady Katharine; and to have aſſurance of the Crown of France, after the deceaſe of the preſent King Charles. Whereupon with a Guard of fifteen thouſand choice Souldiers, accompanied with the Duke of Clarence and Gloceſter, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Huntington, Longuevile, Tankervile, and Ewe, the King of England came to Troyes in Champaign, upon the 18. day of May; where he was met by the Duke of Burgoign, and divers of the French Nobility, who attended him to the Palace, where the Queen with her Daughters, the Dutcheſs of Burgoigne, and the Lady Katharine, gave him Princely entertainment; and after ſome intercourſe of complement between the Princes and the Ladies, King Henry tendered to the Lady Katharine, a Ring of great value, which ſhe (not without ſome bluſhing) received; and afterward, upon the twentieth day of May, ſhe was affianced to him in St. Peter's Church, and on the third of June following, the marriage was ſolemnized; and therewithal King Henry was publiſhed to be the only Regent of the Realm, and Heir apparent to the Crown of France: the Articles whereof, with all convenient expedition were Proclaimed both in England and in France, and the two Kings, and all their Nobles, and other Subjects of account, were ſworn to obſerve them; and in particular the Duke of Burgoigne.

King Henry affianced to the Lady Katharine, the King of France's Daughter; and withal proclaimed Regent of France, and heir apparent of the Crown.

And thus was the Salique Law violated, and the Heir Male put by his Succeſſion in the Crown, which the Genius of France will not long endure, a while it muſt; and therefore the main endeavour of both Kings now is, to keep him down, whom they had put down. And thereupon on the fourth of June, King Henry with the French King, James King of Scots, who was newly arrived, the Duke of Burgoigne, the Prince of Orange, one and twenty Earls, five and forty Barons, with many Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army conſiſting of French, Engliſh, Scotiſh, Iriſh, and Dutch, to the number of ſix hundred thouſand, marched towards the Dauphin; and upon the ſeventh day laid ſiege to the Town of Seyns, which ſided with the Dauphin, which after four dayes ſiege was yielded up. From thence they removed, having the Duke of Bedford in their company, who was newly come out of England with large ſupplies of men and money to Monſtreau; which was taken by Eſcalado, only the Caſtle held out ſtill: during the ſiege whereof, King Henry created an Officer of Arms, to be King of Heraulds over the Engliſh men, and intitled him Garter; whom he ſent with offers of mercy to the Caſtle, but was by the Captain thereof reproachfully upbraided; for puniſhment of which his preſumption, a Gibbet was erected, and in view of Mounſieur Guitrey, the ſaid Captain, and twelve of his friends were executed. Whereupon thoſe of the Caſtle treated for Peace; but the King in eight dayes together would not grant ſo much as a Parly: ſo that after ſix weeks ſiege, they were enforced, (their lives ſaved) ſimply to yield. From thence the King marched to Melun upon Seyn, and beſieged it the thirtieth of July; the Captain whereof was Barbaſon a Gaſcoigne, no leſs politick then valiant, who countermined ſome, and ſtopt other Mines made by the Engliſh, and fought hand to hand in the Barriers with King Henry: yet at laſt through Famine and Peſtilence was forced to yield; but being ſuſpected to have had a hand in the murther of the Duke of Burgoigne, he was ſent Priſoner to Paris; and preſently thereupon, both the Kings with their Queens, the Duke of Burgoigne, and his Dutcheſs, with a Royal Train came thither, where the French King was lodged in the houſe of St. Paul, and the King of England in the Caſtle of Louvre. And here the three States of France anew under their hands and ſeals in moſt authentick manner, ratified the former Articles of King Henrie's Succeſſion in the Crown of France; the Inſtruments whereof were delivered to the King of England, who ſent them to be kept in his Treaſury at Weſtminſter.

King Henry with an Army of ſix hundred thouſand marcheth againſt the Dauphin.

Garter King of Arms when firſt created.

And now King Henry began to exerciſe his Regency, and as a Badge of his Authority, he cauſed a new Coyn which was called a Salute, to be made, whereon the Arms of France and England were quarterly ſtamped: He placed and diſplaced divers Officers, and appointed the Duke of Exeter with five hundred men, to the Guard of Paris: He awarded out Proceſs againſt the Dauphin, to appear at the Marble-Table at Paris, which he not obeying, Sentence was denounced againſt him, as guilty of the Murther of the Duke of Burgoigne, and by the Sentence of the Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realm.

King Henry makes a new Coin in France called a Salute.

After this, the King making Thomas Duke of Clarence his Lieutenant General of France and Normandy, on the 6. of January, with his beloved Queen Katharine left Paris, and went to Amyens, and from thence to Callice; and thence landing at Dover, came to Canterbury, and afterward through London to Weſtminſter, where the Queen upon St. Matthew's day, the fourth of February was Crowned; the King of Scots ſitting at dinner in his State, but on the left hand of the Queen, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Kings Unkle the Biſhop of Wincheſter being on the right hand. All were ſerved with covered meſſes of Silver, but all the Feaſt was Fiſh, in obſeruation of the Lent ſeaſon.

A Coronation Feaſt all of Fiſh.

After this the King took his Progreſs through the Land, hearing the complaints of his poor Subjects, and taking order for adminiſtring of Juſtice to high and low; and then met the Queen at Leiceſter, where they kept their Eaſter.

In the mean time, the Duke of Clarence making a Road into Anjou, came to the City of Ampers, where he Knighted Sir William Roſſe, Sir Henry Goddard, Sir Rowland Vyder, Sir Thomas Beaufort his natural Son; and returning home laden with prey, was advertiſed that the Duke of Alanſon intended to intercept his paſſage: whereupon he ſent the Scout-Maſter, Andrew Fogoſa, a Lombard, to diſcover the face of the Enemy, who being corrupted, brought report, that their number was but ſmall, and thoſe but ill ordered; that if he preſently charged there there could be no reſiſtance. The Dukes Credulity cauſed him to draw all his Horſes together; and leaving his Bows and Bills behinde, which were his chiefeſt ſtrength, with his Horſe only he makes towards the Enemy: but the Traitor leading to a ſtraight, where by his appointment an Ambuſh was laid, that the Duke could neither retreat, nor flee, he ſoon perceived the Treachery, but finding no remedy, he manfully ſet Spurs to his Horſe, and charged upon the Enemy; but over-laid with multitude, and wearied with fight, was himſelf, with the Earl of Tankerville, the Lord Roſſe, the Earl of Angus, Sir John Lumley, Sir John Verend, and above two thouſand Engliſh ſlain: The Earls of Somerſet, Suffolk, and Pearch, Sir John Berkley, Sir Ralph Nevil, Sir William Bows, and 60. Gentlemen were taken Priſoners. The body of the Duke of Clarence was by Sir John Beaufort his baſe Son, (the Duke dying without other Iſſue) convey'd into England, and buried at Canterbury beſides his Father: and this diſaſter happened upon Eaſter-Eve. The King was at Beverley when he heard of his Brothers death, and preſently thereupon diſpatched away Edmund Earl of Mortaigne into Normandy, making him Lieutenant thereof; and then calls his High Court of Parliament to Weſtminſter, requiring aid by money, to revenge his Brothers death, which was readily granted: and the King thus provided, ſent his Brother the Duke of Bedford with an Army to Callice, conſiſting of four thouſand men at Arms, and four and twenty thouſand Archers, whom about the middle of May he followeth himſelf, and ſafely arriving at Callice, haſted to relieve Charters, which the Dauphin with ſeven thouſand men had beſieged; but hearing of the Kings coming was retired to Tours. The King of Scots, with the Duke of Gloceſter, about the eighth of July beſieged Dreux; which agreed, if it were not relieved by the twentieth of that month, then to ſurrender it: no relief coming it was ſurrendred. The King purſued the Dauphin from place to place, but could not overtake him, but in the way ſurprized the Town of Bawgency, where all that craved it, he took to mercy, as likewiſe he did at Rougemont; from thence he went to Orleance, and from thence to Vignes St. Yon, and from thence to Paris; where having fitted himſelf with ſupplies, he went and ſate down before Menixe in Brye, which after ſome oppoſition, he alſo took; and thereby had poſſeſſion of all the Fortreſſes in the Iſle of France, in Lonuans, in Brye, and in Champaigne.

The Duke of Clarence by treachery ſlain, with divers others.

1422. Queen Katharine is brought to bed of a Son at Windſor: and King Henries Prophetical ſpeech of him.

Upon St. Nicholas day, in the year 1422. Queen Katharine was brought to bed of a Son at Windſor, who was by the Duke of Bedford and Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Counteſs of Holland Chriſtned by the name of Henry; whereof, when the King had notice, out of a Prophetick rapture he ſaid; Good Lord! I Henry of Monmouth ſhall ſmall time reign, and much get, and Henry born at Windſor ſhall long time reign and loſe all, but Gods will be done.

About this time the Dauphin laid ſiege to Coſney, which the King was intentive to relieve, as being a Town of the Duke of Burgoign's; and therefore tendred it more then if it had been his own; and making over-haſty journeyes, he over-heat himſelf with Travel; and coming to Senlys, found himſelf ſo ill at eaſe, that he was forced to remain there, and to ſend his Brother the Duke of Bedford to proſecute his deſign, which the Duke performed, and the Dauphin upon his approach, retired into Berry; whereof in mockage he was after called the King of Berry. But the Kings Fever and Flux increaſing, he was removed to Boys de Vincens; where growing worſe and worſe, within a few dayes he died. But ſomewhat before his departure, he had made his Brother the Duke of Bedford Lieutenant General of Normandy, and Regent of the Kingdom of France, and his Brother the Duke of Gloceſter, he had made Protector of England, and of his Sons perſon: Exhorting all to be true and faithful to the Duke of Burgoign, to be at unity amongſt themſelves, to be loyal to their young Prince, to be ſerviceable to his dearly beloved Queen, to hold and preſerve what he by his Valour and Gods aſſiſtance had won; and never to conclude contract of amity with the Dauphin or Duke of Alanſon, until they had ſubmitted themſelves to the Kings Grace. And ſo giving God thanks for all his favours and bleſſings beſtowed upon him, in the midſt of ſaying a Pſalm of David, he departed this life; who might have juſtly prayed God with David, Take me not away in the midſt of my dayes, for he died about the age of five or ſix and thirty years, which in David's account is the midſt of the number of the dayes of mans life: but though he died in the midſt of his dayes, yet he died in the fulneſs of his Glory; and of whom it may be ſaid,——Jamque arce potitus, Ridet anhelantes duri ad faſtigia montis: When he had reigned nine years and five months.

King Henry with over-haſty journeyes in France, falls ſick and dies.

His Exhortations to his Lords at his death.

Of his Taxations.

IN his firſt year, an incredible ſum of money was given him by the Clergy, to divert him from a motion propounded to take away their Temporalties; and in the ſame year a Subſidy was granted him both by the Clergy and the Laity. In his fourth year was granted him, towards his Wars in France, two whole Tenths of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity; which being far too ſhort to defray his great charge, he was forced to pawn his Crown to the Biſhop of Beaufort his Unkle for a great ſum of money, as alſo certain Jewels to the Lord Mayor of London, for ten thouſand Marks. In his ninth year a Parliament at Weſtminſter, for revenge of the Duke of Clarence's death, two Tenths of the Clergy, and one Fifteenth of the Laity, which becauſe the haſte of the buſineſs could not ſtay the uſual courſe of Collection, the Biſhop of Winchoſter brought in preſently twenty thouſand pounds, to receive it again when the Subſidy ſhould be gathered. The ſame year alſo the Duke of Bedford in the Kings abſence called a Parliament, wherein was granted towards his Wars, one Fifteenth to be paid in ſuch money as was at that time current. Theſe were all the Subſidies that were given him, notwithſtanding his many and great Atchievements, by which it appears what great matters matters a moderate Prince may do, and yet not grieve his Subjects with Taxations.

Of Laws and Ordinances made by him, or in his time.

No gold to be offered in payment unleſs it were weight and thereupon Weight ordained.

HE Ordained the King of Heraulds over the Engliſh, which is called Garter.

In his ninth year in a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, it was ordained that no man ſhould offer Gold in payment, unleſs it were weight; and thereupon were appointed ballances and weights.

An Act made in the thirteenth year of King Richard the ſecond, which diſabled the Alien-Religious to enjoy any Benefices within England, was in the beginning of this King's Reign put in execution; and further, this King excluded alſo the French from all preferment Eccleſiaſtical; and thoſe Priors Aliens Conventual who had inſtitution and induction, were bound to put in ſecurity, not to diſcloſe, or to be diſcloſed, the Counſel and ſecrets of the Realm.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

Sir John Old-Caſtle cenſured for maintaining Wickliff's doctrine.

IN the beginning of his Reign, the Wickleviſts increaſed greatly, of whom Sir John Oldcaſtle was chief; who by marriage of a Kinſwoman of the Lord Cobham's of Cooling in Kent, obtained that Title: This Knight being very valorous, and in great favour with the King, was in a Synod at London accuſed for maintaining of Wickliffe's Doctrine; whereof the King being informed, ſent for him, and inſtantly dealt with him to ſubmit himſelf to the Cenſure of the Church: But Sir John Oldcaſtle told the King, that he owed his ſubjection only to his Majeſty: and as for others, he would ſtand for the Truth againſt them, to the uttermoſt of his life. Upon this he was ſerved by Proceſs to appear in the Archbiſhop's Court, and not appearing, was condemned of Contumacy; and afterwards in a Synod at Rocheſter, was by the Archbiſhop pronounced to be an Heretick; who then enacted that Decree, That the Holy Scriptures ought not to be Tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue. But mark the Judgement that fell upon his own Tongue, whoſe Roots and Blade ſhortly after (as is recorded) grew ſo big in his mouth and throat, that he could neither ſpeak, nor ſwallow down meat, but in horror lay languiſhing, till at laſt ſtarved by famine, he ſo died. In the mean time Sir John Oldcaſtle wrote his Belief, and preſented it himſelf to the King; which the King would in no wiſe receive, but ſuffered him in his Preſence and Privy Chamber to be ſummoned; who appearing before the Archbiſhop, after divers examinations, was condemned of Hereſie, and committed to the Tower of London, from whence ſhortly after he eſcaped, and got into Wales. The King by his Proclamation, promiſed a thouſand Marks to any that ſhould bring him in; but ſo much was his Doctrine generally favoured, that the Kings offer was not much regarded, but he continued four years after undiſcovered: At laſt he was taken in the Borders of Wales, within a Lordſhip belonging to the Lord Powes, who brought him to London, before the Duke of Bedford, Regent of the Realm; where in the end he was condemned, and finally was drawn from the Tower to St. Giles Field, and there hanged in a Chain by the middle, and after conſumed by fire, the Gallows and all. At the time of his firſt Conviction, four years before, it was rumor'd, that twenty thouſand men in Arms were aſſembled in St. Giles Field: whereupon the King, at midnight, himſelf in perſon went thither, where he found many indeed, who upon examination confeſſed, that they came to meet their Captain Sir John Oldcaſtle, but without any intent againſt the King: yet was Sir Roger Acton, and eight and twenty others of them apprehended, and executed in Smithfield; and all the Priſons in and about London were filled with them.

A Judgement of God upon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for denying the Scriptures to be tranſlated into Engliſh.

Sir John Old-Caſtle condemned of Hereſie, is hanged in St. Giles field, in a chain by the middle.

In his third year, the Order of Church Service throughout England, was changed from the uſe of Pauls to the uſe of Salisbury, to the great diſliking of many in thoſe dayes.

In his fourth year, a Council was holden at Conſtance, whither he ſent Ambaſſadours, the Earl of Warwick, the Biſhops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and the Prior of Worceſter: In which Council it was decreed, that England ſhould have the Title of the Engliſh Nation, and ſhould be accounted one of the five principal Nations in rank before Spain; which often before had been moved, but never granted till then. And herein were all Wickliff's Poſitions condemned; Alſo John Huſs, and Hierome of Prague (notwithſtanding the Emperours ſafe Conduct) were both of them burned. In this Council, the Schiſm of Anti-Popes, which had continued the ſpace of nine and twenty years, was reformed. Benedict the 13. had been elected by the Spaniard; Gregory the 12. by the French; John the 24. by the Italians: And now in this Council, begun in February, 1414. and continued above three years; wherein were aſſembled, beſides the Emperour, the Pope, and the Palſgrave of Rhein, four Patriarchs, twenty ſeven Cardinals, ſeven and forty Archbiſhops, one hundred and threeſcore Biſhops, Princes, and Barons with their attendants, above thirty thouſand; The foreſaid elected Popes were all put down, or elſe reſigned; and in the place, as legitimate Pope, was elected Otho Colunna by the name of Martin the Fifth.

In a Council holden at Conſtance, England ranked before Spain.

John Huſſe burned.

Three Anti-Popes put down and a fourth eſtabliſhed.

In this year alſo fell out an accident, which ſhews the ſtrict obſervance of Eccleſiaſtical cenſures in thoſe dayes. The wives of the Lord Strange, and Sir John Truſſel of Warmington in Cheſhire, ſtriving for place at a Sermon in St. Dunſtan's Church in the Eaſt, their Husbands being preſent, fell themſelves to ſtriving in their Wives behalf, and great part-taking there was on both ſides, ſome ſlain, and many wounded. The Delinquents were committed to the Counter, the Church ſuſpended; and upon examination, the Lord Strange being found guilty, was by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury adjudged to this Penance, which was accordingly performed: The Parſon of St. Dunſtans went before, after whom followed all the Lords Servants in their Shirts; after them went the Lord himſelf bareheaded, with a Wax Taper in his hand; then followed the Lady bare-footed; and then laſt, came the Archdeacon Reynold Renwood: in which order they went from Pauls, where the ſentence was given, to St. Dunſtans Church. Where at the re-hallowing thereof, the Lady filled all the Veſſels with water; and according to the Sentence, offered to the Altar an Ornament of the value of ten pounds: and the Lord a Pixe of ſilver of five pounds. A Penance no doubt which the Lord and the Lady would have redeemed with a great deal of money, if the Diſcipline of the Church had in thoſe dayes allowed it: but it ſeems the commutation of Penance was not as yet come in uſe.

Penance enjoyned for ſtriving in the Church.

In his ninth year, in a Parliament at Leiceſter, a hundred and ten Priories alient were ſuppreſſed, becauſe they ſpoke ill of his Conqueſts in France; and their poſſeſſions were given to the King: but by him, and King Henry the ſixth were afterward given to other Monaſteries, and Colledges of learned men.

Works of Piety by him, or others in his time.

THis King re-edified his Royal Manor, which was then called Sheene, now Richmond, and founded two Monaſteries not far from it; the one of Carthuſians, which he named Bethleem; the other of Religious men and women of the Order of St. Bridget, which he named Sion: He alſo founded the Brotherhood of St. Giles without Cripplegate in London. In the ſecond year of his Reign, Moor-gate near to Colemanſtreet was firſt made, by Thomas Fawkener Mayor of London, who cauſed alſo the Ditches of the City to be cleanſed, and a common Privy that was on the Moore without the Wall, to be taken down, and another to be made within the City upon Walbrook, into the which Brook he cauſed the water of the City to be turned by Grates of Iron, in divers places. In his ſixth year, William of Sevenoke Mayor of London, founded in the Town of Sevenoke a Free-School, and thirteen Alms-houſes. This man was found at Sevenoke in Kent, a new born Infant of unknown Parents, but by charitable people was Chriſtned and brought up, bound Prentice in London, and came at laſt to be Mayor of the City. Alſo Robert Chichely Mayor of London gave liberally to the Alms-houſes founded by his brother Henry Chichely, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, at Higham Ferrers in Northamptonſhire, where they were born. But Henry Chichely the Archbiſhop founded two Colledges in Oxford; one called Bernard Colledge, renewed by Sir Thomas White, and named St. Johns Colledge; the other called All-Souls, which continueth at this day as he left it. Alſo John Kempe, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, converted the Pariſh Church of Wye in Kent, where he was born, into a Colledge of Secular Prieſts.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN the fifth year of his Reign, a great part of the City of Norwich was burnt, with all the houſe of the Friers Preachers, and two Friers of that Order. In his third year, on the Feaſt of the Purification, ſeven Dolphins came up the River of Thames, whereof four were taken.

Of his Wife and Iſſue.

HE married Katharine the Daughter of King Charles the ſixth of France, who was his Queen two years and about three months, married at Troys in Champaign the third day of June, 1420. and afterward February the fourteenth Crowned at Weſtminſter. She ſurviving King Henry, was re-married to Owen Teudor an Eſquire of Wales, who pretended to be deſcended from Cadwallader the antient King of Wales, though ſome write him to be the Son of a Brewer, whoſe meanneſs of Eſtate was recompenſed by the delicacy of his perſonage; ſo abſolute in all the lineaments of his body, that the only contemplation of it might well make her forget all other circumſtances. By him ſhe had three Sons, Edmund, Jaſper, and Owen, and a Daughter that lived but a while. Her Son Owen took the Habit of Religion at Weſtminſter, the other two were by King Henry the ſixth (their half-Brother) advanced in honour: Edmund was created Earl of Richmond, and marrying the ſole Heir of John Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, was Father by her, unto Henry the ſeventh, King of England, the only Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter. Jaſper her ſecond Son was firſt created Earl of Pembroke, and after Duke of Bedford, but died without lawful Iſſue. This Queen, either for Devotion, or her own ſafety, took into the Monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwark; who dying the ſecond of January, 1436. ſhe was buried in our Ladies Chappel within S. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter: whoſe Corps taken up in the Reign of King Henry the ſeventh, her Grand-childe, (when he laid the Foundation of that admirable Structure) and her Coffin placed by King Henry her Husband's Tomb, hath ever ſince ſo remained, and never ſince re-buried, where it ſtandeth (the cover being looſe) to be ſeen and handled of any that will. By her King Henry had only one Son, named Henry, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdom.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, lean of body, and his bones but ſmall, but ſtrongly made, ſomewhat long necked, black hair'd, and very beautiful of face, ſwift in running ſo as he with two of his Lords, without Bow or other Engine, would take a wilde Buck or Doe in a large Park. He delighted in Songs and Muſical Inſtruments, inſomuch that in his Chappel amongſt his private Prayers, he uſed certain Pſalms of David, tranſlated into Engliſh Metre by John Lydgate Monk of Bury. And indeed it may be truly ſaid of him as was ſaid of Æneas: Quo juſtior alter, Nec pietate fuit, nec bello major & armis; for he ſeldom fought battel where he got not the Victory; and never got Victory whereof he gave not the Glory to God, with publick Thankſgiving. He was a better man, a King then a Subject; for till then he was not in his right Orb, and therefore no marvail if he were ſomething exorbitant. He was of a merciful diſpoſition, but not to the prejudice of Wiſdom; as thinking wiſe cruelty to be be better then fooliſh pity. He was no leſs politick then valiant, for he never fought Battel, nor won Town, wherein he prevailed not as much by ſtratagem as by force. He was ſo temperate in his diet, and ſo free from Vain-Glory, that we may truly ſay, he had ſomething in him of Cæſar which Alexander the Great had not, that he would not be drunk; and ſomething of Alexander the Great, which Cæſar had not, that he would not be flattered. He was indeed a great affecter of Glory, but not of the Glory, the blaſt of mens mouths, but of the Glory that fills the ſails of Time. He died of full years, though not full of years: if he had lived longer, he might have gone over the ſame again, but could not have gone further. If his love were great to Military men, it was not ſmall to Clergy-men; inſomuch as by many he was called the Prince of Prieſts.

King Henry called the Prince of Prieſts.

Of his Death and Burial.

SOme ſay he was poyſoned, which Polydore Virgil ſaith, was much ſuſpected. The Scots write that he died of the Diſeaſe called Saint Piacre, which is a Palſie and a Cramp: Enguerant ſaith that he died of St. Anthonie's fire: But Peter Baſſet Eſquire, who at the time of his death was his Chamberlain, affirmeth that he died of a Pleuriſie, which at that time was a ſickneſs ſtrange and but little known. Being dead, his body was embalmed and cloſed in lead; and laid in a Chariot Royal richly apparelled in cloth of Gold, was conveyed from Boys de Vincennes to Paris, and ſo to Roan, to Abbevile, to Callice, to Dover, and from thence through London to Weſtminſter, where it was interred next beneath King Edward the Confeſſour; upon whoſe Tomb Queen Katharine cauſed a Royal Picture to be laid, covered all over with ſilver Plate gilt, but the head thereof altogether of maſſie ſilver: All which at that Abbeys ſuppreſſion were ſacrilegiouſly broken off and transferred to prophaner uſes. He died the laſt day of Auguſt, in the year one thouſand four hundred twenty two, when he had reigned nine years and five months, lived eight and thirty years; though ſome ſay, two years fewer.

Of Men of Note in his time.

MEN of valour in his time were ſo frequent, that we may know it to be a true ſaying, Regis ad Exemplum; and men of learning likewiſe in ſuch numbers, that we may know the Prince to have been their Patron: Firſt Alan de Lin, a Carmelite Fryer in that Town, who wrote many Treatiſes; Then Thomas Otterbone a Franciſcan Fryer, who wrote an Hiſtory of England; Then John Seguerd, who kept a School in Norwich, and wrote ſundry Treatiſes, reproving as well the Monks and Prieſts, as Poets for writing of filthy Verſes. Robert Roſe a Carmelite Fryer in Norwich, who writing many Treatiſes, yet ſaid nothing againſt the Wickleviſts. Richard Cayſter born in Norfolk, a man of great holineſs of life, favouring (though ſecretly) the Doctrine of Wickliffe: William Wallis a Black Fryer in Lyn, who made a Book of Moralizations upon Ovids Metamorphoſis; William Taylor a Prieſt and Maſter of Art in Oxford, a ſtedfaſt follower of Wickliffe's Doctrine, and burnt for the ſame at Smithfield, in London, the laſt year of this Kings Reign. Bartholomew Florarius, called ſo of a Treatiſe which he wrote called Florarium; who wrote alſo another Treatiſe of Abſtinence, wherein he reproveth the corrupt manners of the Clergy, and the profeſſion of the Fryers Mendicants. Alſo Titus Livius de Foro Liviſis, an Italian born, but ſeeing he was reſident here, and wrote the life of this King, it is not unfit to make mention of him in this place: alſo many others.

Mayors and Sheriffs of London in this Kings time.

In his firſt year,
Sir William Cromar was Mayor.
John Sutton, John Michael, Sheriffs.

In his ſecond year,
Sir Thomas Falconer was Mayor.

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE SIXTH.

Anno Dom. 1422.

THere hath been a Race of Princes, of which for three Generations together, it might be ſaid rightly, Pulcherrima Proles, Magnanimi Heroes nati melioribus Annis; For King Edward the third had many Sons, not inferiour in Valour to the many Sons of King Priamus, not excepting his valiant Son Hector, having ſo equal a match for him as Edward the Black Prince, who wanted but an Homer to have been an Achilles. Then John of Gaunt likewiſe had divers Sons, men as valorous as any that age afforded. Then Henry the Fourth had four Sons, of ſo Heroical Diſpoſition all, that you might know them all to be his Sons, only King Henry the Fifth to be his eldeſt. And now that in him the Heroical nature was come to the height, it degenerated again in King Henry the Sixth, which muſt needs be attributed to the Mothers ſide; who though in her ſelf ſhe was a Princeſs of a noble Spirit, yet being the Iſſue of a crazy Father, what marvel if ſhe proved the Mother of a crazy Iſſue? And yet even this Iſſue of hers, a Prince no doubt, of excellent parts, in their kinde, though not of parts kindely for a Prince; in a private man praiſe-worthy enough, but the Sword of a King required a harder metal than the ſoft temper of King Henry the Sixth was made of: and in him we may ſee the fulfilling of the Text; Va Genti cujus Rex eſt puer, Wo to that Nation whoſe King is a childe; for he was not above eight months old, when he ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom. Although that Text perhaps is not meant ſo much of a childe in years, for which there may be helps by good Protectors; as of a childe in abilities of ruling, whereof though poſſibly there may, yet probably there can be no ſufficient ſupply: of which in this King we have a pregnant example; for as long as he continued a childe in years, ſo long his Kingdoms were kept flouriſhing by the providence of his careful Unkles; but as ſoon as he left being a Childe in years, and yet continued a Childe in ability of Ruling, then preſently began all things In pejus ruere, & retro ſublapſa referri, all things went to wrack both in France and England. And thus much was neceſſary to be ſaid by way of a Preface to that great fall as it were of Nilus, in King Henry the ſixth.

King Henry but eight months old when his Father died.

Henry called of Windſor, becauſe born there, the only Childe of King Henry the Fifth, as yet ſcarce nine months old, ſucceeded his Father, and was proclaimed King of England on the laſt of Auguſt, in the year 1422. by reaſon of whoſe Infancy King Henry his Father had before, by his Will appointed; and now the Lords by their conſent confirmed the Regency of France to John Duke of Bedford, the Government of England to Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, the Guard of his Perſon to Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Lord Chancellour: wherein it was wiſely provided that one man ſhould not rule all, leſt it ſhould prove a ſpur to aſpiring, and withal ſtay them from envying one another, when many were alike placed in the higheſt form of Authority. And indeed they all carried themſelves ſo uprightly and carefully in their places, that it well appeared the truſt repoſed in them by the dying King, had made a ſtrong impreſſion of love and loyalty towards his Son.

John Duke of Bedford is appointed Regent of France, and Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter Guardian of the Kings perſon.

The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to keep that by the Sword, which King Henry the Fifth by his Sword had gotten; wherein he had many and great Aſſiſtants, ſpecially the two terrors of France, Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot: and amongſt the French themſelves the Duke of Burgoigne, a friend no leſs powerful, then firm unto him. The Dauphin alſo (now crowned King at Poytiers, and called Charles the ſeventh of France, his Father being newly dead, within a little more then a month after King Henry) had likewiſe great aſſiſtants, the Duke of Alanſon, and many other Peers of France, and of the Scots many, and ſome perhaps of the Engliſh that took part with him; by means whereof the game of Fortune was a long time played between them with great variety. The firſt act of the Duke of Bedford's Regency, was an Oration which he made to the French in Paris, which wrought this good effect; that King Henry is Proclaimed King of England, and of France, and ſuch French Lords as were preſent did their Homages, and took their Oaths to be true unto him. The firſt act of hoſtility was performed by the new King of France, who ſends the Lord Granvile to Pont Meulan, who ſurprized it, putting all the Engliſh Souldiers to the Sword: but the Regent ſending thither Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, ſo ſtrongly beleaguered it, that the Lord Granvile not only ſurrendred it, but ſwore Allegiance (though he kept it not) to the King of England. From thence the Earl marched to Seyne, which he took by aſſault; and Aſſiſtants to the Duke of Bedford.

and put all the Souldiers (except the Captain Sir William Maryn) to the Sword.

1423. The Duke of Bedford marries the Sister of the Duke of Burgoigne.

At this time the Regent, the Duke of Burgoigne, John Duke of Britain, and his Brother-in-law the Earl of Richmond, (who revolted afterward to the new King of France, and was by him made Constable of France) met at Amyens; and there not only renewed the old League, but further enlarged it, to the offensive and defensive respectively: and to make the friendship the more firm, the Regent married Anne the Sister of the Duke of Burgoigne at Troys. In this mean time the Parisians taking advantage of the Regent's absence, conspired to have let in the new King into Paris: but the day before the night appointed for his admission, the Regent with his power entred, apprehended the Conspirators, and put them to publick execution. That done, he furnished all the Forts, and places of strength with English men, and sent Sir John Falstoffe, who took in Pacye, and Coursay, two strong Castles; whilst himself with his Forces took in Traynels, and Braye upon Seyne.

The Parisians aspiring are repressed by the Regent.

The Constable of France the mean while with the new Kings Forces, laid siege to Cravant in Burgoigne; but the Regent sent thither the Earl of Salisbury, who set upon the French, and after a long fight, putting them to flight, slew about 1800. Knights and Gentlemen of note, and three thousnd common Souldiers, Scots and French, took prisoners the Constable himself, the Earl of Ventadour, Sir Alexander Alerdyn, Sir Lewis Ferignye, and two and twenty hundred Gentlemen. Of the English part, were slain Sir John Grey, Sir William Hall, Sir Gilbert Halsal, Richard ap Maddock, and one and twenty hundred Souldiers. From thence the Earl led his Forces to Montaguillon, and sate down before it, which after five months siege he took, whilst the Duke of Suffolk took in the two strong Castles of Cowcy, and le Roche.

The Montacute Earl of Salisbury defeats a great Army of the French.

1424. James the first King of Scots, after 18. years imprisonment, is released, and the manner of doing his Homage.

Whilst these things are done in France, in England the Protector ransomed and inlarged the young King of Scots, James the first (who by the space of eighteen years had been kept a Prisoner) which he did out of opinion, that he might withdraw the Scots out of France, taking Homage and Fealty of him for the Crown of Scotlands in these words, I James Stuart, King of Scots, shall be true and faithful to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superiour Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my fidelity for the said Kingdom, which I hold and claim of you, and shall do you service for the same, so God me help, and these holy Evangelists: and therewithal, with consent of all the Nobility, the Protector gave him to Wife, Jane Daughter to the deceased Duke of Somerset, and Cousin-german to the King, with a large Dowry, and married them at St. Mary Overies in Southwark; yet all this courtesie could not keep him afterward from being unfaithful, and unthankful.

And now the Protector sent over to the Regent ten thousand well furnished Souldiers, with which fresh succour he won many Towns and places of strength; which the French seeing, and finding themselves too weak by plain force to withstand the English, they sought by subtilty to compass their ends: and first, they work upon the inconstancy of the Duke of Britain, and his Brother Arthur, by King Henry the fifth created Earl of Yewry, whom by gifts and promises they suborned, perfidiously to deliver over into their possession the Castles of Crotoye, and Yerney: but the English before the French Garrisons were settled, fell upon Crotoye, and recovered it; and that done, the Regent besieged Yerney, and by secret mining, and violent Batteries, so shook the Walls, that they agreed to yield it up, if not relieved by a certain time. Whereupon the Duke of Alanson with sixteen thousand French came to the rescue; but perceiving the English prepared to receive them, he wheeled about to Vernoyle, and swore to the Townsmen that he had put the Regent to flight, and rescued Yerney, which they believing, rendred up Vernoyle to him: but the Regent followed him thither, when by the encouragement of some fresh Companies of Scots come to his succour, he came to a Battel in the Field, where the English, with the loss of two thousand one hundred common Souldiers, and two of the Nobility, the Lord Dudley, and the Lord Charleton, got the honour of the day; and slew of their Enemies, five Earls, two Viscounts, twenty Barons, and above seven thousand other of the French, besides two thousand seven hundred Scots lately arrived: and took Prisoners the Duke of Alanson himself, the Lord of Hernys, and divers other French, and Sir John Tournbul, and two hundred Gentlemen, besides common Souldiers. This Battel was fought the eight and twentieth day of August, in the year 1424. and thereupon Vernoyle was presently re-delivered. After this, the Earl of Salisbury with ten thousand men, taketh in the strong Town of Maunts, the Town of St. Susan, the Fort of St. Bernard, and others; from thence he went to Anjou, where he performed such Heroick acts, that his very name grew terrible in all France; as for instance, the new High Constable perfidious Richmond, with forty thousand men, laid siege to the good Town of St. James in Benyon, the Garrison whereof consisted but of six hundred English, who being driven to some extremity, sallied forth, crying, Saint George, a Salisbury; which word of Salisbury so frighted the French, thinking he had been come to rescue them, that casting away their weapons, they ran all away, saving some few that yielded themselves Prisoners, leaving all their Tents, fourteen Pieces of Ordnance, forty Barrels of Powder, three hundred Pipes of Wine, much Armour, and some Treasure behinde them. After which, other Castles, as that of Beaumont, of Vicount, Teuney, Gilly, Osce, Rusey, Vasick, and many more were taken in by Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Falstoffe; so as once again the French are glad to betake themselves to their old course of fraud; they compounded with a Gascoigne Captain for delivery of Alanson to them; whereof the Regent having notice, he sent the Lord Willoughby and Sir John Falstoffe to prevent it, who encountring with Charles de Villiers, that with two hundred Horse, and three hundred Foot, was come to the place appointed for entry, took and slew them all, except some few Horse which saved themselves by flying. After which, the Earl of Salisbury took in and demolished above forty forty Caſtles and ſtrong Piles, for which there was publick Thankſgiving to God in London.

Whilſt theſe things were done in France, an unkinde variance fell out between the Protector, and his Brother the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Lord Chancellour; for appeaſing whereof, the Regent having ſubſtituted the Earl of Warwick, Lieutenant General in his abſence, came into England: where in a Parliament he compounded all differences between them. In honour whereof, King Henry kept a ſolemn Feaſt, at which time the Regent dubbed the King Knight, not yet above four years old; and then the King preſently inveſted with that Dignity, many of his Servants: and Edmund Mortimer, the laſt Earl of March, at this time dying, his Inheritance deſcended to Richard Plantagenet, Son and Heir to Richard Earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton, who was now created Duke of York, and was afterward Father to King Edward the Fourth: and at this time alſo, John Mowbray, Son and Heir to Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, baniſhed before by King Richard the ſecond, was reſtored to the Title of Duke of Norfolk. And now all things peaceably ſettled in England, the Regent with the Biſhop of Wincheſter returned into France; where, at the interceſſion of the Duke of Burgoigne, the Duke of Alanſon was ranſomed for two hundred thouſand Crowns: and the Biſhop of Wincheſter returned to Callice, where he was inveſted with the Dignity and Hat of a Cardinal, which his Brother the Regent put upon his head.

Richard Plantagenet created Duke of York, Father to King Edward the Fourth.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter made a Cardinal.

In the fourth year of this Kings Reign, a Parliament was holden at Leiceſter, called of the common people, the Parliament of Bats; becauſe, being commanded to lay by their Swords, Servants took great Bats to follow their Lords and Maſters to the Parliament.

An. Reg. 4. 1425.

About this time the Duke of Gloceſter, Protector, took ſome blemiſh in his Honour, by marrying another man's Wife, Jaqueline Counteſs of Heynault, Holland, and Zealand, who was married before to John Duke of Brabant, yet living, and had lived with him ten months as his lawful Wife; but at that time upon ſome diſcontent, gone from him, intending to be divorced. At which injury offered to the Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Burgoigne, being his Couſin, took ſo great offence, that firſt by friendly Letters he admoniſhed the Duke of Gloceſter of it; and that not prevailing, they grew to terms of challenge, and a Combat between them was appointed: but in the mean time the Lady betrayed, was carried to the Duke of Burgoigne, who conveyed her to Gaunt; from whence, by friendſhip of a Burgoignian Knight, in man's apparel, ſhe eſcaped into Holland, and there made a defenſive War againſt her Husband the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Burgoigne. To her aid, the Duke of Gloceſter ſent the Lord Fitz-water, with a power of a thouſand men: but ſhe being diſcomfited by the Duke of Brabant, and the Pope alſo pronouncing the firſt Marriage legal, the Duke of Gloceſter deſerted her, and then took for a ſecond Wife Eleanor Daughter of the Lord Cobham of Sterborough, his old Miſtriſs: and the Lady Jaqueline, after the death of John Duke of Brabant, married a mean Gentleman; whom the Duke of Burgoigne impriſoned, and brought her ſelf to live in much trouble.

The Duke of Gloceſter marries another man's wife, and the trouble that grew about it.

And now in France, the Conſtable with forty thouſand men, beſieged the Town of St. James de Benuron; and having made a breach fit for aſſault, whilſt his Captains ſtood ſtraining of courteſie, which of them ſhould firſt enter, Sir Nicholas Burdet with all his Forces ſallied forth, crying a loud, A Salisbury, a Suffolk: whoſe names ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Beſiegers, that they ſtood like men amazed, of whom ſix hundred were ſlain, two hundred drowned in the Ditches, fifty taken Priſoners, with eighteen Standards, and the Conſtable was glad to quit the place, and give over the ſiege.

Forty thouſand French frighted away with crying, A Salisbury.

At the ſame time alſo the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Scales, with ſeven thouſand, beſieged Ponterſon many weeks together; but Proviſion waxing ſcant, the Lord Scales with three thouſand men went a forraging into the Enemies Countrey: and in his return with plenty of Proviſion, was encountred with ſix thouſand French, of whom he ſlew many hundreds, took above a thouſand priſoners, and then returned ſafe into the Camp.

The Lord Scales defeats an Army of French.

About this time alſo Sir John Falſtoffe beſieged the ſtrong Town of Gravile, which after twelve dayes, offered to render it ſelf by a day, if it were not relieved. The offer was taken, and Pledges delivered; but before the day came, they within the Town had victualled and maned the place, and thereupon neglecting their Pledges, refuſed to render the Caſtle according to agreement: whereupon the Pledges were brought before the ſight of them within the Caſtle, and there openly put to death.

Pledges put to death for not having promiſe kept.

And now a Conſpiracy of the Clergy and Magiſtrates in Maunts ſo prevailed, that the Marſhals of France with five hundred men, about midnight came to the Town-Walls, where the Guard of Engliſh, by thoſe that ſeemed their friends, were ſuddenly maſſacred; and ſetting open the Gates, made way for the Enemy to enter: whereupon the Alarum given, the Earl of Suffolk with the ſurviving Engliſh, withdrew to the Caſtle, wherein they were ſharply aſſailed by the French, who yet had more minde to ranſack houſes, and to make good cheer; whereof the Lord Talbot having intelligence by Captain Goffe, whom he had ſent to diſcover the ſtate of the French, he ſecretly gave notice to the Earl of Suffolk, who thereupon ſallied forth of the Caſtle at a time when the Lord Talbot was ready with his Troops: and on both ſides crying St. George, a Talbot, they fell upon the careleſs French, who loſt four hundred of their beſt men, the reſt were all taken, the Town regained, and the Conſpirators, thirty Citizens, twenty Prieſts, and fifteen Fryers, condemned and put to Execution.

An Army of French defeated with crying a Talbot.

Whilſt theſe things went on proſperouſly in France, a great diſaſter fell out in England; for the right Noble Thomas Beaufort (Son of John of Gaunt, and Katharine Swinford) Duke of Exeter, and Guardian of the King, makes King Henry his Heir: and at Eaſt-Greenwich in Kent, ended his life. Whoſe place was preſently ſupplyed by the Earl of Warwick, and the Earls place in France by the Earl of Salisbury; who thereupon with five thouſand men came to Orleance, Tho. Beaufort Duke of Exeter dies.

Orleance, and beſieged the City, and won from the French the great Fort. But here happened another great diſaſter, for from an high Tower in this Fort, the Beſiegers obſerved the paſſages of the Townſmen; when the Noble Earl of Salisbury, intending to inform himſelf of the State of the Town, unfortunately looking out at a Window of the Fort, with Sir Thomas Gargrave, a great ſhot from the Town ſtriking the Bars of the Window, the ſplinters thereof were driven into his head and face: of which wounds within eight dayes he died. This was now a ſecond weakening to the Engliſh party, but in his place the Earl of Suffolk ſucceeded, to whom the Regent ſendeth Sir John Falſtaffe with freſh ſupplies; whom the Lords De la Brets, nine thouſand ſtrong, endeavours to intercept: but Sir John reſolving to abide the charge, placeth his Carriages behinde, the Horſe next, and the Foot before, lining his Bows with Bill-men, and pitching ſtakes behinde the Archers, who having diſcharged their firſt Volley, retired behinde the ſtakes: on which the French, forgetting their former defeats by that courſe, ran and goared their Horſes, by which their Vaward being diſordered, the Battel, made a ſtand. Which Sir John perceiving, cryeth out, St. George! they flie! at which words they fled indeed, and loſt two thouſand five hundred of their men, with the Lords De la Brets, and William Stewart; eleven hundred were taken priſoners: with whom, and a rich Booty, they came to the Camp before Orleance. And this Battel, becauſe moſt part of the carriage was Herring and Lenten ſtuff, was by the French men called the Battel of Herrings. But the beſieged having notice of this defeat, they offered to ſubmit themſelves to the Duke of Burgoigne; who was contented to receive them, ſo as the Regent would conſent: But the Regent conſented not, and therefore in the mean time, the beſieged made means to the Duke of Alanſon, who furniſhed the Town with freſh Forces and Proviſions; which put ſuch ſpirits into the Citizens, that they made a ſally out, ſlew ſix hundred Engliſh, and adventured upon the Baſtile, where the Lord Talbot commanded, who repelled them with great ſlaughter of their men; but yet the next day the Earl of Suffolk gave over his ſiege, and diſperſed his Army into their Garriſons.

1428. The noble Earl of Salisbury unfortunately ſlain.

Sir John Falſtaffe defeats the French by politick ordering his Army.

The Engliſh ſide begins to go down.

And now the wheel of Fortune began to turn to the French againſt the Engliſh, which once ſet a going was not eaſie to be ſtayed. And firſt the Duke of Alanſon took by aſſault the Town of Jargeux, and in it the Earl of Suffolk, and one of his Brothers, and ſlew Sir Alexander Pole, another of his Brothers, and many other Priſoners in cold blood, by reaſon of a contention amongſt the French, to whom the Priſoners ſhould belong. Preſently upon this, another great blow was given the Engliſh; for the Lord Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, going to fortifie the Town of St. Meum, were encountred by the ſaid Duke of Alanſon, and Arthur of Britain, with three and twenty thouſand men, with whom the Engliſh Lords interchanged ſome Blows: but oppreſſed with multitude, were all three taken priſoners, all ſore wounded, twelve hundred of their company ſlain, and the reſt hardly eſcaping to Meum, where they fortified themſelves the beſt they could againſt future aſſaults.

The Duke of Suffolk taken priſoner.

The Lords Talbot and Scales taken priſoners.

The French King recovers many Towns.

Theſe were great blows given to the Engliſh Fortune in France; Salisbury ſlain, and now Talbot taken Priſoner: which though they made her a little to totter, yet there muſt be great blows given before ſhe will fall. And indeed, theſe diſaſters were ſeconded by the perfidious ſurrender of many Towns and ſtrong holds to the French King; who now encouraged by theſe ſucceſſes, marcheth into Champaign, where by compoſition he took Troyes the chief City of that Province: Chalons rebelleth, and enforceth their Captain to yield it up; by whoſe examples the Citizens of Rhemes do the like, where the French King is anew Proclaimed, and with accuſtomed Ceremonies Anointed and Crowned: whereupon many Towns ſubmit themſelves to him, and revolt from the Engliſh: Upon this the Duke of Bedford (to make the French know, that all the Engliſh ſtrength conſiſted not only in Salisbury and Talbot) with ten thouſand Engliſh, beſides Normans, marched out of Paris, and ſent Letters of defiance to the French King, affirming, that deceitfully and by unjuſt means he had ſtolen many Cities and places of importance belonging to the Crown of England: which he was come to juſtifie by Battel, if he would appoint a time and place. To which the King of France making a ſlight anſwer, the Regent marched apace toward him; and as faſt the King of France marcheth away. The Regent followed him, but could not overtake him, till he came near to Senlys: there both the Armies encamped and embatteled, yet only ſome light Skirmiſhes paſſed between them. And a night or two after, the French King fled with his Army to Bray, which the Duke thinking to be but a plot to draw him further off from Paris, of whoſe fidelity he had no great aſſurance, followed him no further, but returned thither. At which time the Regent's Brother the Cardinal, having prepared Forces to aſſiſt Pope Martin in Bohemia, the Regent borrowed them of him for a preſent expedition; and with them marched into Champaign, where he found the French King encamped upon the Mount Pihall: whoſe number being twice as many as the Regents, yet by no provocations could be down to Battel, but ſecretly fled to Criſpis; whereupon the Regent alſo returned to Paris.

The French King Crowned at Rhemes.

The Regent purſueth the French King.

The French King declineth Battel.

Whilſt theſe things are done in France, in England, upon St. Leonard's day the 6. of November, 1429. King Henry not yet eight years old, was with great ſolemnity Crowned at Weſtminſter: at whoſe Coronation were made ſix and thirty Knights of the Bath, and after the Solemnity, a Feaſt; and if any man deſire to know much Cookery, he may read in Fabian, all the diſhes of meat that were ſerved at that Feaſt.

An. Reg. 8. 1429.

King Henry Crowned at Weſtminſter.

About this time, in France, a ſtrange Impoſtor ariſeth: A maid called la Pucelle, taking upon her to be ſent from God, for the good of France, and to expel the Engliſh: and ſome good indeed ſhe did; for by her ſubtle working the King was received into Champaigne, and many Towns were rendred to him, whilſt the Lord Longuevile

La Pucelle begins to ſhew her ſelf.

Longevile took by ſurprize the Caſtle of Aumerle, and ſlew all the Engliſh that were in it. But all theſe were but petty acqueſts to the King of France: there is a knot of friendſhip between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoigne, which muſt be broken, or he will never be able to compaſs his deſigns. He therefore labours by all means poſſible to diſunite them; wherein he ſo little prevailed, that the Duke of Burgoigne acquaints the Regent with all the practices, who thereupon, with many thanks, exhorteth him to continue firm, of which he ſhould never have cauſe to repent him: and becauſe Normandy was a principal part of the Engliſh ſtrength in France, he goeth thither, and by many reaſons perſwades them, as their Anceſtors had alwaies been, to be faithful to the Crown of England.

In this time of the Regent's abſence from Paris, the King of France drew all his forces thither, uſing all means poſſible, by Eſcalado, Battery, and burning the gates, to enter the City: but was ſo withſtood by the vigilancy of the Citizens, that he was glad to ſound a retreat, leaving his ſlain and maimed Souldiers behind him, all but the Pucelle, who being hurt in the Leg, and almoſt ſtifled with myre in the ditch, was by a ſervant of the Duke of Alanſon drawn up, and conveyed after the King to Berry, who by the way received the ſubmiſſion of the Inhabitants of Laignye. Some other ſervices were performed on both ſides, by the Duke of Suffolk and Sir Thomas Kyrriel, for the Engliſh; by the baſtard of Orleance and Sir Stephen le Hye, for the French; but of no great importance: till at laſt, the Pucelle, (who a little before had cauſed an Engliſh Captain's head to be cut off, becauſe he would not humble himſelf to her upon his knee) was by Sir John of Lutzemburgh taken, and preſented to the Duke of Burgoigne, who ſent her to the Regent, and he to the Biſhop of the Dioceſs, who judicially proceedding againſt her as a Sorcereſs, and deceiver of the King and his ſubjects, ſhe was (after many delaies of promiſe to diſcover ſecret practices, and laſtly of her feigning to be with childe) publickly burnt at Roan.

An. Reg. 10. 1431.

And now the Regent finding how much the Crowning of the French King had furthered his deſigns, he made account the like effect would follow the Crowning of King Henry in France: whereupon he is ſent for to come over; and coming to Paris, was by his Unkle the Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinal of Enſebius, not yet above nine years old, with all uſual ceremonies Crowned King of France, receiving the oaths of Homage and Fealty of all the French Nobility that were preſent, and of all the Inhabitants of Paris, and of the places adjacent. Upon this, Pope Eugenius laboured a reconcilement between the two Kings, but could effect nothing, but only a Truce for ſix years: which agreed upon, King Henry returns into England, and landeth at Dover, the eleventh of February.

King Henry is Crowned King of France in Paris.

A Truce abuſed.

But the ſix years Truce was ſcarce openly proclaimed, when the French had cunningly poſſeſſed themſelves of divers Caſtles and places of ſtrength, juſtifying their actions, affirming, That what was politickly obtained without blowes, was no infringement of the Truce: and afterwards they perfidiouſly conveyed two hundred men into the Caſtle of Roan, with intent to have ſurpriſed it; but being diſcovered, they were all taken, and either ranſomed or put to execution. Upon this, the Regent (whoſe Wife, the Siſter of the Duke of Burgoigne, being lately dead, and he married again to Jaqueline the Earl of S. Paul's daughter, with whom he went over into England) returned again to Paris; to whom the Lord Talbot, having now paid his ranſome, cometh, bringing with him ſeven hundred tried Souldiers; and with them the Regent takes the field, where the French Army lay, but the French ſlunk away in the dark, as not daring to abide the hazard of a battel.

About this time, the Duke of Bourbon, taken at the battel of Agincourt, after eighteen years impriſonment, paying eighteen thouſand pounds for his Ranſome, the ſame day he was enlarged died at London.

The Regent and the Duke of Burgoigne fall at variance, and for what.

And now a very great effect was produced out of a very ſmall cauſe: There had been ſparks of unkindneſs between the two great Dukes of Bedford and Burgoigne, which brake out into a flame upon this occaſion: A time and place was appointed, where they ſhould meet to compound ſome differences that were between them; The place agreed upon, was St. Omers, a Town in Burgoigne: When the time came, they ſtood upon this nice point, Which of them ſhould firſt come to the place; as thinking that he which did ſo, ſhould thereby acknowledge himſelf to be the meaner perſon. The Duke of Richmond thought he had no reaſon to do it, ſeeing he was Regent of France, and therefore ſuperiour to any ſubject in the Kingdom: And the Duke of Burgoigne thought he had no reaſon to do it, ſeeing it was to be done in his own Dominions, where he was himſelf the Soveraign Lord. Upon this nice point they parted without meeting; and the unkindneſs grew afterward to ſo great hatred, that the Duke of Burgoigne choſe rather to be friends with him that had murthered his father, then ever to have any more commerce with the Duke of Bedford. Thus was one great branch of aſſiſtance lopt off from the Engliſh which had been a great means before to make it flouriſh: and it was not ſo much, that the aſſiſtance was taken from the Engliſh, as that it was added to the French: for after this, the Duke Burgoigne brought more aſſiſtance to the new King of France, then ever he had done before to the King of England. By which we may ſee, when the Divine providence hath a work to effect, what ſlight occaſions it oftentimes takes to effect the work.

The Duke of Bedford Regent of France dies in Paris.

Great blowes had been given before in France, to the Engliſh fortune by the enemy, but now a blow was given to it by Deſtiny, which made the Enemies blowes the more incurable; for now the wiſe, valiant, faithful Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Anjou, and Alanſon, Earl of Mayne, Harcourt, Drieux, Richmond, and Carlile, and Viſcount Beaumont, upon the fourteenth of September 1435, ended his life at Paris, which was in a manner the ending the life of the Engliſh fortune in France: all former blowes had been upon inferiour members, members, but this was a blow upon the head, and therefore mortal; and indeed the Engliſh fortune in France, never after lifted up its head but very weakly. He was buried in our Ladies Church at Roan, whereat the Nobility of Normandy much repined, who would have had their own Territory honoured with his Sepulchre: yet ſee the levity of theſe men, who a few years after in the Reign of Lewis the Son of Charles, would have had his Monument to have been demoliſhed, as being diſhonourable, ſuch an Arch-Enemy to France ſhould be interred in the Metropolitan City of that Province. But Lewis anſwered, God forbid, I ſhould give way to ſo diſhonourable an act, to diſquiet his dead bones, who living, would have diſquieted us all; and it ſavours of too much baſeneſs to inſult upon a dead Lion.

The noble diſpoſition of King Lewis of France.

But yet in theſe diſaſters there might have been ſome reparation by a good Succeſſor, had not Envy and Ambition bred diſturbance: the Duke of Somerſet deſired the Succeſſion, but the Duke of York obtained it; which bred ſuch an envy in the Duke of Somerſet towards him, that he laboured nothing ſo much as to croſs his deſigns, and was a means to hinder the Duke of York's going to his charge ſo long, that the Pariſians had time to think of freeing themſelves from the Engliſh ſervitude: and thereupon the City after it had remained ſeventeen years in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, yields to the Conſtable, and upon compoſition expels all the Engliſh; and which was worſe, many other Towns followed this example of Paris, for what Town would not willingly do as Paris did, the Epitome as it were of all France? and which they ſtick not to call Le Monde de Paris, as though there were upon earth no other world but Paris. Even the Normans, who had alwayes been moſt firm to the Engliſh, yet had run the ſame courſe, if the Lord Talbot had not kept them in awe, with the ſlaughter of five thouſand of them that way inclined. And now after theſe great loſſes, we muſt be content to play ſmaller games, caſt at Caſtles and Forts, and ſome ſmall Towns, like the ſtruggling of dying men, doing acts of life, till there be no more life remaining; And this was now our caſe in France. The new Regent with eight thouſand Souldiers arrived at Harflew, and from thence marched to Roan; where he won the reputation of juſtice and uprightneſs, notwithſtanding all the calumniations of the Duke of Somerſet: when the revolted Duke of Burgoigne pretending Title to the Town of Callice, approacheth it with an Army of forty thouſand men, takes the poor Baſtile of Oye, and ſlaughters and hangs many of the defendants. The Picards beſieged the Caſtle of St. Mark, took it, and demoliſhed it; from thence they begirt Callice with a ſiege but were repelled: Then the Duke of Burgoigne ſent the Lord Croy to beſiege the Caſtle of Guyſnes, but were repelled there alſo. In the mean time Pembroke the Herald brought a defiance to the Duke of Burgoigne from the Duke of Gloceſter the Protector, that he would give him Battel if he would abide it; to whom the Duke of Burgoigne anſwered, he ſhould be ſure to finde him where he now was. Whereupon he calleth a Council, and whileſt they are debating what is beſt to be done, the Callicians make a ſally, take the Baſtile which they had builded, by force, and ſlew eightſcore of the Burgoignians; which ſo terrified them, that they upbraid the Duke of Burgoigne, and make both him and the Lord Croy to quit their quarters: and in ſuch haſte to be gone, that they left a great part of their beſt Ordnance, and all their Proviſion for the relief and help of the beſieged. And it ſeems they had reaſon ſo to do, for the next day being the ſeven and twentieth of July, the Duke of Gloceſter landed at Callice, with five and twenty thouſand good fighting men; who finding the Enemy recoiled, forraged all the Countrey thereabout, and for the ſpace of ſix weeks harrowed all the parts of Flanders, Artois, and Heynault: and then returning by St. Omers, Arde and Guiſnes, arrived at Callice.

1436. Paris expells all the Engliſh, and by their example many other Towns likewiſe.

The Duke of Gloceſter the Protector ſends defiance to the Duke of Burgoigne.

The Duke Gloceſter lands at Callice with 25. thouſand fighting men.

And now we muſt look a little home, for the Duke of York returning into England, findes the Caſtle of Roksborough beſieged by the King of Scots, with thirty thouſand men; but he hearing of the Earl of Northumberland's approach, and the Duke's return, incontinently fled. And now again to France, where the Town of Harflew was ſold to the French, but the Duke of Somerſet, and the Lord Talbot beſetting it both by Sea and Land, though the Earl of Ewe, and the Baſtard of Orleance and Bourbon, with four thouſand men came to relieve it, yet upon compoſition it was ſurrendred.

1437. The Dutcheſs of Bedford marries Sir Richard Woodvile.

And here we may have leave to ſpeak of a private matter, for about this time the Dutcheſs of Bedford married Sir Richard Woodvile, a gallant young Gentleman, but of ſmall means; which though it offended her friends, yet it ſeems offended not God, who made her Mother of many Children by him: and amongſt the reſt, of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards married to King Edward the fourth. Alſo about this time James King of Scots, who before had been eighteen years Priſoner in England, and afterward releaſed, with a Wife of a Noble Houſe, a great Dower, and many honourable Preſents, yet proved ungrateful, was murthered in his Bed-Chamber by night, whoſe murtherers being found out, were cruelly tortured.

James King of Scots murthered.

And now again to France, when the Duke of Burgoigne could neither by force nor policy take Callice, he attempted a ridiculous practice, to cut a Ditch that ſhould drown both the Town and Countrey; but after much labour and expence, his deſign like a vapour vaniſhed into air. The Lord Talbot beſieged Tankervile, and after four months ſiege had it rendred to him. In revenge whereof, the French King in his own perſon layes ſiege to Monſtreau; which whileſt the Duke of York was providing to reſcue, he was diſcharged of his Office, done of purpoſe by his Enemies, to lay a blot upon him: A lamentable thing in a State, when private envy ſhall be ſuffered to undermine the publick ſafety; and by this means Sir Thomas Gerard had the more opportunity to ſell the Town, for which, if he were a gainer in money, he was yet a loſer in reputation, and hated both of French and Engliſh, in much diſcontent died. Arthur, Conſtable of France, and John Duke of Alanſon, beſieged the Town of Auranches, but were with diſhonour repelled by the Lord Talbot: After this, Le Hyre ſent Letters to them, that he had a promiſe from divers Burgers of Roan to let them in at any time appointed; againſt which time they came to Ryze, within four Leagues of Roan, but the Lord Talbot having notice hereof, marched covertly to Roan, and from thence before day to Ryze, where he ſurprizeth the French, takes the Lord Fountaines, Sir Alan Geron, and many others, and with a rich booty returneth to Roan. The ſixth day of November, in the ſixteenth year of the Kings Reign, the Earl of Warwick having oftentimes been aboard, and ſtill beaten back by Tempeſts, landed at Harflew with a thouſand freſh Souldiers, and from thence came to Roan; but in the mean time the Duke of Burgoigne ſeeing no new Regent yet come, beſiegeth the Town of Crotoy: to the relief whereof, the new Regent now come, ſent the Lord Talbot with five thouſand men, whoſe approach the Duke not enduring, retired to Abbevile, leaving only four hundred, with whom he had manned the Baſtile by him there erected, which was ſoon gained, and all the Souldiers either taken or ſlain. And there the valiant Talbot ſent word to the Duke, that if he would ſave his Countrey from vaſtation, he ſhould come to a Battel; but the Duke not liking the match, conveyes himſelf to Amyens. Twenty dayes together did the Lord Talbot with fire and ſword, paſs through Picardy and Artois without oppoſition, and then returned. Sir Thomas Kyrriel ſeized upon the Dukes Carriages and Ordnance; and having left in Crotoy, victual enough for ſix hundred men for a whole year, he brought the reſt to the Earl of Warwick. And now Henry Earl of Mortaigne, Son to Edmund Duke of Somerſet, arrived with two hundred Archers, and three hundred Spears, took the Caſtle of St. Anyon, wherein were three hundred Scots and French; the Scots he ſlew all, and hanged the French becauſe they had ſworn fealty to England, and broke it: he took likewiſe the Caſtle of Algarchie, and by means of an Ambuſh, taketh the Lord Camorois, coming to the reſcue thereof. On the other ſide, the Towns of Neuxin, Bry, and Suſan, were ſold and delivered to the French by the treacherous Burgers. In June the Earl of Huntington, with two thouſand Archers, and four thouſand Spears was ſent into Gaſcoigne, whither the Earl of Danois was lately come to buy Towns and Caſtles; but the Earl of Huntington upon his coming thither, changed all the Captains and Officers, whereby he prevented all ſuch Bargains: and ſo far had bribery ſpread it ſelf at this time, that even in Normandy the Engliſh Captains had but ſmall confidence in the Natives, and not much in ſome of their own Nation; whereupon Sir Richard Woodvile, Sir William Chamberlain, and William Peto were ſent thither to ſtop the current of that corruption.

The L. Talbot doth great acts. 1438.

At this time the Council of France procured a reconcilement between the King and the Dauphin, who had been in long jealouſies and diſſention; which if it had not been done, the Kingdom had been torn with Factions, and never been able to ſubſiſt.

And now in a great Froſt and Snow, the Engliſh under the conduct of Sir John Clifford, having covered their Armour with white ſhirts, and their heads with white Alman skulls, came to Ponthois by night, and undiſcover'd paſs'd the Ditches, ſcaled the Walls, ſlew the Guards, and took the Town; but this good luck was accompanied with a bad of more importance: for preſently upon it the Earl of Warwick died in the Caſtle of Roan, and conveyed into England was buried in the Caſtle of Warwick. To reduce Ponthois, the French King in perſon layeth ſiege unto it, when Richard Duke of York being the ſecond time made Regent, having with him the Earl of Oxford, and the Earl of Ewe, levies a power to raiſe the ſiege; and arriving there, ſends word to the King, that the next morning he would give him Battel: but the King liked not his bidding, but leaving his Ordnance, at midnight ſtole away to Poyſſy: thither alſo the Regent follows him, but with no provocations could draw him to fight.

Sir John Clifford gets Ponthois by a wile.

The Earl of Warwick dies. 1439

Richard Duke of York made the ſecond time Regent of France.

About this time, a Treaty for Peace between the two Kings is appointed to be held at Callice, by the mediation of the Dutcheſs of Burgoigne, a Portugal Lady; Commiſſioners meet of both ſides, but nothing concluded, only the Duke of Orleance who had been priſoner to the Engliſh five and twenty years, is by the Dutcheſs mediation ranſomed with three hundred thouſand Crowns of the Duke of Burgoigne's money. The Lord Willoughby beſieged Deepe, which the Dauphin with ſixteen thouſand men cometh to raiſe; and there young Talbot is taken priſoner, with Sir John Peto, and Sir John Repley, but are ſhortly after redeemed by exchange. And now another weakning happened to the Engliſh party, the Earl of St. Paul forſakes them, and is reconciled to the King of France. The Engliſh lay ſiege to Tartus, for the raiſing whereof, the French King marcheth thither with 60000. men, relieveth the Town, and then marcheth to Saverine, which he taketh in, and in it, Sir John Ramſton; after which he took in Arques, but then the Engliſh cutting off all convoyes of Victuals from coming to him, he is forced to return; after whoſe departure, the Engliſh recover all that he had taken; and to boot, take his Lieutenant priſoner, flaying or hanging all his Souldiers. In this mean while the Lord Talbot taketh in Conquet, and driveth the Baſtard of Orleance from the ſiege of Gagliarda; but the French in the Caſtle of Cornhil detained many Engliſh priſoners; for redeeming of whom, Sir Francis the Aragoniſt uſed this ſtratagem, he apparelled half a dozen luſty young fellows like Peaſants, carrying Baskets with Corn and Victuals, and ſends them to the Caſtle, while he with his Company lies in Ambuſh, in a Valley near the Caſtle; the ſix unſuſpected are admitted, and coming to the Captains Chamber, ſeize upon him, and withal give the ſign to the Ambuſh, who coming readily on, entred the Caſtle, put the Souldiers to the ſword, ſet the priſoners at liberty, burnt down the Caſtle, and with the booty and Captain of the Caſtle, returned to Roan.

the Uncle; The Duke of Gloceſter Articles againſt the Cardinal, charging him with affecting preheminence, to the derogation of the Kings Prerogative, and contempt of his Laws; which Articles are delivered to the King, and by him to his Council, who being moſt of the Clergy, durſt not meddle in them, for offending the Cardinal. On the other ſide, the Cardinal finding nothing whereof directly to accuſe the Duke of Gloceſter himſelf, accuſeth his other ſelf, the Lady Eleanor Cobham the Dukes Wife, of Treaſon, for attempting by Sorcery and Witchcraft the Death of the King, and advancement of her Husband to the Crown: for which, though acquitted of the Treaſon, ſhe is adjudged to open Penance, namely, to go with a Wax Taper in her hand, hoodleſs (ſave a kerchiffe) through London, divers dayes together, and after to remain in perpetual impriſonment in the Iſle of Man. The crime objected againſt her, was procuring Thomas Southwel, John Hunne, Prieſts, Roger Bullingbrook a ſuppoſed Necromancer, and Margery Jordan, called the Witch of Eye in Suffolk, to deviſe a Picture of Wax in proportion of the King, in ſuch ſort by ſorcery, that as the Picture conſumed, ſo the Kings Body ſhould conſume: for which they were all condemned: The Witch was burnt in Smithfield, Bullingbrook was hanged, conſtantly affirming upon his death, that neither the Dutcheſs, nor any other from her, did ever require more of him, then only to know by his Art, how long the King ſhould live. John Hunne had his pardon, and Southwel died the night before he ſhould have been executed.

King Henry affianceth the Earl of Arminiack's Daughter, but is by the King of France croſſed.

About this time the Counteſs of Cominges being dead, the King of France and the Earl of Arminiack are Competitors for the Inheritance. The Earl takes poſſeſſion, but fearing the King of France his greatneſs, makes offer of his Daughter in Marriage to the King of England, with a large portion in money; and beſides, to deliver full poſſeſſion of all ſuch Towns and Caſtles as were by him or his Anceſtors detained in Aquitaine, and had been formerly by the Progenitors of the King of England, conquered: The Ambaſſadours for this buſineſs, were by King Henry graciouſly heard, and honourably returned: after whom were ſent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Roſs, and others, to conclude all things; and the young Lady is by Proxy affianced to King Henry: But the King of France not liking the proceeding of the Match, ſendeth the Dauphin with a puiſſant Army, who took the Earl, with his youngeſt Son, and both his Daughters, and gained the Counties of Arminiack, Lonverne, Rovergne, Mouleſſenois, with the Cities of Severac and Cadeack, chaſing the Baſtard of Arminiack out of the Countrey; by means whereof, the marriage was then deferred, and left in ſuſpenſe.

In this diſtraction of Chriſtendom, many Princes, the Kings of Spain, Denmark, and Hungary became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Ambaſſadors of both ſides are ſent, many meetings were had, many motions made; but in concluſion only a Truce for eighteen months is agreed upon. In the mean time the Earl of Suffolk one of the Commiſſioners for the peace, takes upon him beyond his Commiſſion; and without acquainting his fellows, to treat of a Marriage between the King of England, and a Kinſwoman of the King of France, Neece to the French Queen, Daughter to Rayner Duke of Anjou, ſtyling himſelf King of Sicilie and Naples: In which buſineſs he was ſo intentive, that it brought an aſperſion upon him of being bribed: but howſoever, an enterview betwixt the two Kings is appointed, without any warrant of King Henry's part, to be between Charters and Roan. The Commiſſioners return, the Earl of Suffolk ſets forth the beauty of the propoſed Bride, and the great benefits that would redound to the Kingdom by this match. The King was eaſily induced to credit the Relation; but divers of the Kings Council, eſpecially the Duke of Gloceſter, oppoſed it; partly for the meanneſs of the match, her Father being only a Titular Prince, and withal but poor, unable to give any portion at all; and partly for the wrong which ſhould hereby be offered to the Duke of Arminiack's Daughter, to whom the King had been in ſolemn manner publickly affianced. But reaſons could not prevail againſt favour: the Earl of Suffolk's affirmation muſt not be undervalued. And hereupon, a new creation of Lords firſt made, (John Beaufort Earl of Somerſet, made Duke of Somerſet; John Lord Talbot, made Earl of Shrewsbury; John Holland Earl of Huntington, made Duke of Exeter; Humfrey Earl of Stafford, made Duke of Buckingham; Henry Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, made Duke Warwick; Edmund Beaufort Earl of Dorſet, made Marqueſs Dorſet; and William de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, made Marqueſs of Suffolk:) This new Marqueſs honourably accompanied, is ſent into France to fetch the Lady Margaret the propoſed Bride: who ſhortly after is married at Southwick in Hampſhire, and Crowned Queen of England at Weſtminſter, on the 30. day of May, 1444. in the three and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign. And now inſtead of benefits by this Marriage, there preſently followed great inconveniences; for firſt in exchange of her Perſon, the Dutchy of Anjou, the City of Maunts, with the whole County of Mayne, (the beſt props of the Dutchy of Normandy) are agreed to be ſurrendred into the hands of the French: and then the Duke of Arminiack, to revenge the injury offered to his Daughter, is a means to expel the Engliſh out of all Aquitain.

The Earl of Suffolk propounds another match for the King.

Dukes and Earls created.

1444.

King Henry proceeds in the match which the Earl of Suffolk propounded.

At this time the Duke of Somerſet's ſpleen againſt the Duke of York, not only is revived, but is grown ſtronger; for the Duke of York, who was now after the death of the Earl of Warwick, made the ſecond time Regent of France, is ſo undermined by him, through aſſiſtance of the new Marqueſs of Suffolk, who bore now all the ſway with the King and Queen; that not only he ſupplanted him in his place, but planted himſelf in it, to the great heart-burning of the Duke of York and his friends; but he wiſely diſſembled his anger, and for the preſent paſſed it over. And now is no man in grace but the new Marqueſs of Suffolk; all favours from the King and Queen must pass by him, and the extent of his power over-reacheth all the Council: He gets of the King the Wardship of the Body and Lands of the Countess of Warwick, and of the Lady Margaret, sole Daughter and Heir of John Duke of Somerset, afterward Mother to King Henry the Seventh. And now the Kings weakness in judgement grows every day more apparent than other, whilest governed by no Counsel but of his Queen, and she by no counsel but her own will, and the new Marquess of Suffolk: King Henry is himself the least part of the King, and serves but to countenance the devices of others, whereof he little understands the drift; and which proving ill, the blame must needs be his; if well, the benefit and honour others. For by instigation of the Queen, he suffers the Duke of Gloucester, for his care of the Commonwealth called the good Duke, to be excluded not only from Command, but from the Council-Table; and permits informers, set on by the Marquess of Suffolk, the Duke of Buckingham, the Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and the Archbishop of York, to come against him: who lay to his charge, that he had caused divers persons to be executed contrary to Law: wherein though he justified himself, yet no justification would be heard. But to avoid tumultuary part-taking, it was concluded he should be privately convicted and condemned; and to this end a Parliament by the procurement of his Enemies, unwitting to the King, is called at Bury: to which the Duke of Gloucester resorting, is on the second day of the Session, by the Lord Beaumont Lord High Constable (abetted by the Duke of Buckingham) arrested and put in Ward, all his followers sequestred from him, whereof two and thirty are committed to several Prisons, and the next day after his imprisonment, he is found in his bed murthered; yet shewed the same day as though he had died of an Imposthume, though all that saw his body saw plainly he died of a violent and unnatural cause: some say, strangled; some, that a hot spit was put up at his fundament; and some, that he was stifled between two Feather-Beds. His Corps the same day was conveyed to Saint Albans, and there buried. Five of his menial Servants, Sir Roger Chamberlain Knight, Middleton, Herbert, Artzis, Esquires, and John Needham Gentleman, were condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and hanged they were at Tyburn, let down quick, stript naked, marked with a Knife to be quartered; but then the Marquess of Suffolk, to make a shew as though he had no hand in the business, brought their Pardon, and delivered it at the place of Execution, and so their lives were saved. It is no unmemorable thing which Sir Thomas Moor writes of the pregnancy of this Duke of Gloucester. It happened the King coming one time in Progress to St. Albans, a Beggar born blinde, as he said, at the shrine of St. Alban obtained in his sight: which miracle being noised in the Town, the Duke of Gloucester being there with the King, desired to see him, who being brought unto him, he asked if he were born blinde; who told him, Yes truly; And can you now see? (saith the Earl) Yes I thank God and St. Alban, saith the Beggar; then tell me saith the Earl what colour is my Gown? the Beggar readily told him the colour; and what colour saith the Earl is such a mans Gown? the Beggar likewise told him presently, and so of divers others. Then saith the Earl, Go you counterfeit Knave; if you had been born blinde, and could never see till now, how come you so suddenly to know this difference of colours? and thereupon instead of an Alms, caused him to be set in the Stocks. But in the death of this Duke, the Queen, who had a special hand in it, was either not so intelligent or not so provident as she might have been; for as long as he had lived, his Primogeniture would have kept back the Duke of York's claim to the Crown, being but descended from the fifth Son of Edward the Third, where this Duke Humfrey was descended from the Fourth. And here were the first seeds sown between the two Houses of Lancaster, whose badge was the Red-Rose; and York, whose badge was the White-Rose. And now upon the death of this Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York began amongst his Familiars, privily to whisper his right and title to the Crown; but so politickly carried his intent, that all things were provided to further his project, before his purpose was any whit discovered.

And in this time the rich Cardinal and Bishop of Winchester dies, who lying on his death-bed, as Doctor John Baker his Privy Counsellour and his Chaplain writeth, used such like words; Why should I dye, saith he, having so much riches? If the whole Realm would save my life, I am able either by Policy to get it, or by money to buy it: Fie, will not death be hired? will money do nothing? and other words to such purpose. But he being dead, there succeeded in his Bishoprick a more deserving Prelate, William Wanflete, called so of the place in Lincolnshire where he was born, though his name was Patternæ, of the Worshipful Family whereof he was descended. And now to the end the Marquess of Suffolk might not come behinde them in Dignity, whom he went before in Power, he is about this time made Duke of Suffolk.

1448.

The Marquess of Suffolk is made Duke of Suffolk.

In France about this time, a Victory was gotten, which proved no better then an overthrow. Before the Truce was expired, Sir Francis Suryens an Aragonois, a man thought worthy to be admitted into the honourable Order of the Garter, taking advantage of the security of the French Garrisons, suddenly surprizeth a Frontier Town called Fougiers belonging to the Duke of Britain; the Duke advertiseth the French King thereof, who by his Ambassadors complains both to the King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset then Regent in France: answer was made it was the fault of the Aragonois, who did it without warrant from either the King or the Council; nevertheless Commissioners are appointed to meet at Louviers, to treat of some course for satisfaction; but in the time of the Treaty news is brought to the Regent, that the French by a stratagem of a Carter, that with a load of Hey coming over the Drawbridge, caused the Axletree to break, and whilest the Porter was ready to help the Carter, the Porters brains were beaten out, the Town Fraud answered by Fraud.

Town of Ardes ſurprized, and the Lord Fawconbridge Captain thereof was taken Priſoner. Reſtitution being required by the Engliſh, anſwer is made them in their own language, it was done without warrant from either the French King, or any of his Council, ſo it was but one for another; and from thence forward the Truce is broken of both ſides, and all things grow worſe and worſe. The French King by compoſition taketh Lonviers, Gerbury, and Vernoile, whileſt the Regents ſtands demurring what was beſt to be done; if he command, not obeyed; if he counſel, not followed, as it happens to men once blemiſhed in Reputation, to have an ill conſtruction made of all their actions: by which means the French go on without reſiſtance, get Conſtance, Guiſard, Gatiard, St. Loe, Feſthamp, and many other pieces in Normandy. Upon notice whereof, Mauleſſon in Guyen ſurrenders to the Earl of Foix, and by their example the City of Roan it ſelf takes compoſition to ſurrender; where the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, heir to the Earl of Ormond, were kept pledges till it was performed. It is true, ſuccours were provided to be ſent out of England, under the Conduct of the Duke of York; but a Rebellion happening in Ireland, which was thought of more importance to be ſpeedily ſuppreſſed, diverted him and his Forces thither: where not only he ſuppreſſed the Rebels, but ſo won the hearts of that people, that it was no ſmall furtherance to his proceedings afterward. A freſh ſupply indeed of fifteen hundred men, under the command of Sir Thomas Kyriel is ſent over; but what could a handful of men do againſt ſuch multitudes as oppoſed them? For he marching with the reſt of the Army towards Beaugeanx, was encountred by the Earl of Clermont, with ſeven thouſand French and Scots, whom yet at firſt he made to recoil, till the Conſtable of France with four hundred men at Arms, and eight hundred Archers came to the reſcue; and then freſh men coming upon them that were already tired, the Engliſh loſt three thouſand and above ſeven hundred, beſides divers that were taken Priſoners. After this loſs of men, follows preſently a loſs of Towns; Harflew is aſſaulted, and though valiantly for a while defended by Sir Robert Curſon, yet ſurrendred at laſt upon compoſition: Then the French King with an Army Royal, beſiegeth Caen in Normandy, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, defended in his abſence by his Lieutenant Sir David Hall; but the Duke of Somerſet being Regent, in commiſeration of his Dutcheſs being in the Town, notwithſtanding the ſtout oppoſition of Sir David Hall, ſurrenders it upon compoſition to the French; whereof Sir David giving notice to the Duke of York, it bred ſuch a deadly quarrel between the two Dukes, that they were never after throughly reconciled. And thus is all Normandy recovered from the Engliſh, after it had been in their poſſeſſion a hundred years; and finally, all France is reduced to the obedience of Charles the French King.

The French King recovers many Towns, through the demurring of the Duke of Somerſet.

All Normandy recovered from the Engliſh.

And now hereafter there will be little to do abroad, but there will be the more to do at home; and more blood will be ſhed in England by civil diſſenſions, then was ſhed before in all the Wars of France. This loſs of Normandy and other parts in Normandy, is imputed much to the Duke of Somerſet, at that time Regent; but the Duke of Suffolk muſt bear a great part of the blame, partly for having been the cauſe of the ſurrender of Anjou and Mayne, and the chief procurer of the Duke of Gloceſter's death, and partly for having wilfully waſted the Kings Treaſure, and been a means to remove the ableſt men from the Council Board; of all which aſperſions the Queen takes notice, and knowing how far they trenched upon the Dukes deſtruction and her own, ſhe ſo wrought, that the Parliament aſſembled at the Black-Fryers, is adjourned to Leiceſter, and from thence to Weſtminſter: but though all means were uſed to ſtop theſe accuſations againſt the Duke, yet the lower Houſe would not be taken off, but exhibited their Bill of grievances againſt him: That he had Traiterouſly incited the Baſtard of Orleance, the Lord Preſigny, and others to levy War againſt the King, to the end that thereby the King might be deſtroyed; and his Son John who had married Margaret Daughter and ſole Heir of John Duke of Somerſet, whoſe title to the Crown the ſaid Duke had often declared, in caſe King Henry ſhould dye without iſſue, might come to be King: That through his Treachery the French King had gotten poſſeſſion of the Dutchy of Normandy, and had taken priſoners the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Fauconbridge, and others: but to theſe accuſations he peremptorily affirmed himſelf not guilty, ſo much as in thought. Then were further allegations made againſt him, that being with others, ſent Ambaſſador into France, he had tranſcended his Commiſſion; and without privity of his fellow Commiſſioners, had preſumed to promiſe the ſurrender of Anjou, and the delivery of the County of Maunts to Duke Rayner, which accordingly was performed, to the great diſhonour of the King, and detriment of the Crown: That he had traiterouſly acquainted the French King with all the affairs of State, and paſſages of ſecrecy, by which the Enemy was througly inſtructed in all the deſigns of the King and Council: That he had received rewards from the French King, to divert and diſappoint all ſuccours ſent to the Kings friends in France. Upon theſe and divers other accuſations brought againſt him, to blear the peoples eyes, he is committed to the Tower; but the Parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, but he was ſet at liberty. Which ſo incenſed the common people, that they made an inſurrection; and under the leading of a deſperate fellow, ſtyling himſelf Blue-beard, they committed many out-rages: but by the diligence of the Gentlemen of the Countrey, the Captain was apprehended, and the Rebellion ceaſed. And now another Parliament is called, where great care is taken in chuſing of Burgeſſes, preſuming thereby to ſtop any further proceeding againſt the Duke of Suffolk; but his perſonal appearance at the Parliament gave ſuch a general diſtaſte to the Houſe, though he came in the company of the King and Queen, that they forbore not to begin the Aſſembly, with petitioning the King for puniſhment to be inflicted upon ſuch

Accuſations laid to the Duke of Suffolk.

Upon which committed to the Tower is preſently upon the diſſolution of the Parliament releaſed.

An Inſurrection made by Blue-beard ſoon pacified.

The Duke of Suffolk is queſtioned again in Parliament: is baniſhed formally for five years; but taken at Sea, hath his head chopt off.

as had plotted or conſented to the Reſignation of Anjou and Maine, whereof by name they inſtanced in the Duke of Suffolk, John Biſhop of Salisbury, Sir James Fines, Lord Say, and others. This Petition was ſeconded by the Lords of the upper Houſe: whereupon to give ſome ſatisfaction to the Houſes, the Lord Say, Lord Treaſurer, is ſequeſtred from his place, the Dukes Officers are all diſcharged, and himſelf formally baniſhed for five years, but with an intent after the multitude had put out of minde their hatred againſt him, to have revoked him: But God did otherwiſe diſpoſe of him, for when he was ſhipped in Suffolk, with intent to have paſſed over into France, he was met by an Engliſh man of War, taken and carried to Dover Sands, and there had his head chopt off, on the ſide of the Long-boat, which together with the body was left there on the Sands, as a pledge of ſome ſatisfaction for the death of Duke Humfrey.

The Duke of York begins to make his way to the Crown.

Whileſt theſe things are done in England, the Duke of York in Ireland began to make his way to the Crown, as deſcended from Philippa, Daughter and Heir to Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder Brother to John of Gaunt, great Grandfather to the preſent King Henry the ſixth. And for a beginning it is privately whiſpered, that King Henry was of a weak capacity, and eaſily abuſed; the Queen of a malignant ſpirit, and bloodily ambitious; the Privy Council, if wiſe enough, yet not honeſt enough, regarding more their private profit, then the publick good; that through their delinquencies, all France was loſt, and that God would not bleſs the uſurped poſſeſſion of King Henry. With theſe ſuggeſtions the Kentiſh men ſeemed to be taken; which being obſerved by an inſtrument of the Duke of York, called Mortimer, he takes his time, and tells the multitude, that if they will be ruled by him, he will put them in a courſe to work a general Reformation, and free them for ever, from thoſe inſupportable burthens of Taxations, ſo often, upon every ſlight occaſion obtruded upon them. Theſe promiſes of Reformation and Freedom from Impoſitions, ſo wrought with the people, that they drew to a head, and make Mortimer, otherwiſe Jack Cade, their Leader; who ſtyling himſelf Captain Mend-all, marched with no great number, but thoſe well ordered to Black-heath, where between Eltham and Greenwich, he lay by the ſpace of a month exerciſing his men, and ſending for whom he pleaſed, and for what he pleaſed. Then he preſents to the Parliament the complaints of the Commons, That the Queens Favourites ſhare amongſt them the Revenues of the Crown, whereby the King is enforced for the ſupportation of his preſent eſtate, to tax and burthen the Commons, to their utmoſt undoing, and to the general impoveriſhment of the Kingdom: That the Commons have their commodities daily taken from them for the purveyance of the Kings Houſhold, for which they are not paid, nor any aſſurance for payment thereof given, but only Court-promiſes: That upon the apprehenſion of any man for Treaſon or Felony, the Kings menial Servants, before conviction, beg the Goods and Lands of the impeached; whereupon indirect and unlawful proceedings are uſed by ſubornation of witneſſes, embracery of Jurors, and great mens Letters to the Judges; whereby Juſtice is perverted, and the Innocent after attainted, if not executed, yet at leaſt impriſoned to their undoing: That the Commons have no legal proceedings in their Law-ſuits, ſo as the rightful owners of Inheritance dare not, (if oppoſed by any Courtier) maintain their Titles, or attempt the recovery of their intereſt, how juſt ſoever: That the Kings Collectors and other Accomptants are much troubled in paſſing their Accompts by new extorted Fees; and by being inforced to procure a late invented Writ of Quorum Nomina, for allowance of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and their ſuing out their Quietus at their own charge, without allowance from the King: That the Bayliffs of Sheriffs, under colour of the Green Wax out of the Exchequer, do levy greater ſums then are by the Record juſtifiable, yet maintained: That they cannot have the freedom of electing Knights and Burgeſſes for the Parliament; but by Letters from the Favourites of the Court, to their Friends and Retainers, the Knights and Burgeſſes are commoniy choſen: That they are too much troubled with too often coming to attend the general Seſſions, being enforced in many places to make five dayes journey to the place where they are kept. Theſe and ſome other were the complaints of the Commons; but the Captain for his own particular (after proteſtation made to live and dye in the quarrel of the King) required that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to receive again into favour, the truly noble Prince the Duke of York, and with him the Right Honourable the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, and the ancient Noblemen of the Realm, by the undue practices of Suffolk and his complices, commanded from his preſence; and that all their oppoſites might be baniſhed the Court, and put from their Offices: That there might be a general amotion of corrupt Officers, an aboliti-on of the Green Wax, and other Inſtruments of Extortion out of the Exchequer; a qualification of proceedings in the King's-Bench; an inhibition of unequal purveyance of proviſion for the Kings Houſhold, and a preſent execution of the Promoters, Slegge, Cromer, Iſell, and Eaſt, whom he pretended by wrongful information to have abuſed the King, and wronged his Subjects. Theſe Petitions are ſent from the Lower-Houſe to the Upper, and from thence committed to the Lords of the Kings Privy Council; who having examined the particulars, explode them as frivolous, and the Authors thereof to be preſumptuous Rebels. Whereupon the King is ſolicited by his Privy Council, to proſecute them by force rather than intreaty; which advice is ſeconded by the Queen, as conceiving they ſecretly aimed at her: and hereupon the King draws his Forces to Greenwich, and appointeth divers Lords to aſſail the Rebels; but the Lords could get no followers to fight againſt them who ſought only for reformation of abuſes, and for puniſhment of ſuch Traytors as the Lord Say the Kings Chamberlain was. Whereupon the Lord Say is preſently committed to the Tower, the King and Queen

Jack Cade makes an Inſurrection; and brings an Army to Black-heath.

He preſents the complaints of the Commons to the Parliament.

The Complaints are exploded by the Kings Privy Council.

The King raiſeth an Army to ſuppreſs the Rebels.

Queen retire to London, from whence within two dayes, the King being now fifteen thousand strong, marcheth in person towards Captain Mend-all, who politickly withdraweth his Forces into Sevenoke-Wood; upon notice whereof the King retireth again to London, but the Queen longing for dispatch, sends the two Staffords, Sir Humfrey and William, with many hot-spurs in the Court, to follow the Rebels, who were soon cooled; for they found Captain Mend-all in good order ready to receive them, and in the first encounter, slew Sir Humfrey, and afterwards his Brother, and put all the rest to flight. The Kings Forces being at Black-heath, could neither by threats nor intreaties be gotten to go to the Rescue; but rather wished the Queen and her Favourites in the Staffords case: or that the Duke of York were in England, to aid his Cousin Mortimer (now first acknowledged to be of his kindred) and many of them stole away to the Rebels, whose number from Suffex and Surrey daily increased, whom yet their Captain restraineth from forraging or taking away any thing by force; and so returneth again to Black-heath, where the Kings Army lay the night before, but was now fallen down to Greenwich. And now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham are sent to expostulate with the Rebels about their demands; to whom Jack Cade gave very good language, but directly affirming no cessation from Arms, unless the King in person would hear the grievances of the Subject, and pass his Princely word for the reformation of their wrongs. This resolution of his made known to the King, who was not sure of his own Souldiers Faith, made him march presently away to Killingworth Castle in Warwickshire, where he fortified himself as expecting a siege, having left the Lord Scales only to guard the Tower. Jack Cade taking advantage of the Kings departure, cometh to Southwark, where he quarters his men, straitly charging them to commit no out-rage, nor do wrong to any; which was duly observed. The next morning he marcheth to London-Bridge, where he caused his men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-Bridge, no resistance being made against him; and so in good order marched up by London-stone, upon which he strook his Sword, saying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London. The Mayor of London, Sir Thomas Chalton, standing upon the threshold of his door, bade him take heed he attempted nothing against the quiet of the City; To whom he made answer, Let the world take notice of our honest intention by our actions. And indeed this orderly carriage of himself and his company won him a good opinion amongst the common sort of people: And now assuming to himself the place of Chief, he sendeth out his Letters of safe conduct, to such whom he pleased to make use of; amongst other, he wrote this Letter to Thomas Cock, Draper of London.

The Rebels slay Sir Humfrey and Sir William Stafford.

The King flieth to Killingworth Castle.

Jack Cade cometh to London.

By this our writing ensealed, we grant, That Thomas Cock of London Draper, shall safely come into our presence, and avoid from us again at his pleasure, with all other persons coming in his company. Subscribed thus,

His Majesties loyal Subject, John Mortimer, Captain Mend-all.

Upon Cock's admission, he had private conference with three other that came with him; to whom at their departure he gave these instructions in writing: You shall charge all Lombards and Merchant-strangers, Genoeses, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this day to draw themselves together, and to ordain for us the Captain, twelve Harness compleat of the best fashion, four and twenty Brigandines, twelve Battle-axes, twelve Glaves, six Horses with Saddle and Bridle compleatly furnished, and a thousand Marks in ready Money: and if they shall fail herein, we shall strike off the heads of as many as we can get. But they failed not, but sent him what he had demanded: who thereupon the next morning, being the third of July, returns to London; and presently sends to the Lord Scales, to bring his Prisoner the Lord Say to the Guild-hall, whither he had called the Lord Mayor with his Brethren; before whom he caused the Lord Say to be arraigned, who craving to be tried by his Peers, was forthwith taken from his Keeper, carried to the Standard in Cheap, and there had his head chopt off; which being pitched upon a Pike, was borne before him to Mile-end, whither he went to have conference with the Rebels of Essex; and by the way meeting with Sir James Cromer, High Sheriff of Kent, who had lately married the Lord Say's Daughter, he caused his head also to be strucken off, and carried likewise before him in derision. The next morning he came again to London; where after publick execution done upon some of his fellows, and particularly upon a petty Captain of his, named Paris, that had done things contrary to his Proclamation; upon a displeasure taken against Alderman Malpas, he sent and seized upon all his Wares and Goods, and fined Alderman Horn in five hundred Marks. Whereupon, the Citizens finding him to grow every day more insolent then other, they sent to the Lord Scales for assistance, who sendeth Matthew Gout an old Souldier to them, with some Forces and Furnitures out of the Tower; who presently make a stand at the Bridge, where Cade notwithstanding forceth his passage, and then began to set fire on houses, where many aged and impotent people miserably perished. Captain Bough, Alderman, Sutton and Robert Hayson, valiantly fighting, were slain; yet upon a fresh supply, the Londoners recovered the Bridge again, and drove the Rebels beyond the Stoop in Southwark; at which time, both sides being weary, agreed of a Truce, till the next day. After the Retreat, Cade finding he had lost many of his best men, was driven, for supply, to set at liberty all the Prisoners in Southwark, as well Felons as Debtors; when now his company entring into consideration of their danger, and of the desperate Services their Captain had brought them to, began to discover by their countenances, their willingness to leave this course: whereof the Archbishop of Canterbury having notice, he with the Bishop of Winchester came from the Tower by water to Southwark, and there shewed the Kings General Pardon under the Great Seal of England; which was so welcome to the Rebels, that without taking leave of their Captain, they withdrew drew themſelves that night to their ſeveral habitations. Jack Cade with ſome few followers, bent his journey to Queenborough Caſtle, where being denyed entrance, he diſguiſed himſelf, and privily fled; but upon Proclamation, with promiſe of a thouſand Marks to any that ſhould bring him dead or alive, he was afterward, by one Alexander Eden Gentleman, attached: and making reſiſtance, in a Garden at Hothfield in Suſſex, was there ſlain. His body was brought to London, beheaded and quartered, his head ſet upon London-Bridge, his quarters diſperſed in divers places in Kent. Upon the news whereof, the King ſends Commiſſioners into Kent, to enquire of the Abettors of this Rebellion; whither he followeth himſelf in perſon: and though five hundred were found guilty, yet eight only were executed. Though London were the chief ſtage of this Rebellion, yet other Countreys were not free, eſpecially Wiltſhire; for the Rebels there, upon the nine and twentieth day of June, drew William Askot Biſhop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, where he was ſaying Maſs in Edington Church, to the top of the Hill: and there in his Prieſtly Robes moſt inhumanely murthered him.

Jack Cade flieth and is ſlain.

This Inſurrection was not unknown to the King of France, who taking advantage thereof, ſeizeth upon all places which the Engliſh had in France, leaving them nothing but only Callice, and the Caſtles of Hames and Guiſnes; and this was the Iſſue of the Duke of Somerſet's Regency in France: whereupon coming into England, at a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the ſixth of November in the nine and twentieth year of the Kings Reign, he was put under Arreſt. Upon notice whereof, the Commons at London deſpoiled his houſe at Black-fryers, and ceaſed not till Proclamation was made to prohibit them; for diſobeying whereof, there was one man beheaded, at the Standard in Cheap.

Upon this Inſurrection in England, the King of France ſeizeth upon all the Engliſh Territories, and leaves the Engliſh nothing but Callice.

At this time the Duke of York under pretence of coming to the Parliament, comes out of Ireland; and at London had private conference with John Duke of Norfolk, Richard Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Devonſhire, and other his aſſured friends: where it was reſolved to keep the chief purpoſe, (the Claim to the Crown) ſecret, and only to make ſhew, that his endeavours were but to remove ill Counſellors from the King, of whom they inſtanced in the Duke of Somerſet as chief; and hereof, the Duke ſent divers Letters to the King, complaining of the wrongs the Duke of Somerſet had done him, but withal making proteſtation of his own Loyalty. To which the King maketh anſwer, that he would take his complaints into conſideration; but ſomewhat blames him for the death of the Biſhop of Cheſter, by his means ſuſpected to be ſlaughtered; and for dangerous ſpeeches uttered by his Servants, tending to Rebellion: concluding, that notwithſtanding any thing ſaid or done to the contrary, he took and eſteemed him a faithful Subject, and a loving Kinſman. But the Duke of York, not herewith ſatisfied, departeth into Wales, and there levieth men, making his colour for the good of the Commonwealth, and the removing of bad Counſellours. The King advertiſed hereof, preſently raiſeth an Army; and with the Duke of Somerſet (now enlarged) marcheth toward Wales: while the Duke of York having notice which way the King came, by another way marcheth toward London; who being told, the Londoners would not admit him entrance, he paſſed the River Thames at Knightbridge, marched into Kent, and encamped at Burnt-heath. The King in his purſuit came to Black-heath, and there pitched his Tents; from whence he ſent the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely, the Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of the Privy Seal, to know the cauſe of this commotion: and to make offer of reconcilement, if the Duke's demands were not unreaſonable. The Duke made anſwer, that nothing was intended againſt the Kings Perſon, his Crown or Dignity: All that was ſought, was to remove ill Counſellours from about the King, but eſpecially Edmund Duke of Somerſet; whom if the King would be pleaſed to commit to ward, till his Legal Trial might be had in Parliament, he would then not only diſmiſs his Army, but come unto his preſence as a loyal Subject. Hereupon the Duke of Somerſet is committed to priſon: The Duke of York diſmiſſeth his Army, and cometh in perſon to the King; in whoſe preſence, (contrary to his expectation) he found the Duke of Somerſet, which ſo moved him, that he could not hold, but preſently charged him with Treaſon: which the Duke of Somerſet not only denieth, but recriminates the Duke of York to have conſpired the King's death, and the uſurpation of the Crown. Whereupon, the King removeth to London, the Duke of York as a Priſoner riding before him, and the Duke of Somerſet at liberty; which was not a little marvelled at by many. And now the King calleth a Council at Weſtminſter, where the two Dukes are earneſt in accuſing each other; but while the Council are debating of the matter, there comes a flaſh of lightning out of France, which diverted them. For the Earl of Kendal, and the Lord L'Eſpar, came Ambaſſadors from Burdeaux, offering their obedience to the Crown of England; if they might but be aſſured to be defended by it: but withal, at the ſame time there came a report, that Edward Earl of March, Son and Heir to the Duke of York, with a great power as marching towards London. Here was matter for a double conſultation, and for this latter, it was reſolved on, that the Duke of York, ſhould in the preſence of the King and his Nobility, at the High Altar in Pauls, take his Oath of Submiſſion and Allegiance to King Henry; which he accordingly did, and then had liberty to depart to his Caſtle at Wigmore. And for the former, the Earl of Shrewsbury with about three thouſand men was ſent into Gaſcoigne, who arriving in the Iſle of Mardre, paſſed forth with his power, and took Fronſack and other pieces; but having received in the night inſtructions from Burdeaux of certain Conſpirators, he makes all the ſpeed he can thither: and was entred the Town before the French had notice of his coming; ſo that many of them were ſlain by the Lord L'Eſpar in their beds. Shortly after there arrived the Earl of Shrewsbury's Son, Sir John Talbot, with the baſtard of Somerſet, and two and twenty hundred men, by whoſe means Burdeaux deaux is well manned with Engliſh, in which time the Earl was not idle, but went from place to place to receive the offered ſubmiſſion of all places where he came: and having taken Chatillon, he ſtrongly fortified it; whereupon the French King raiſeth an Army, and beſiegeth Chatillon, to the reſcue whereof, the Earl maketh all poſſible ſpeed with eight hundred Horſe, appointing the Earl of Kendal, and the Lord L'Eſpar to follow with the Foot. In his way he ſurpriſeth a Tower the French had taken, and put all within it to the Sword; and meeting five hundred French men, that had been forraging, many of them he ſlew, and the reſt he chaſed to their Camp. Upon whoſe approach the French left the ſiege, and retired to a place which they had formerly fortified; whither the Earl followeth them, and reſolutely chargeth them ſo home, that he got the entry of the Camp: where being ſhot through the Thigh with an Harquebuſs, and his Horſe ſlain under him, his Son deſirous to releive his Father, loſt his own life, and therein was accompanied with his Baſtard Brother Henry Talbot, Sir Edward Hall, and thirty other Gentlemen of name. The Lord Molins with threeſcore other were taken Priſoners, the reſt fled to Burdeaux, but in the way a thouſand of them were ſlain. And thus on the laſt day of July, in the year 1453. at Chatillon, the moſt valorous Earl of Shrewsbury, the firſt of that name, after four and twenty years ſervice beyond the Seas, ended his life and was buried at Roan in Normandy with this Inſcription upon his Tomb, Here lieth the Right Noble Knight John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Wexford, Waterford, Valence, Lord Talbot of Goodrich, and Orchenfield, Lord Strange of Blackmere, Lord Verdon of Acton, Lord Cromwel of Winkfield, Lord Lovetoft of Warſoppe, Lord Furnival of Sheffield, Knight of the Noble Orders of St. George, St. Michael, and the Golden Fleece, great Marſhal to King Henry the Sixth, of his Realm of France. The Earl of Kendal, the Lords Montferrat, Roſaine, and Dangledas entred the Caſtle of Chatillon, and made it good againſt the French the ſpace of ten dayes; but then having no hope of ſuccour they delivered it, upon compoſition to have liberty to depart to Burdeaux: and now the Gaſcoignes were as ready to open their Gates to the French, as they were before to the Engliſh; by means whereof, in ſhort time, the French recovered again all Gaſcoigne except Burdeaux, and that alſo at length, upon condition that both Garriſons and Inhabitants with all their ſubſtance might ſafely depart for England or Callice, and that the Lords L'Eſpar and Durant, with thirty others, upon pain of death ſhould never after be found in the Territories of France.

Talbot Earl of Shrewſbury after many victories is at laſt ſlain.

The Inſcription upon his Tomb.

A difference on Bartholomew day, between the Mayor of London, and the Prior of St. Johns.

At this time upon St. Bartholomew's day, an ancient cuſtom being, that the Mayor of London, and the Sheriffs ſhould be preſent in giving prizes to the beſt Wreſtlers, it happened that at the Wreſtling-place near Moor-fields, the Prior of St. Johns was there to ſee the ſports, when a ſervant of his not brooking the diſgrace to be foiled before his Maſter, againſt the cuſtom of the place, would have wreſtled again, which the Mayor denied; whereupon the Prior fetcht Bow-men from Clerkenwel, to reſiſt the Mayor, and ſome ſlaughter was committed; the Mayors Cap was ſhot through with an Arrow, he nevertheleſs would have had the ſport go on, but no Wreſtlers came: yet the Mayor Sir John Norman told his Brethren, he would ſtay a while to make trial of the Citizens reſpect towards him; which he had no ſooner ſaid, but the Citizens with Banners diſplayed came in great numbers to him, and fetcht him home in great triumph. Upon the neck of this began the quarrel in Holborn, between the Gentlemen of the Inns of Chancery, and ſome Citizens; in appeaſing whereof, the Queens Atturney and three more were ſlain.

And now the Duke of York by all means laboureth to ſtir up the hatred of the Commons againſt the Duke of Somerſet, repeating often what diſhonour England ſuſtained by Somerſet's giving up the ſtrong Towns of Normandy; and how he abuſed the Kings and Queens favour to his own gain, and the Commons grievance: then he addreſſeth himſelf to thoſe of the Nobility that could not well brook his too much commanding over the Kings and Queens affection. Amongſt others he faſtneth upon the two Nevils, both Richards, the Father and the Son, the one Earl of Salisbury, the other of Warwick; with whom he deals ſo effectually, that an indiſſoluble knot of friendſhip is knit betwixt them: by whoſe aſſiſtance (the King lying dangerouſly ſick at Claringdon) the Duke of Somerſet is arreſted in the Queens great Chamber, and ſent to the Tower; and in a Parliament now convoked, appeached of Treaſon, and many hainous crimes objected againſt him. Whereupon the King, though weak, is brought to London, of purpoſe to diſſolve the Parliament; and that diſſolved, the Duke of Somerſet is preſently ſet at liberty again, and not only ſo, but is made Captain of Callice and Guiſnes, the only remainder the Engliſh had in France. Upon this the Duke of York and his party, with a great power, march towards London; againſt whom, the King attended with the Duke of Somerſet, the Duke of Buckingham, and his Son, both named Humfrey, Henry Earl of Northumberland, James Earl of Wiltſhire, Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, and two thouſand men, marched forwards; at St. Albans both Armies meet: The Duke in the morning ſends a Letter to the King, proteſting his fidelity and ſincerity, only he deſires the Duke of Somerſet may be delivered, to ſtand or fall by the Judgement of his Peers; and this he would have, or dye in the purſuit. The King for anſwer, commands him to disband, and ſubmit to his mercy, and not expect, that he will deliver any in his Army, who have ſhewed their loves in ſtanding to him. Herewith the Duke acquaints his friends, who hereupon fall every one to his quarter: The Earl of Warwick fell upon the Lord Clifford's quarter, where the Duke of Somerſet hatting to the reſcue, was ſlain, and with him the Earl of Northumberland, Humfrey Earl of Stafford, the Lord Clifford, and about five thouſand others, beſides many that were hurt; the King himſelf ſhot in the neck with an Arrow; the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scales, in the faces; the Earl of Dorſet ſo hurt, that he was fain to be carried

The Duke of Somerſet is ſent to the Tower.

But ſoon ſet at liberty, and made Captain of Callice.

The Duke of York's Army and the Kings have a Battel, where the Duke of Somerſet, and other Lords are ſlain.

ried home in a Cart: The Kings Army had been increaſed after his coming forth to eight thouſand; but now they are all diſperſed or ſlain; and the King unguarded, is left in a poor thatcht houſe, whither, to be freed from the danger of Arrows, he had withdrawn himſelf. The Duke of York having notice where the King was, goes with Warwick and Salisbury; who all three upon their knees, preſent themſelves before him, making humble Petition to him for pardon of what was paſt: and now ſeeing the common enemy was ſlain, they had what they aimed at. To whom the King throughly affrighted, ſaid, Let there be no more killing then, and I will do what you will have me. This firſt Battel of St. Albans was fought upon the three and twentieth day of May, in the three and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign. The bodies of the Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford were buried in the Chappel there. And now the Duke of York in the Kings name, commands a ſurceaſe from further hoſtility: and in all reverent manner conveyeth the King to London, where they keep the Feaſt of Pentecoſt together. At which time a Parliament is ſummoned to begin at Weſtminſter, the ninth day of July; and therein it is enacted, that the Duke of Glocester ſhould be declared publickly a Loyal Subject, and that none ſhould miſreport or diſpute the actions of the Duke of York; or of any in his company: and moreover the Duke of York is made Protector of the Kings Perſon, and of the Realm, the Earl of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earl of Warwick Captain of Callice, wherein they all carried themſelves with unblamable demeanour.

The King flieth.

The Duke of York is made Protector of the Kings perſon, and of the Realm.

In this mean time, the Queen not well pleaſed with theſe proceedings, ſeeks all means to incite the Lords of her party, and they as much ſeek to incite her to make oppoſition; ſhe puts the Duke of Buckingham in minde that theſe Traitors had ſlain his hopeful Son at St. Albans; ſhe tells the now Duke of Somerſet, that by them his dear Father loſt his life: And they again put the Queen in minde of the unſufferable indignity done to her, in making her Husband only a King in name, ſetting a Tutor over him, as though he were a childe, whileſt the Duke of York and his complices manage all. Upon which incitation, all the Enemies of the Yorkſhire Faction are aſſembled by the Queen at Greenwich; where it is debated of ſome courſe to be taken for reſtoring the King to his former liberty and Government. At length it is concluded, that the Duke of York ſhould be commanded to give over his place of Protectorſhip, for that the King was of years and diſcretion ſufficient to rule of himſelf without a Guardian; and the Earl of Salisbury to ſurrender his place of being Lord Chancellour, for that the great Seal was never delivered him, ſeeing that which was now uſed, was made ſince the Kings reſtraint, and therefore not ſufficient: to which concluſion of theirs, the King, eaſie to be wrought upon, yields his conſent, and thereupon they are both diſcharged from their Offices, and ſummoned to appear at the Council Table at Greenwich. But the Lords were wiſer then to put themſelves into their hands, and therefore make anſwer, that none had power to diſplace them, nor to command their appearance in any place, but in Parliament; and ſo they continued about London, placing and diſplacing whom they pleaſed, and by their triumvirate authority, took John Holland Earl of Exeter out of Sanctuary, and ſent him priſoner to Pomfret Caſtle. Theſe proceedings gave occaſion to the licencious multitude to raiſe commotions, and the Prentices of London upon a very ſlight occaſion, fall upon out-landiſh Merchants, rifle and rob their houſes; and the Mayor aſſembling a company of ſubſtantial Citizens to ſuppreſs them, the Ring-leader of the diſorders flies to Sanctuary, Commiſſioners are ſent to enquire and puniſh the offence; but when the Mayor and Commiſſioners were ſet, tidings came that the Commons were up in Arms; whereupon the Commiſſioners left the buſineſs to be proceeded in by the Mayor, who ſo diſcreetly ordered the matter, that many of the offenders were puniſhed, ſome by death, others by fine, and all things were quieted and appeaſed.

The Queen oppoſeth it.

1456. The Prentices of London make a commotion.

At this time the French having little to do againſt the Engliſh in France, would needs be doing ſomething againſt them in England. They ſet out two Fleets, one under the conduct of William Lord Pomyers, the other of Sir Peter Breſſy; the Lord fell upon Fulney in the Weſt-Countrey, the Knight upon Sandwich in Kent, where ſome hurt they did, but not of importance to countervail their Voyage.

And now the Queen finding the little reſpect the Londoners bore to her party or the Kings, perſwades the King, as for his health and recreation, to make a Progreſs into Warwickshire, which he did, by the way, hunting and hawking; and the Queen making ſhew of minding nothing but paſtimes: and this ſhe did, with a purpoſe the eaſilier to entrap the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick. To whom ſhe writ moſt loving Letters, earneſtly inviting them to be at Coventry by an hour appointed; which they not doubting any fraud, intended to have done: but hearing by the way of the miſchief plotted againſt them, they cauſed their Retinue to go on-ward the way to the Court, as though themſelves were coming after; but they provided otherwiſe for their ſafety, the Duke of York with a Groom and a Page getting him to Wigmore Caſtle, the Earl of Saliſbury to his Caſtle of Middleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to the Sea-ſide, and ſo to Callice. But before they parted, they agreed upon an Alphabet, by which they might have intercourſe of Letters, yet their intentions kept undiſcovered.

The Queen in loving manner invites the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick, to meet her at Coventry. The Lords hearing of a plot laid againſt them, ſhift away.

The King unwitting of this miſchief intended againſt the Duke of York and his friends, returneth to London, where he calleth a Council; and therein of his own accord, deſireth that ſome courſe might be invented for a perfect reconcilement of all parties: promiſing upon his Salvation, (an aſſeveration not uſual with him) ſo to entertain the Duke of York and his friends, that all diſcontents ſhould be removed, and a perfect amity on all parts be eſtabliſhed: to which end meſſengers are diſpatched to the Duke of York, and all other of his

The Duke of York accordingly came, and with 400. men well apparelled, lodged at his houſe called Baynards-Caſtle; the Earl of Salisbury with 500. men, lodged likewiſe at his houſe called the Herbour: The Duke of Exeter (lately releaſed) and the Duke of Somerſet with 800. men, were lodged within Temple-Bar: The Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford with 1500. men were lodged in Holborn; The Earl of Warwick with 600. in red Jackets with ragged Staves, embroidered behinde and before, were lodged at the Grey-Fryers in London. Upon the ſeventeenth of March the King and the Queen came to London, and were lodged at the Biſhops Palace; the Mayor having five hundred well appointed men in readineſs, rode with a competent number all day long round the City, for preſervation of the Kings Peace. The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friers; the other, at the Chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter: Between both, the Reverend Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Son of Henry Bourchier Earl of Eſſex, with ſome other of the moſt able Prelates interceded ſo, Beſides this in general, there were ſome particular Articles to be performed by the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, which afterward was ratified under the great Seal of England, the 24. day of March, in the 36. year of the Reign of King Henry the ſixth. Upon the publication whereof, a ſolemn Proceſſion was made in Pauls Church, at which the King was preſent with his Crown on his head; before him hand in hand went the Duke of Somerſet, and the Earl of Salisbury, the Duke of Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, and ſo one of the one, another of the other part, till they were all marſhalled: behinde the King came the Queen, the Duke of York leading her by the hand, who in going made ſhew of favourable countenance towards him. Himſelf ſpeeds to Callice, and being then Lord Admiral, takes with him all the Kings Ships that were in readineſs, and ſcouring the Seas, meets with five great Carricks, three of Genoua, and two of Spain, and after two dayes fight, takes two of them; with which he returned to Callice; where he unloaded their fraight, and found it worth ten thouſand pounds in Staple commodities, beſides the Ships and Priſoners.

1459. In the mean time the Earl of Salisbury with about five thouſand men marcheth through Lancaſhire, to paſs that way to the King, with a purpoſe to acquaint him with the affront offered to his Son, and the inveterate malice diſcovered in the Queen againſt him. The Queen with the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerſet, hearing of his coming, gave order to the Lord Audley to uſe means to apprehend him; who thereupon levieth ten thouſand men in Cheſhire and Shropſhire, and with them about a mile from Draynton, in a plain called Blore-heath, he attended the Earl, there being but a ſmall brook of no great depth between them. Early in the morning the Earl made a ſeeming Retreat, which the Lord Talbot obſerving, preſently cauſeth his Troops to paſs the River; but before they could be reduced again into order, the Earl with his whole ſtrength, falls upon them, and with the ſlaughter of the Lord Audley, and

The Earl of Salisbury going to acquaint the King, is ſet upon by the Lord Audley.

The Duke of York takes the field. And now the Duke of York thinking fit no longer to conceal his deſign, makes preparation to take the field, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick do the like; and amongſt others of approved valour, whom the Earl of Warwick had brought from Callice with him, were two principal noted men, John Blunt, and Andrew Trollop. Likewiſe the King, with the Dukes of
The King doth the like. Somerſet, and Exeter, draws his Forces to Worceſter, from whence Richard Beauchamp Biſhop of Salisbury, is ſent to offer the Yorkiſts a full and general Pardon, if they would lay down Arms, and become Loyal Subjects. Whereunto they anſwered, that there was no truſt to the Kings Pardons, as long as the Queen had a predominant power; but if they might have aſſurance of ſafety, they would expreſs their Loyalty, and humbly render themſelves at his ſervice. Hereupon the King advanceth nearer, and approaching the Lords Army, cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever would abandon the Duke of York, ſhould be received to mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this, the night following, Andrew Trollop with all the Guernſey, and ſo to Callice. All the common Souldiers the King pardons, only makes exemplary puniſhment of ſome few Captains, ſends the Dutcheſs of York, and her two younger Children, to the Dutcheſs of Buckingham her Siſter to be ſafely kept; and then having ſpoiled the Town and Caſtle of Ludlow, he diſmiſt his Army. And now a Parliament is called at Coventry, wherein the Duke of York, Edward Earl of March his Son, Richard Earl of Saliſbury, Richard Earl of Warwick, John Lord Cliffford, and many other the confederates of the Duke of York, are convict of Treaſon, and all their Lands and Goods ſeized on to the Kings uſe. Henry Duke of Somerſet by the Queens means is made Captain of Callice, whither coming to take poſſeſſion, he was by reaſon of Ordnance ſhot at him from Rice-bank, forced to retire; which the Queen hearing, was ſo incenſed, that in great paſſion ſhe gave order to make ready all the Kings Ships, lying at Sandwich, to give aſſiſtance to the Duke of Somerſet: but the fore-mentioned John Dynham, out of love to the Earl of March, boarded thoſe Ships in the Harbour, and took the Lord Rivers, deſigned Admiral for that Service, and carried both him and the Ships to Callice, from whence the Earl ſailed to Ireland, to the Duke of York, who having conferred and concluded that courſe to take, he returned to Callice, the new Admiral the Duke of Exeter not daring to ſtop his courſe. Sir Simon Montford was appointed to guard the Cinque-Ports, having divers Ships under his command to bar the Earl of Warwick's entrance: but the Earl by his eſpyals having perfect intelligence of all paſſages, fell ſuddenly upon Sir Simon before his Ships were ready, took him priſoner, ranſackt the Town of Sandwich, and carried him priſoner and the Ships to Callice. By the way he underſtood how much the Kentiſh men deſired his return, and longed for his coming; whereupon he came the ſecond time to Sandwich, to whom preſently reſorted the Lord Cobham, and very many Gentlemen of the Countrey: ſo as now his Army was five and twenty thouſand ſtrong, with which he marched towards London. Againſt whom the Lord Scales was appointed to go, and with ſome convenient Troops to aſſure London: but the Mayor directly refuſed to admit him; whereupon he reſorted to the Tower, from whence afterward he did the Londoners no ſmall diſpleaſure. The Earl of Warwick having notice, that his Father the Earl of Salisbury was upon march to meet him, paſſeth over his men; and without impeachment, joyned with him and his friends near Exeter.

The Duke of York in a Parliament is convict of treaſon: as likewiſe the other Lords.

John Dynham doth the Earl of March good ſervice.

The Earl of Warwick is received of the Londoners.

1460.

The Armies of the Earl of March, and of the King meet at Northampton.

The Kings Army is defeated; divers Lords ſlain.

The King with the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, with a great Army marcheth towards them, and near to the Town of Northampton both Armies meet. The Earl of March with the advice of the Earl of Warwick prepares for the fight: The Queen (the King more intentive to devotion then fighting) did the like. The fight continued about two hours, wherein were ſlain on both ſides above ten thouſand men; but upon the fall of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, the Kings ſide was diſcomfited, and John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas Lord Egremont, John Lord Beaumont and ſome other of account were ſlain. The Queen with the Duke of Somerſet, taking with them the young Prince, fled to the Biſhoprick of Durham. The King himſelf was taken, and as a Priſoner conveyed to London: where the Tower is yielded to the Earl of Warwick; the Lord Scales in diſguiſed apparel endeavouring to eſcape, is taken by the water-men, and by them beheaded, and his Corps careleſly left upon the Sands. Thomas Thorpe one of the Barons of the Exchequer, in the Habit of a Monk, his Crown ſhorn, purpoſing to flie to the Queen, is taken and committed Priſoner to the Tower; and after by the Commons Beheaded at High-gate. The Duke of York being advertiſed of this good ſucceſs, leaveth Ireland and poſts to London, where in the Kings name, he ſummoneth a Parliament; which being aſſembled, he in the preſence of the Lords in the Upper Houſe, placeth himſelf in the Imperial Seat, and with great boldneſs layes open his rightful claim to the Crown of England, as being the Son and Heir of Anne, Daughter and Heir of Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Son and Heir of Philippa the ſole Daughter and Heir of Lionel Duke of Clarence, the third Son of Edward the Third, and elder Brother of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, Father of the Uſurper Henry the Fourth, Grandfather to King Henry the Fifth, who was Father to him that at this time untruly ſtyleth himſelf King Henry the Sixth. And after relating the many miſeries that had befallen the Realm ſince the time of this Uſurpation, he concluded, that he would not expect nor deſire poſſeſſion of the Crown, except his deſcent were indiſputable, and his title without exception. This being a buſineſs of importance, required deliberation; but in concluſion, the Duke having before-hand prepared the Lords Spiritual, and few of the Nobility being preſent, that were not of his part, the Burgeſſes were eaſily perſwaded: and it was generally reſolved, and enacted accordingly, that King Henry during his life, ſhould retain the name and honour of a King; that the Duke of York ſhould be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown, and Protector of the Kings Perſon, his Lands and Dominions; and that if at any time, any of King Henry's Friends, Allies, or Favourites in his behalf ſhould attempt the diſannulling this Act, that then the Duke ſhould have preſent poſſeſſion of the Crown. It is not unworthy the noting, that while the Earl of March was declaring his title in the Upper Houſe, it happened in the nether Houſe, that a Crown which hung in the middle of the Houſe, to garniſh a Branch to ſet lights upon, without touch or winde, fell ſuddenly down: as likewiſe at the ſame time fell down the Crown which ſtood on the top of Dover-Caſtle. A ſign as ſome thought, that the Crown of the Realm ſhould be changed. As ſoon as the Parliament was diſſolved, the Duke diſpatcheth Letters into Scotland, requiring in the Kings name, the Queen, the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and all other of the Nobility, that remained in the Kingdom, with all ſpeed to repair to his preſence in London: but they had other work in hand, for having gotten together of Engliſh and

The Queen flieth, the King taken Priſoner, and conveyed to London.

The Lord Scales flying away in diſguiſe, is taken by Watermen and beheaded.

The Duke of York comes out of Ireland: ſummons a Parliament, wherein he layes open his Title to Crown.

It is concluded in Parliament that King Henry ſhould remain King during his life; and the Duke of York proclaimed heir apparent to the Crown.

Good Omens for the Earl of March.

and Scots, to the number of eighteen thousand, they came marching into England. Against whom went the Duke of York with his younger Son the Earl of Rutland, and the Earl of Salisbury, (leaving the King in the custody of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Warwick;) and approaching near the Queens Army, he was certified by the Scouts, that the enemy far exceeded his power, both in number and in all warlike preparation (he not having in his Army above five thousand men) and thereupon the Earl of Salisbury advised him to retire, and to attend the coming of the Earl of March, who was gone into Wales to raise the March men. But the pride of his former Victory made him deaf to all counsel of declining the Battel, and so hastned on by his destiny, from Sandal Castle he marcheth on to Wakefield Green; where the Lord Clifford on the one side, and the Earl of Wiltshire, on the other, were placed in Ambuscado. The Duke of York supposing that the Duke of Somerset who led the Battel had no more Forces then what were with him, undauntedly marcheth towards him; but being entred within their danger, Ambushes on both sides brake out upon him, and slew him with three thousand of his men, the rest fled. The Earl of Salisbury is taken Prisoner, and harmless Rutland not above twelve years old, who came thither but to see fashions, is made a Sacrifice for his Fathers transgressions, who kneeling upon his knees, with tears begging life, is unmercifully stabbed to the heart by the Lord Clifford, in part of revenge (as he swore) of his Fathers death: And the Queen most unwomanly in cold blood caused the Earl of Salisbury, and as many as were taken Prisoners, to be beheaded at Pomfret Castle, and to have their heads placed on poles, about the Walls of York. Thus died Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who had taken to Wife Cicely Daughter to Ralph Nevil, the first Earl of Westmerland, by whom he had Issue eight Sons and four Daughters; his eldest Son Henry died young, his second Son Edward was afterward King of England; his third Son Edmund Earl of Rutland, was slain with his Father; John, Thomas, and William died young; his seventh Son George was after Duke of Clarence; his youngest Son Richard surnamed Crouchback, was after King of England. Anne his eldest Daughter was married to Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, his second Daughter Elizabeth was married to John de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, his third Margaret to Charles Duke of Burgoigne, his fourth Ursula died young. This Duke being dead, had his head crowned with a paper Crown, together with many circumstances of disgracing him; but this act of spight was fully afterwards recompensed upon their heads that did it.

The Dukes of Somerset and Exeter with an Army out of Scotland come marching into England.

The Duke of York meets them, and in a Battel on Wakefield green is slain.

The Earl of Salisbury beheaded.

The Duke of York's issue.

The Earl of March hearing of his Father's death, laboured now so much the more earnestly, in that he laboured for himself; and parting from Shrewsbury whose Inhabitants were most firm unto him, he increased his Army to the number of three and twenty thousand, and presently took the field: and having advertisement that Jasper Earl of Pembroke, with the Earl of of Ormond and Wiltshire followed after him with a great power of Welsh and Irish, he suddenly marched back again, and in a Plain near Mortimer's Gross, on Candlemas day in the morning gave them Battel, where with the slaughter of three thousand and eight hundred, he puts the Earls to flight. Owen Tewdor who had married Queen Katharine, Mother to King Henry the sixth, and divers Welsh Gentlemen were taken, and at Hereford beheaded. Before the Battel, it is said, the Sun appeared to the Earl of March like three Suns, and suddenly it joyned altogether in one; for which cause some imagine, that he gave the Sun in its full brightness, for his Badge or Cognizance.

The Earl of March puts the Queens Forces to flight.

Owen Tewdor beheaded.

The Queen in the mean time encouraged by the death of the Duke of York, with a power of Northern men marched towards London: but when her Souldiers were once South of Trent, as if the River were the utmost limit of their good behaviour, they fell to forrage the Countrey in most barbarous manner. Approaching St. Albans, they were advertised that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick were ready to give them Battel; whereupon the Queens Vaward hasteth to pass through Saint Albans: but being not suffered to pass, they encountred with their Enemies in the Field called Bernard heath. Who perceiving the main Battel to stand still, and not to move; which was done by the treachery of Lovelace, who with the Kentish men had the leading of it, they soon made the Southern men to turn their backs and flye: upon whose flight the rest in doubt of each others well-meaning shifted away, the Lords about the King perceiving the danger withdrew themselves. Only the Lord Bonvile coming in a complemental manner to the King, and saying it grieved him to leave his Majesty, but that necessity for the safeguard of his life enforced it, was importuned, and Sir Thomas Kyriel a Knight of Kent likewise, by the King to stay; he passing his Royal Word that their stay should be no danger to them: upon which promise they stayed, but to their cost. For the Queen hearing that the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorp at High gate, she in revenge thereof, caused both their heads to be stricken off at St. Albans: so as there were slaughtered at this Battel the full number of three and twenty hundred, but no man of name, but only Sir John Gray, who the same day was made Knight, with twelve other at the Village of Colney.

And now the King was advised to send one Thomas Hoe, (that had been a Barrister) to the Victors, to tell them, that he would gladly come to them, if with convenience it might be done; whereupon the Earl of Northumberland, appointed divers Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met to their great joy: but it was now observed, as it were in the destiny of King Henry; that although he were a most pious man, yet no enterprise of War did ever prosper, where he was present: that we may know the prosperity of the world to be no inseparable companion to men of Piety. At the Queens request, the King honoured with Knighthood thirty Gentlemen, who the day before had fought against the part where he was: the Prince likewise was by him dubbed Knight, and then they they went to the Abbey, where they were received with Anthems, and withal an humble Petition to be protected from the outrage of the looſe Souldiers; which was promiſed, and Proclamation made to that purpoſe, but to ſmall purpoſe, for the Northern men ſaid, It was their bargain to have all the ſpoil in every place, after they had paſſed Trent: and ſo they robbed and ſpoiled whatſoever they could come at. The Londoners hearing of this diſorder, ſeeing there was no more aſſurance in the Kings promiſe, to keep the Northern men out of their Gates; inſomuch that when they were ſent to, to ſend over to the Camp certain Cart-loads of Lenten Proviſion, which the Mayor accordingly provided, the Commons roſe about Cripplegate, and by ſtrong hand kept the Carts from going out of the City. Hereupon the Mayor ſends the Recorder to the King's Council, and withal intreats the Dutcheſs of Bedford, and the Lady Scales, to intercede for him to the Queen; and to excuſe his not uſing force, conſidering how dangerous it might be in theſe doubtful times, to ſtir their fury that would not eaſily be allayed. It was well adviſed to ſend women to intreat a woman, for by this means they prevailed, that ſome of the Lords of the Council, with a guard of four hundred good Souldiers were appointed to go for London to enquire and certifie of theſe things: when ſuddenly news was brought, that the Earl of March with a great Army was marching towards them. For the Earl of Warwick having gathered together his ſcattered Troops, and joyned with the Earl of March, they haſted towards London, and were joyfully received upon the eight and twentieth day of February; and upon Sunday the ſecond of March, the Earl of Warwick muſtred all his Army in St. Johns field: and having caſt them into a ring, read unto them the agreement of the laſt Parliament, and then demanded, whether they would have King Henry to reign ſtill? who all cried, No, no: Then he asked them, whether they would have the Earl of March eldeſt Son of the Duke of York (by that Parliament proclaimed King) to reign over them? who with a great clamour cried, Yea, yea: Then went there certain Captains, and others of the City, to the Earl of March at Baynards Caſtle, to acquaint him with what was paſſed; who at firſt ſeemed to excuſe himſelf, as unable to execute ſo great a charge: but animated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at laſt conſented to take it upon him. And thereupon the next morning he went in Proceſſion to Pauls, and offered there; and after Te Deum ſung, he was in great ſtate conveyed to Weſtminſter: and there in the great Hall, ſeated in the Kings ſeat, with the Scepter of St, Edward in his hand. And then again the people, of whom there was a great concourſe, were aloud demanded, if they would acknowledge him to be their King? to which with great willingneſs they all cried, Yea, yea. Then taking homage of divers Noblemen there preſent, he was with Proceſſion and great ſolemnity conveyed to the Abbey, and placed in the Quire as King, whileſt Te Deum was ſinging. That done, he offered at Saint Edward's Shrine, and then returned by water to Pauls, and was lodged in the Biſhops Palace; and upon the fourth of March he was generally Proclaimed King, by the name of Edward the Fourth. And here in the courſe of all Writers, ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, that it may be truly ſaid, Never came any to be King ſo ſoon after his Birth, nor left to be King ſo long before his Death; for he came to be King at eight months old, and he left to be King, living twelve years after. There was indeed in that ſpace of time, a certain viciſſitude, ſometimes a King, and ſometimes no King; the paſſages whereof muſt be related in the following Kings Reign.

The Londoners keep proviſion from going to the King.

The Earl of March is elected King.

Of his Taxations.

IN the firſt year of his Reign, a Parliament was holden at London, where the Queen Mother with the young King in her lap came and ſate amongſt the Lords; and there was then granted a Subſidy of five Nobles upon every ſack of Wool that ſhould paſs out of the Land, for three years: but if carried out by Merchant ſtrangers, then to pay three and forty ſhillings for every ſack. In the third year of his Reign a Parliament was holden at Weſtminſter, wherein was granted a Subſidy of twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandize coming in, or paſſing out of the Realm, and three ſhillings of a Ton of Wine, for the term of three years. In his ſixth year; in a Parliament at Weſtminſter was granted a Subſidy, of every Ton of Wine three ſhillings, and of other Merchandize, except Wool, Fell, and Cloth, twelve pence in the pound: Alſo of every Pariſh through the Realm (except Cities and Boroughs) the Benefice being in value ten Marks, Ten of that Pariſh ſhould pay ſix ſhillings eight pence; and of every Benefice of the value of ten pounds, ten Pariſhioners ſhould pay thirteen ſhillings four pence; and ſo ratably of every Benefice, from the loweſt to the higheſt. And for the Inhabitants of Cities and Boroughs, every man being worth twenty ſhillings above his houſhold-ſtuffe, and the apparel of him and his Wife, ſhould pay four pence, and ſo after that rate to the richeſt.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

IN the 32. year of this King, the Lord Mayor of London firſt began to go by water to Weſtminſter to take his Oath, where before they uſed to go by Land. Alſo in this Kings Reign the Art of Printing was found out at Mogunce in Germany, by a Knight called John Cuttenberghen, and brought into England by William Caxton, of London Mercer, who firſt practiced the ſame in the Abbey at Weſtminſter in the year 1471. In the 23. year of his Reign, in the Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that when wheat was ſold for ſix ſhillings eight pence the quarter, Rye for four ſhillings, and Barley for three ſhillings, it ſhould be lawful for any man to carry the ſaid kindes of Corn into the parts beyond the Sea without licence, ſo it were not to the Kings Enemies or Rebels; which Act was afterward confirmed by King Edward the Fourth.

Affairs

Affairs of the Church in his time.

A Great Schiſm was in the Church in this Kings time by reaſon of Anti-Popes; for remedy whereof, a Council is called at Conſtance, to which the Emperours of Conſtantinople and Trapezond ſend their Ambaſſadours. In this Council John the three and twentieth is conventeed, condemned, depoſed, and impriſoned. Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth are deprived, and Otho Colonna, by the name of Martin the fifth, is choſen Pope. During theſe confuſions in the Weſtern Church, the Chriſtians in the Eaſtern Church are utterly ruinated. The Emperour ſmothered to death in a preſs of people, and the great City of Conſtantinople won by the Turk, made ever ſince the ſeat of his Empire. In the ſix and thirtieth year of this King, Reynold Peacock, Biſhop of Chicheſter, who had laboured many years in tranſlating the Holy Scripture into Engliſh, was accuſed and convicted, for holding and publiſhing certain opinions at that time held Heretical, which at laſt openly at Pauls Croſs he revoked; that he had held, there was no neceſſity to believe that Chriſt deſcended into Hell: alſo no neceſſity to believe in the Communion of Saints, or that the Univerſal Church cannot erre in matters of Faith; or that it is neceſſary to believe and hold whatſoever a General Council ſhall determine: Alſo that he had held, that Spiritual perſons ought to have no Temporal Poſſeſſions; and that perſonal Tythes were not due by Gods Law. Theſe Points he openly renounced, but was notwithſtanding deprived of his Biſhoprick; only a a certain Penſion was aſſigned him to live on in an Abbey, where ſoon after he died.

THe King himſelf founded two famous Colledges, the one in Cambridge, to our Lady and St. Nicholas, called the Colledge-Royal, or the Kings-Colledge; the other of Eaton beſides Windſor, called of our Bleſſed Lady: to the maintenance whereof, he gave 3400. pounds by year. In the 28. year of his Reign, his Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queens-Colledge in Cambridge. In the time of his Reign alſo, Henry Chichely Archbiſhop of Canterbury founded two Colledges in Oxford, one called All-Souls-Colledge, the other Bernard-Colledge. In his time alſo, Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter (but others ſay, Thomas Kemp, Archbiſhop of Canterbury) built the Divinity School in Oxford; alſo the ſaid Archbiſhop built Pauls Croſs in form as now it ſtandeth; and William Waneflete Biſhop of Wincheſter and Lord Chancellour of England founded Mary Magdalen Colledge in Oxford. In his ſeventeenth year, Ralph Lord Cromwel, builded the Colledge of Tatſhal in Lincolnſhire. Alſo this year William Eaſtfield Mayor of London, cauſed to be builded at his own charge the Water-Conduit in Fleet-ſtreet. In his ninth year, John Wells Mayor of London, cauſed the Conduit commonly called the Standard in Cheap to be builded. In his firſt year the Weſt Gate of London, ſometime called Chamberlain-gate, and now Newgate, was begun to be new builded by the Executors of Sir Richard Whittington, Lord Mayor of London. In his fifth year, John Reynwel Mayor of London, gave certain Lands to the City of London, for which the City is bound to pay for ever, all Fifteens that ſhall be granted to the King, (ſo as it paſs not three Fifteens in one year) for three Wards in London; namely, Dowgate-Ward, Billinſgate-Ward, and Algate. Alſo this year the Tower at the Draw-Bridge of London was begun by the ſame Mayor. In his four and twentieth year, Simon Eyre Lord Mayor of London builded the Leaden-Hall in London, to be a Store-Houſe for Grain and Fuel for the poor of the City, and a fair Chappel at the Eaſt end of the ſame, leaving in ſtock a thouſand pounds, which afterward King Edward the Fourth borrowed and never paid it again. Alſo in this Kings time, William de la Pool Duke of Suffolk, and Alice his Wife, Daughter to Thomas Chaucer, Son to Geoffry Chaucer the famous Poet, tranſlated and encreaſed the Manour place of Ewelme in Oxfordſhire, and builded new the Pariſh Church of Ewelme, and an Hoſpital or Alms-houſe for two Prieſts, and thirteen poor men, to which he gave three Manours, Ramruge in Hampſhire, Conock in Wiltſhire, and Merſh in Buckinghamſhire: They alſo founded the Hoſpital of Donington Caſtle.

Caſualties happening in his time:

IN his fifth year was ſo unſeaſonable weather, that it rained almoſt continually from Eaſter to Michaelmas. In his ſeventh year, the eighth of November, the Duke of Norfolk was like to have been drowned paſſing through London-Bridge, his Barge being ſet upon the Piles, overwhelmed ſo, that thirty perſons were drowned, and the Duke with others that eſcaped, were fain to be drawn up with Ropes. In his ſeventeenth year was ſo great a dearth of Corn, that people were glad to make them bread of Fern-roots. In his eighteenth year all the Lions of the Tower died. Alſo in this year, the 18. day of July, the Poſtern-Gates of London by Eaſt-Smithfield againſt the Tower of London, ſank by night more then ſeven foot in the earth. In his two and twentieth year, on New-years day, near unto Bedford, a very deep wat-r, which ran betwixt the Towns of Swelſtone and Harlſewood, ſtood ſuddenly ſtill, and divided it ſelf, ſo that by the ſpace of three miles, the bottom remained dry: which wonder, many thought to ſignifie the diviſion of the people, and falling away from the King, which happened ſhortly after. In the three and thirtieth year of his Reign, beſides a great Blazing-Star, there happened a ſtrange light, a Monſtrous Cock came out of the Sea, and in the preſence of a multitude of people at Portland, made a hideous crowing three times, each time turning about clapping his Wings, and beckning towards the North, the South, and the Weſt; as alſo many prodigious Births. In his ſix and thirtieth year, in a little Town in Bedfordſhire, it rained blood, whereof the red drops appeared in ſheets hung out to dry.

Of

Of his VVife and Iſſue.

HE married Margaret Daughter of Rayner Duke of Anjou, and Titular King of Jeruſalem, Sicilie, and Arragon, by whom he had a ſmall Portion, and little ſtrength of Alliance; yet might it have been a good match, if they could have changed conditions with one another, that he might have had her active and ſtirring ſpirit, and ſhe his ſoft and milde diſpoſition. She was his Wife ſix and twenty years, and after her Husband's depulſion from the Regal Throne, his Forces being vanquiſhed at the Battel of Tewksbury, in a poor Religious Houſe whither ſhe had fled for ſafety of her life, was taken Priſoner and carried Captive to London, where ſhe remained in durance, till Duke Rayner her Father purchaſed her liberty, unto whom ſhe returned, and laſtly died in her native Countrey. By her King Henry had iſſue only one Son named Edward, who when the day was loſt at Tewksbury, ſought to eſcape by flight; but being taken, was brought into the preſence of King Edward, whoſe reſolute anſwers provoked King Edward ſo much, that he daſhed him on the mouth with his Gauntlet, and then Richard the Crouchback ran him into the heart with his Dagger. His Body was buried amongſt the poor perſons there ſlain, in the Monaſtical Church of the Black-Friers in Tewksbury.

Of his Death and Burial.

UPon King Edward's recovering the Crown, he was committed to the Tower, where the 21. of May, in the year 1472, he was murthered by the bloody hand of Richard Duke of Gloceſter; the day after he was brought to Pauls Church in an open Coffin bare-faced, where he bled; thence carried to the Black-Friers where he alſo bled; from thence in a Boat to Cherſey Abbey, without Prieſt or Clerk, Torch or Taper, ſaying or ſinging, and there buried: but afterward at the appointment of King Edward was removed to VVindſor, and there interred, and a fair Monument made over him.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, ſpare and ſlender of body, of a comely countenance, and all parts well proportioned. For endowments of his minde, he had vertues enough to make him a Saint, but not to make him a God, as Kings are ſaid to be Gods; for of that commanding power there being two parts, Parcere ſubjectis, & debellare ſuperbos, he wanted the latter. He was not ſenſible of that which the world calls Honour, accounting the greateſt Honour to conſiſt in humility. His greateſt imperfection was, that he had in him too much of the Log, and too little of the Stork; for he would not move, but as he was moved, and had rather be devoured, then he would devour. He was not ſo ſtupid, not to know proſperity from adverſity; but he was ſo devout, to think nothing adverſity, which was not a hinderance to Devotion. He was fitter for a Prieſt then a King, and for a Sacrifice then a Prieſt; and he could not chuſe but dye a Martyr, who all his life had been a Confeſſor. He had one immunity peculiar to himſelf, that no man could ever be revenged on him, ſeeing he never offered any man injury. By being innocent as a Dove, he kept his Crown upon his head ſo long; but if he had been wiſe as a Serpent, he might have kept it on longer. But all this is not ſufficient, if we expreſs not in particular his ſeveral vertues. So modeſt, that when at Chriſtmas a ſhew of women was preſented before him with their breaſts laid out, he preſently departed; ſaying, Fie, fie for ſhame, forſooth you be to blame. So pitiful, that when he ſaw the quarters of a Traytor over Cripplegate, he cauſed it to be taken down; ſaying I will not have any Chriſtian ſo cruelly handled for my ſake. So free from ſwearing, that he never uſed other oath but forſooth and verily: So patient, that to one, who ſtrook him when he was taken priſoner, he only ſaid, Forſooth you wrong your ſelf more then me, to ſtrike the Lords annointed: So devout, that on principal Holy-dayes he uſed to wear ſackcloth next his skin: Once for all, let his Confeſſor be heard ſpeak, who in ten years confeſſion never found that he had done or ſaid any thing, for which he might juſtly be injoyned Penance. For which cauſes King Henry the Seventh, would have procured him to be Canonized for a Saint, but that he was prevented by death; or perhaps becauſe the charge would have been too great, the Canonization of a King being much more coſtly then of a private perſon.

The vertues of King Henry.

The Canonization of a King more coſtly then of a private perſon.

Of Men of note in his time.

THere were men of valour in this Kings Reign, of extraordinary eminency; as firſt, John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, who when a French Lord upbraided him, that his Sword was of Lead, he made his anſwer, and made him feel that it was of ſteel. Next him was Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, whoſe very name was a ſufficient charm to daunt a whole French Army. Then the next was John Lord Talbot, ſo great a terrour to the French, that when the Women would ſtill their Children from crying, they would uſe to ſay, Talbot comes. Then was Richard Nevil Earl Warwick, ſo much greater then a King, as that which makes, is greater then that it makes: and ſuch a one was he. Many other beſides theſe, not much inferiour to theſe; that we may truly ſay, there was never a more Heroical King of England then Henry the fifth: nor ever a King of England that had more Heroical Subjects then Henry the ſixth. And though Arms and Letters ſeem to be of different conditions, yet they commonly grow up and flouriſh together: as in this Kings Reign, where John Leland ſurnamed the Elder, who wrote divers Treatiſes for inſtruction of Grammarians; William White a Prieſt of Kent, profeſſing the Doctrine of VVickliffe, for which he ſuffered Martyrdom by fire; Alexander Carpenter, who wrote a Book called Deſtructorium vitiorum, againſt the Prelates of that time; Peter Baſſet Eſquire

THE

The REIGN of KING EDWARD THE FOURTH.

1460. EDward Earl of March, born at Roan in Normandy, Son and Heir of Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, ſlain in the Battel at Wakefield, ſucceeded his Father in the Right, but exceeded him in the Poſſeſſion of the Crown of England; and that by virtue of an Act of Parliament lately made, wherein the ſaid Duke of York not only was declared Heir apparent to the Crown, and appointed Protector of the King and Kingdom: but it was further Enacted, that if King Henry, or any in his behalf ſhould attempt the diſannulling of this Act, that then the ſaid Duke or his Heir ſhould have the preſent poſſeſſion; which becauſe his friends attempted to do, therefore juſtly doth Edward Earl of March his Son, by virtue of this Act, take poſſeſſion of the Crown, and is proclaimed King of England, by the name of Edward the fourth, through the City of London, on the fifth day of March in the year 1460. But before he could have leaſure to be Crowned, he was forced once again to try his fortune in the field by Battel; For King Henry in the North was raiſing a new Army, againſt whom King Edward upon the twelfth of March, marched with his Forces from London: and by eaſie journeys came to Pomfret Caſtle, from whence the Lord Fitzwater was ſent to guard the paſſage at Ferribridge, to ſtop the Enemies approach that way: King Henry likewiſe advanceth forward, ſending his power under the Conduct of the Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whileſt himſelf with his Queen and Son ſtay at York. The Lord Clifford very early on Palm-Sunday, with a Troop of Northern men, falls upon thoſe that guarded Ferribridge; and defeated them with the ſlaughter of the Lord Fitzwater, and the Baſtard of Salisbury. The Earl of Warwick hearing of this defeat, comes poſting to King Edward's Camp; and in his preſence killing his Horſe, proteſted his Reſolution to ſtand with him to the death. Upon this Reſolution of the Earls, the King made preſently Proclamation, that all who were afraid to fight, ſhould at their pleaſure depart; but to thoſe that would ſtay he promiſed good reward: adding withal, that if any that ſtayed, ſhould after turn his back or flee, then he that ſhould kill him, ſhould have double pay. After this he gave order to the Lord Fauconbridge, and Sir Walter Blunt, to lead on the Vaward; who in their march about Dandingdale, encountred with the Lord Clifford (who formerly in cold blood had ſlaughtered the young Earl of Rutland) and he being ſtricken in the Throat with an Arrow, (ſome ſay) without a head, and preſently dying: The Lord Nevil Son and Heir of the Earl of Weſtmerland was alſo ſlain, with moſt of their Companies, and the reſt put to flight. The next day likewiſe (the Duke of Norfolk being dangerouſly ſick, to whom that place was aſſigned) Fauconbridge and Blunt continue the leading of the Vant-guard; and on Palm-Sunday, by break of day, they came to a plain field between Towton and Saxton, from whence they made a full ſurvey of King Henry's Army: and certified King Edward, that the Enemy was threeſcore thouſand ſtrong; where his Army was but forty thouſand and ſix hundred. Whereupon a ſecond Proclamation was made through the Camp, that no quarter ſhould be kept, nor priſoner taken. The Armies being both in ſight, the Lord Fauconbridge gave direction to the Archers (upon a ſignal by him given) to ſhoot every man a flight-Arrow (for that purpoſe provided) and then to fall back three ſtrides, and ſtand. The Northern men in the mean time plyed their Bows till all their ſheaves were empty; but their Arrows fell ſhort of the Enemy by threeſcore yards: and not only did no hurt to the Enemy, but did hurt to themſelves; for their Arrows being ſpent, and coming to hand-blows, their own Arrows ſticking in the ground, galled their ſhins and pierced their feet. Ten hours the Battel continued doubtful, till the Earl of Northumberland being ſlain, with the Lord Beaumont, Gray, Dacres, and Wells, Sir John Nevil, Andrew Trollop, and many other Knights and Eſquires, the Earls of Exeter and Somerſet fled, leaving the Conqueſt to King Edward; but the bloodieſt that ever England felt, for there fell that day ſix and thirty thouſand ſeven hundred threeſcore and ſixteen perſons, no priſoners being taken but the Earl of Devonſhire. The Battel ended, King Edward haſtes to York, where he cauſed the heads of his Father and other Friends to be taken down and buried with their bodies, ſetting in their places the Heads of the Earl of Devonſhire, and three other, there at that time executed. The Earl of Somerſet acquainting King Henry with this overthrow, perſwades him with his Queen and Son, to flie to Berwick, where leaving the Duke of Somerſet, they flie further for fuccour to the King of Scots, who comforteth them with promiſe of relief, but maketh a ſure bargain; for in lieu of a penſion to be allowed King Henry during his abode there, the Town and Caſtle of Berwick were delivered to him. Queen Margaret and her Son are ſent into France, who obtained of Lewis the eleventh her Couſin, that all of King Edward's friends were prohibited ſtay or traffick in the French King's Dominions: but all King Henry's friends might live there freely. After this King Edward comes to London, and upon his entrance to the Tower, makes four and twenty Knights, and the next day four more; and upon the 28. day of June, in the year 1461. he rode from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and was there Crowned in the Abbey-Church.

1461. King Edward is Crowned.

Shortly after a Parliament is ſummoned, which began at Weſtminſter the fourth of November; in which all Acts of King Henry the Sixth prejudicial to King Edward's Title, are repealed: and therein John Earl of Oxford, a valiant and wiſe man, (he who in a former Parliament had diſputed the queſtion concerning the precedency of Temporal and Spiritual Barons, a bold attempt in thoſe dayes; and by force of whoſe Argument, Judgement was given for the Lords Temporal) with his Son Aubry de Vere, Sir Thomas Tiddingham Knight, William Tyrrel, and Walter Montgomery Eſquires, were, without anſwer convicted of Treaſon, and beheaded. And to encourage others to well deſerving, King Edward at this time advanced many in honour: his Brother George he created Duke of Clarence; his brother Richard Duke of Gloceſter, John Lord Nevil Brother to the Earl of Warwick, he made firſt Viſcount, then Marqueſs Montacute; Henry Bourchier Brother to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, is made Earl of Eſſex; and William Lord Fauconbridge, Earl of Kent. And now their new honours are preſently put into imployment; the Earls of Eſſex and Kent, accompanied with the Lords Audely and Clinton, Sir John Howard, Sir Richard Walgrave, and others, to the number of ten thouſand, are appointed to ſcour the Seas: who landed in Britain, took the Town of Conquet, and the Iſle of Bee, and then returned. At this time Henry Duke of Somerſet, Ralph Piercy, and divers others came in, and humbly ſubmitted themſelves to King Edward's mercy; who proteſted his propenſion of freely pardoning them, and as many other that would ſubmit themſelves as they did.

John Earl of Oxford beheaded.

Dukes and Earls created.

1462. All this time King Henry was in Scotland, and Queen Margaret in France; where ſhe obtained of the French King, a company of five hundred men, with whom ſhe ſailed towards Newcaſtle, and landed at Tinmouth, but ſuddenly again returned, and was her ſelf by tempeſt beaten to Berwick; but her company was driven on the ſhore before Bamburgh Caſtle, where they ſet their Ships on fire, and fled to an Iſland called Holy Iſland: but were ſo aſſailed there, by the Baſtard Ogle and John Manners Eſquire, that many of them were ſlain, and almoſt four hundred taken priſoners, only their Colonel Peter Breſſie happened upon a Fiſherman, who brought him to Berwick to Queen Margaret; and by her was made Captain of the Caſtle of Alnwick, which he with his French, men kept, till they were reſcued. Shortly after, Queen Margaret having gotten together a great company of Scots, and other of her Friends, bringing her Husband with her, and leaving her Son at Berwick, entred Northumberland, took the Caſtle of Bamburgh, made Captain thereof Sir Ralph Gray; and then came forward to the Biſhoprick of Durham, whither reſorted to her the lately reconciled, and now again revolted Duke of Somerſet, Sir Ralph Piercy, and divers others, who all together made a competent Army. King Edward hearing hereof, makes preparation both by Sea and Land; and firſt he ſends Viſcount Montacute with ſome Companies into Northumberland, whom he in perſon followeth with his whole power: The Viſcount marcheth towards King Henry, and by the way encountreth the Lord Hungerford at Hegley-moor; but he, with Lord Baſſe, upon the charge ran away, leaving Sir Ralph Darcy alone with his own Regiment, who were valiantly fighting, died. After this the Viſcount underſtanding that King Henry was incamped in Levels-plain, near the River of Dowel in Hexamſhire, marcheth thither by night, and ſet upon him in his Camp; whoſe charge the Northern men receive with a deſperate reſolution, but were in the end with great ſlaughter overcome. Henry Beaufort Duke of Somerſet, the Lord Baſſe, Molins, Hungerford, Wentworth, Huſſey, and Sir John Findern Knight, with many others, are taken priſoners. King Henry himſelf by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe eſcaped, but very hardly; for one of his Hench-men that followed him, was taken, who had on his head, King Henry's Helmet, or as ſome ſay, his high Cap of Eſtate, called Abacot, garniſhed with two rich Crowns, which was preſented to King Edward at York the fourth of May. The Duke of Somerſet was beheaded preſently at Hexam, the other Lords and Knights were had to Newcaſtle, and there after a little reſpite, were likewiſe put to death. Beſides theſe, divers others, to the number of five and twenty, were executed at York, and in other places. This Duke of Somerſet was never married, but had a natural Son named Charles Somerſet, who was afterward created Earl of Worceſter, Sir Humfrey Nevil, and William Talbot calling himſelf Earl of Kyme, Sir Ralph Gray, and Richard Tunſtal, with divers others that eſcaped from this Battel, hid themſelves in ſecret places; but yet not ſo cloſely, but that they were eſpied and taken. The Earl of Kyme was apprehended in Riddeſdale, and brought to Newcaſtle, and there beheaded; Sir Humfrey Nevil was taken in Holderneſs, and at York loſt his head. After this Battel called Hexam-field, King Edward came to the City of Durham; and ſent from thence into Northumberland, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Montacute, the Lords Fauconbridge and Scroop, to recover ſuch Caſtles as his enemies there held, which they effected: and taking in the Caſtle of Dunſtamburg, they found in it John Gois, ſervant to the Duke of Somerſet, who was brought to York, and there beheaded: and taking in the Caſtle of Bamburgh, they found in it Sir Ralph Gray; whom becauſe he had ſworn to be true to King Edward, and was now 1463. King Henry and his Queen get an Army in Scotland, and recover many Towns in the North parts.

Viſcount Montacute ſetteth upon King Henries armies: takes many of his Lords; and King Henry himſelf hardly eſcaped.

The Duke of Somerſet and other Lords put to death.

His baſe Son Charles Somerſet, created Earl of Worceſter.

Sir Ralph Grey degraded: and in what manner: and then beheaded.

now revolted to King Henry; they degraded from his order of Knighthood at Doncaſter, by cutting off his gilt Spurs, renting his Coat of Arms, and breaking his Sword over his head; and then beheaded him.

King Henry is taken in diſguiſe: brought diſgracefully to London: and committed to the Tower.

In this mean time, King Henry (upon what occaſion no man knows; but only led by the left hand of deſtiny) venturing in diſguiſe, to come into England, and ſhifting from place to place, was at length diſcovered, and taken by one Cantlow, or as others ſay, by Thomas Talbot, ſon to Sir Edward Talbot of Baſhal: who deceived him, being at his dinner at Wadington-Hall in Lincolnſhire, and brought him towards London, with his Legs tied under the horſe belly: in whoſe company were alſo taken Doctor Manning Dean of Windſor, Doctor Bedle, and one Ellerton, whom the Earl of Warwick met by the way, and brought them all to the Tower of London; whileſt the diſtreſſed Queen, with her Son, once again is driven to fly for ſhelter into France; whither the new Duke of Somerſet and his Brother John ſailed alſo, where they lived in great miſery; and the Earl of Pembroke went from Countrey to Countrey little better than a Vagabond.

The Queen flieth into France.

The Earl of Pembrook beyond Sea little better than a Vagabond.

At this time King Edward, to reward his followers, diſtributeth the Lands and Poſſeſſions of thoſe that held with King Henry amongſt them; but firſt made Proclamation that whoſoever of the contrary faction would come in and ſubmit, ſhould be received to Grace, and reſtored to their Patrimonies.

Serjeants at Law made.

In the fourth year of King Edward, in Michaelmas Term were made eight Serjeants at Law, Thomas Young, Nicholas Geney, Richard Neal, Thomas Brian, Richard Pigot, John Catesby, and Guy Faux, who held their Feaſt in the Biſhop of Ely's place in Holborn, where the Lord Grey of Ruthin, then Lord Treaſurer of England, was placed before the Lord Mayor of London, being invited to the Feaſt; which gave ſuch a diſtaſte to the Mayor, that he preſently departed with the Aldermen and Sheriffs, without taſting of their Feaſt: and it was regiſtred to be a precedent in time to come.

The Mayor of London offended that the Lord Treaſurer was placed before him.

And now King Edward no leſs intentive to perform the Office of a King in peace, than he had been before of a Captain in War, conſidering with himſelf, that ſeditious and civil diſſenſions muſt needs breed diſorders in a State, and that diſorders bred by troubled times, are not like troubled waters, that will in time ſettle of themſelves, and recover clearneſs; but are rather like weeds, which once ſpringing up and let alone, will in time over-run the whole ground where they grow, He like a good Gardiner ſeeks to weed them out before they grow too rank, and endeavours to make a general reformation of abuſes; and to that end in Michaelmas Term in the ſecond year of his Reign, three dayes together he ſate publickly with his Judges in Weſtminſter Hall on the Kings Bench, to acquaint himſelf with the orders of that Court, and to obſerve what needed reformation in it, either at Bench or at Bar: as likewiſe he ordered the Officers of his Exchequer to take more moderate Fees; and to be more intentive to the benefit of the Subject, than to their own unjuſt gain. He alſo daily frequented the Council Table, which he furniſhed for the moſt part, with ſuch as were gracious amongſt the Citizens, whom he imploves about references and buſineſſes of private conſequence; whileſt myſteries of State were intimated only to ſuch whom he ſelected to be of his more private Cabinet-Council: by whom he being now of the age of three and twenty years, was adviſed that it was now time to provide for poſterity, by taking a Wife; and to provide alſo for the preſent time, by taking a fit Wife, which they conceived to be no where ſo fitly found as in France; both thereby to bury old grudges between the two Nations, and alſo to avert aſſiſtance from Queen Margaret, the only diſturber of the State. And this being concluded, it only remained to make choice of a fit man for that employment, for which none was thought ſo fit as Richard Nevil Earl of Warwick; he therefore is preſently ſent into France, to treat of a Marriage to be had between King Edward and the Lady Bona, Daughter to Lewis Duke of Savoy, and ſiſter to the Lady Carlote then Queen of France; a Lady, no leſs for beauty and vertuous qualities, than for Nobility of Blood, worthy to be a Queen. The Propoſition is in France readily embraced, and willingly aſſented unto on all parts. But in the mean time King Edward being hunting in Wichwood Forreſt beſides Stony-Stratford, he chanced to come to the Manour of Grafton, where the Dutcheſs of Bedford then lay; and where her Daughter by Sir Richard Woodvile, the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Widow of Sir John Gray of Groby, ſlain at the laſt Battel of St. Albans, became a ſuitor to him for ſome Lands which her Husband had given her in joynture: with whoſe beauty and graceful behaviour, King Edward was ſo taken, that he preſently became a Suitor to her; and when he could not obtain his ſuit by terms of wanton love, he was forced to ſeek it by terms of Marriage.

The Earl of Warwick ſent into France to treat of a marriage with the Lady Bona.

In the mean time King Edward marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray.

And here we may well think, there was no ſmall conflict in King Edward's minde, between the two great Commanders, Love and Honour, which of them ſhould be moſt potent; Honour put him in minde that it was againſt his Law, to take to Wife a meaner perſon than himſelf: but Love would take no notice of any difference of degrees, but took it for his Prerogative to make all perſons equal. Honour perſwaded him that it ſtood him much upon to make good the Ambaſſage, in which he had ſent the Earl of Warwick to a great Prince; but love perſwaded him, that it ſtood him more upon to make good the Ambaſſage ſent to himſelf from a greater Prince. In concluſion, it appeared to be true which one obſerues, Improbe amor, quid non mortalia pectora cogis? What is it that Love will not make a man to do? Whether it be, that Love brings upon the minde a forgetfulneſs of all Circumſtances, but ſuch as tend to its own ſatisfaction; or whether it be that Love is amongſt Paſſions, as Oyls amongſt Liquors, which will alwayes be ſupreme and at the top. Honour may be honoured, but Love will be obeyed; and therefore King Edward though he knew no Superiour upon earth, yet he obeys the ſummons of Love; and upon the firſt day of May marriss the ſaid Lady Gray at Grafton; the King Edward ſits three daies together in the Kings Bench.

the firſt of our Kings ſince the Conqueſt that married his Subject: At which marriage none was preſent but the Dutcheſs of Bedford, the Prieſt, two Gentlewomen, and a young man to help the Prieſt at Maſs. The year after with great ſolemnity ſhe was Crowned Queen at 1465. Weſtminſter. It is not unworthy the relating the ſpeech which King Edward had with his Mother, who ſought to croſs this Match. "Where you ſay (ſaith he) that ſhe is a Widow, "and hath already Children, by Gods bleſſed "Lady, I am a Batchelor, and have ſome too; "and ſo each of us hath a proof, that neither "of us is like to be barren: And as for your "objection of Bigamy, (for his Mother had "charged him with being contracted to the La-"dy Elizabeth Lucy) Let the Biſhop (ſaith he) "lay it to my charge when I come to take Or-"ders, for I underſtand it is forbidden a Prieſt, "But I never wiſt it was forbidden a Prince.

The Queens Father created Earl Rivers, and her ſon Sir Thomas made Marqueſs of Dorſet.

Upon this marriage the Queens Father was created Earl Rivers, and made High Conſtable of England; his Brother the Lord Anthony was married to the ſole Heir of the Lord Scales, and by her had that Barony; her Son Sir Thomas Gray was created Marqueſs Dorſet, and married Cicely, Heir to the Lord Bonvile. It may be thought a happy fortune for this Lady to be thus matched; but let all things be conſidered, and the miſeries accrewing to her by it, will be found equivalent, if not over-weighing all the benefits. For firſt, by this match ſhe drew upon her ſelf the envy of many; and was the cauſe that her Husband fled the Realm, and her ſelf in his abſence glad to take Sanctuary: and in that place to be delivered of a Prince, in a moſt unprincely manner. After which, ſurviving her Husband, ſhe lived to ſee her two Sons moſt cruelly murthered; and for a concluſion of all, ſhe lived to ſee her ſelf confined to the Monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwark, and all her goods confiſcate by her own Son in Law.

The Earl of Warwick at his return finding the King married, grows diſcontented.

And now the Earl of Warwick at his return, found that knot tied in England, which he had laboured to tye in France: His Ambaſſage fruſtrated, the Lady Bona deluded, the King of France abuſed, and himſelf made a ſtale, and the diſgraceful inſtrument of all this, which although he reſented in a high degree, yet he had not been a Courtier ſo long, but in that time he had ſufficiently learned the Art of diſſembling; he paſſed it over lightly for the preſent, but yet carried it in his minde till a fit opportunity; and thereupon procures leave to retire himſelf to his Caſtle of Warwick.

King Edward in the mean time, having juſt cauſe to ſuſpect he had made the French his enemies, ſeeks to make other Princes his friends. He enters into a League with John King of Arragon, to whom he ſent for a preſent a ſcore of Cotſal Ews, and five Rams, a ſmall preſent in ſhew, but great in the event; for it proved of more benefit to Spain, and of more detriment to England than could at firſt ſight have been imagined. And to ſecure himſelf at home, he took truce with the King of Scots for fifteen years. And where he had married before his two Siſters, Anne the eldeſt to Henry Holland Earl of Exeter; and Elizabeth to John de la Pool Duke of Suffolk, he now matched Margaret his third Siſter to Charles Duke of Burgoigne, which proved a greater aſſiſtance to him, than that which he had loſt in France.

Cotſal Ewes ſent to the King of Aragon for a Preſent.

The Earl of Warwick and other Lords joyn againſt King Edward.

By this time the Earl of Warwick's ſpleen began ſo to ſwell within him, that he could no longer contain it; and having with much ado drawn to his party his two Brothers, the Archbiſhop of York, and the Marqueſs Montacute, he ſeeks alſo to draw in the Kings two Brothers, the Duke of Clarence, and the Duke of Gloceſter: but he found Gloceſter ſo reſerved, that he durſt not cloſe with him; the Duke of Clarence he found more open, and to him he addreſſeth himſelf, complaining of the diſgrace he had ſuſtained by the King in his employment into France, and other wrongs. To whom the Duke preſently made anſwer, in as great complaint of his Brothers unkindeneſs to himſelf; ſaying, he had married his Wives Brother Anthony to the Heir of the Lord Scales; and her Son Thomas to the Heir of the Lord Bonvile: but could finde no match of preferment for him being his own Brother. And upon this agreement in complaints they agree to joyn againſt King Edward; and to make the knot the firmer,

The Duke of Clarence marries the Earl of Warwicks Daughter.

the Duke of Clarence takes to Wife Iſabel the Earl of Warwick's Daughter: and with her hath aſſured unto him half of the Lands the Earl held in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, Daughter of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick deceaſed. Upon this marriage the Earl of Warwick diſcovered to him what hitherto he had concealed, concerning his project for the reſtoring of King Henry; to which Clarence gave approbation, with promiſe to aſſiſt him in it to his uttermoſt.

Sir Thomas Cooks troubles: and for what cauſe.

At this time Sir Thomas Cook, late Mayor of London, was by one Hawkins appeached of Treaſon, for the which he was ſent to the Tower, and his place in London ſeized by the Lord Rivers. The caſe was this, the ſaid Hawkins came to Sir Thomas, requeſting him to lend a thouſand Marks upon good ſurety; who anſwered, he would firſt know for whom it ſhould be, and for what intent: and underſtanding it ſhould be for the uſe of Queen Margaret, he refuſed to lend a penny. The matter reſted two or three years, till the ſaid Hawkins was laid in the Tower, and brought to the Brake, called The Duke of Exeters Daughter; by means of which pain, he confeſſed amongſt other things the motion he had made to Sir Thomas Cook, and accuſed himſelf ſo far, that he was put to death. Sir Thomas Cook lying in the Tower from Whitſuntide till Michaelmas, had his place in Eſſex named Gyddihal ſpoiled, his Deer in his Park deſtroyed; and though arraigned upon life and death, he were acquitted of the Indictment: yet could not be delivered till he had paid eight thouſand pounds to the King, and eight hundred to the Queen.

1461. The Earl of Warwick cauſeth a commotion to be raiſed in Yorkſhire.

And now the Earl of Warwick ſendeth to his Brothers the Archbiſhop and the Marqueſs, to prepare all things ready to ſet on foot the intended revolt from King Edward, and to procure ſome rebellious commotion in the North, whileſt he and his new Son in Law would provide to go forward with the work; which they accordingly did in Yorkſhire, an occaſion being taken taken for the breach of an ancient cuſtom there, to give to the poor people of St. Leonards in the City of York, certain quantities of Corn and Grain. This Commotion the Archbiſhop and the Marqueſs underhand fomented; yet to colour the matter, the Marqueſs oppoſed the Rebels, and cut off the head of Robert Huldorn their Captain: but his head being cut off, the Rebels got them other Captains; Henry, Son and Heir to the Lord Fitzhugh, and Sir Henry Nevil, Son to the Lord Latimer; the one the Nephew, the other a Couſin-german to the Earl of Warwick, with whom they joyn the valiant Captain Sir John Conyers. Theſe when they could not enter York, came marching towards London, all the way exclaiming againſt King Edward, as an unjuſt Prince, and an Uſurper. King Edward hearing of this Commotion, ſends Sir William Herbert, whom of a mean Gentleman, two years before he had made Earl of Pembroke, and his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, together with the Lord Stafford of Southwick, to ſuppreſs the Rebels; and they with an Army of ſeven thouſand, moſt Welchmen, march towards them: but the Lord Stafford being put from his Inne where he uſed to lodge, by the Earl of Pembroke, took ſuch a diſtaſte at it, that he withdrew his Archers, and gave over the buſineſs. Yet the Earl of Pembroke though thus forſaken, with his own Regiment encountred the Rebels, ſlew Sir Henry Nevil, and divers others; when being upon the point of Victory, one John Clappam a ſervant to the Earl of Warwick, coming in with five hundred raſcally fellows, and crying aloud a Warwick, a Warwick, the Welchmen ſuppoſing the Earl had been come, turned preſently their backs and fled: five thouſand of them were ſlain, the Earl of Pembrok himſelf, and his much lamented Brother, Sir Richard Herbert, a moſt goodly perſonage, were taken priſoners, brought to Banbury, where both of them, with ten other Gentlemen, were put to death. And now the Northamptonſhire men joyning with the Rebels in this fury, made them a Captain named Robert Hiliard, but they named him Robin of Riddeſdale; and ſuddenly came to Grafton, where they took the Earl Rivers Father to the Queen, and his Son Sir John Woodvile, brought them to Northampton, and there without Judgement beheaded them. King Edward advertiſed of theſe miſchances, wrote to the Sheriffs of Somerſetſhire and Devonſhire to apprehend the Lord Stafford of Southwick, (who had treacherouſly forſaken the Earl of Pembroke) and if they could take him, to put him to death; who being ſoon after found in a Village within Brentmarſh was brought to Bridgewater, and there beheaded. After this Battel fought at Hedgecote, commonly called Banbury-field, the Northern men reſorted to Warwick, where the Earl with great joy received them; and hearing that King Edward with a great Army was coming thither, he ſent for his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, with all ſpeed to repair unto him: who joyning together, and uſing means cunningly, by having ſome communication of Peace, to make the King ſecure, and to take little heed of himſelf, they took advantage of his ſecurity; and in the dead of the night ſet on his Camp, and killing the watch before the King was aware, at a place called Woolney, four miles from Berwick, they took him priſoner in his bed, and preſently conveyed him to Middleham Caſtle in Yorkſhire, to be there in ſafe cuſtody with the Archbiſhop of York. And now they had the prey in their hand, if they had as well looked to keep it, as they had done to get it: But King Edward whether bribing his Keepers, or otherwiſe winning them by fair promiſes, got ſo much liberty; ſometimes for his recreation to go a hunting: by which he cauſed Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Burgh, and divers of his Friends, at a certain time to meet him, who took him from his Keepers, and ſet him again at liberty: whileſt the Earl of Warwick, nothing doubting his Brother's the Archbiſhops's care in ſafe keeping him, and thinking the brunt of the Wars to be now paſt, diſmiſt his Army, and intended only to finde out King Henry, who was kept a priſoner, but few men knew where.

King Edward being now at liberty poſteth to York, and from thence to Lancaſter; where his Chamberlain the Lord Haſtings had raiſed ſome Forces; with which he marcheth to London, and is there joyfully received. The Earl of Warwick likewiſe ſends to his Friends, and makes preparation for a new Army; whileſt in the mean time, by the mediation of divers Lords an interview in Weſtminſter-Hall, is agreed upon, and ſolemn Oath taken on both ſides for ſafety, between King Edward, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick: but each party ſtanding ſtrictly upon terms tending to their own ends, they parted as great Enemies as they met: and ſo from thence the King went to Canterbury, the Duke and the Earl to Lincoln; whither they had pre-appointed their Forces to repair, under the conduct of Sir Robert Wells, Son and Heir of the Lord Wells, a man of great valour and experience in the Wars. King Edward to take off ſo able a man from the Earls part, ſends for his Father the Lord Wells to come unto him; who taking with him his Son in law Sir Thomas Dymock, and coming to attend the Kings pleaſure, was told by his Friends how wonderfully the King was incenſed againſt them: whereupon for their ſafety, they take Sanctuary at Weſtminſter. But upon the Kings Princely word they come unto him, who commandeth the Lord Wells to write to his Son, to deſiſt from adhering to the Earl of Warwick, which the Lord Wells accordingly did: but Sir Robert Wells notwithſtanding his Father's Letters, continuing firm to the Earl ſtill, ſo much incenſed King Edward, that he cauſed both his Father and Sir Thomas Dymock, to be beheaded. He ſuppoſed perhaps, that the Lord Wells was himſelf underhand a Friend to the Earl, and had not dealt ſincerely with him, in procuring his Son to leave that party. But now Sir Robert Wells ſeeing the King draw near to Stamford, where he had pitched his Tents, and hearing of his Fathers beheading, was much diſtracted what to do: to decline Battel with the King, he thought would ſhew too much fear; and to give him Battel before the Earl of Warwick were come with his Forces, would ſhew too much boldneſs. But his Veins were ſo filled with with a desire of revenging his Father's death, that he thought he could never shew boldness enough; and thereupon encountring with the Kings Army, far greater than his own, oppresst with multitude was taken prisoner, together Thomas de land, and divers others: who presently in the place, were put to execution. As soon as Sir Robert Wells was taken, the Lincolnshire men to make themselves the lighter to run away, threw off their Coats; for which cause, this Battel was afterward called Lose-coat field: in which, it is reported, were slain above ten thousand men.

Sir Robert Wells his son taken and put to death

The Earl of Warwick hearing of this defeat, and not having present means to raise an Army sufficient to oppose King Edward; when he could by no means draw the Lord Stanley to his party, he determined to sail into France, and hiring Ships at Dartmouth in Devonshire, he with his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, and their Wives took to Sea; and thinking to land at Callice, of which Town he himself was Captain, he was by the Lord Vaucleer a Gascoigne, whom he had left his Deputy there, repelled; and with so great inhumanity, that the Dutchess of Clarence, who was then in labour, was fain to be delivered in the Ship, (all the courtesie in that distress shewed was only to send a flagon or two of wine) which fact of Vaucleer's, when King Edward heard of, he was so well pleased with it, that he presently sent him a Patent to be Captain of the Town, himself: and the Duke of Burgoigne, for the same service, sent unto him Philip de Comines (who hath written the History of these times) with a grant of one thousand Crowns pension during his life. Never man was better paid for one act of dissembling; for the truth was, Præ amore exclusit foras, it was out of his love that he suffered him not to enter the Town: for he knew there were many great ones in it so addicted to King Edward, and so maliciously bent against the Earl, that if he or any of his company should have come, they would in all likelihood have done them some mischief. And hereof he made a good proof soon after; for when the Earl took to Sea again, the Lord Vaucleer sent sent him word, he should take heed where he landed, for that the Duke of Burgoigne lay in wait to take him: which advertisement did the Earl more good, than the keeping him out of Callice did him hurt. The Earl upon this advertisement landed at Diepe in Normandy, whereof when King Lewis heard, he sent and invited him to come to his Court at Ambois; where he received him with no less honour than if he had been a King: In the mean time, King Edward made enquiry for all such as were aiders to the Earl of Warwick; of whom some were apprehended as guilty, some fled to Sanctuary, and some submitted to the Kings mercy; as John Marques Montacute, whom he courteously received. Queen Margaret, who at this time sojourned with Duke Rayner her Father, hearing of the Earl of Warwick's arrival, with her Son Prince Edward, came to Ambois; and with her also came Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, lately escaped out of Prison, and fled into France: between whom a new combination is made, and for a foundation of firm amity, King Henry's Son Prince Edward, marries Anne the Earl of Warwick's second Daughter; After which marriage the Duke of Clarence and the Earls took a solemn Oath, never to leave the War till either King Henry or his Son Prince Edward were restored to the Crown. But now about this time, comes a Gentlewoman out of England, to the dissembling Lord Vaucleere at Callice, and payes him in his own coin; For she made a shew of intending great good to the Earl of Warwick, but had a purpose indeed to work his ruine: and by this shew she passed unsuspected to the Duke of Clarence, whom she perswaded to forsake the Earl of Warwick, as one that intended wholly the rooting out of the House of York, and only the advancing of the House of Lancaster; which he might well perceive by his marrying his second Daughter to Prince Edward, King Henry's only Son; and this reason with some other was so urged by the Gentlewoman, that it sank deeply into the Duke of Clarence his minde. So fit Agents of State are women sometimes, that can transact a business in covert; which if men should attempt, they would soon be discovered. And from this time forward the Duke of Clarence, as if the Gentlewoman had taught him the art of dissembling, sought secretly to reconcile himself to his Brother King Edward; but made a fair shew still to the Earl of Warwick.

Prince Edward marries a Daughter of the Earl of Warwick.

The Earl of Warwick flieth to Callice, where not received: and by what subtlety.

The Earl of Warwick honourably received by the King of France.

And now the Earl of Warwick having been six months in France, in this time he had procured from the King of France, both Ships, and Men, and Money; and receiving Letters out of England, that many Lords and others were ready to adventure their lives in this quarrel, if he would come (for the people generally held him in such admiration, that they thought the Sun was taken from the world, when he was absent; And this in great part for his great Hospitality, who it is said, used to spend six Oxen at a Breakfast) he with the Earls of Oxford and Pembroke took to Sea: and though the Duke of Burgoigne had a Fleet at Sea to intercept him, yet his Fleet being by tempest scattered; and King Edward trusting to that Fleet, having provided no other, the Earl had a quiet passage to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire: where being landed, he made Proclamation in King Henry the sixth's name, that all good Subjects should prepare to fight against King Edward, who contrary to the right had usurped the Crown. Upon which Proclamation, it is scarce to be believed, how many thousands of men resorted to him; with which Forces he made towards London: Upon notice of whose approach, on Sunday next after Michaelmas day, one Doctor Goddard a Chaplain of his, preaching at Pauls-Cross, did so set forth his Earls pious Intention, that many of his Auditory were moved to favour the Earls proceeding: insomuch, that the Marques Montacute, who had in King Edward's behalf levied six thousand men about London, found them all inclinable to go with him to the Earl of Warwick, and accordingly went and joyned with him. King Edward hearing of the great flocking of people to the Earl, sent forth Letters into all parts of the Realm for raising an Army; but few came, and those few with no great great good will: which when he perceived, he began to doubt his caſe; and thereupon accompanied with the Duke of Gloceſter his Brother, the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlain, (who having married the Earl of Warwick's Siſter, yet continued ever true to King Edward) and the Lord Scales Brother to the Queen; he departed into Lincolnſhire, and coming to Lyn, he found there an Engliſh Ship, and two Hulks of Holland ready to make ſail: whereupon he, with the fore-named Lords, and about ſeven or eight hundred perſons entred the Ships, having no proviſion with him but only the apparel they wore: and ſo bare of money, that he was fain to reward the Maſter of his Ship with one of his Garments: and thus making courſe towards the Duke of Burgoignes Countrey, they were preſently chaſed by eight great Ships of Eaſterlings, open Enemies both to England and France; which drove him before a Town in the Countrey called Alquemare, belonging to the Duke of Burgoigne; where by chance the Lord Grunture, Governour of that Countrey, at that time was, who defended them from the Eaſterlings, and brought them to the Hague in Holland, where they had all things miniſtred to them, by order from the Duke of Burgoigne.

The Queen taketh Sanctuary: where ſhe is brought to Bed.

At this time, upon news of the Earl of Warwick's approach, Queen Elizabeth forſaketh the Tower, and ſecretly taketh Sanctuary at Weſtminſter; where in great penury forſaken of all her friends, ſhe was brought to bed of a Son called Edward, who like a poor mans child was Chriſtened: the Godfathers being the Abbot and Prior of Weſtminſter, and the Lady Scroop Godmother.

The Earl of Warwick removes King Henry out of priſon: where he had been held almoſt nine years

And now the Earl of Warwick entring the Tower, removes King Henry out of his hold of durance, where he had been almoſt nine years, into his own Lodging, where he was ſerved according to his Eſtate; which the Earl did more congratulate than the King himſelf. Upon the ſixth day of October, King Henry accompanyed with the Archbiſhop of York, the Prior of St. Johns, the Biſhop of London, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and other Noblemen, apparelled in a long Gown of blue Velvet, was conducted through London, to the Biſhops Palace, where he reſted till the thirteenth of that month; on which day he went on in ſolemn Proceſſion about Paul's Church, wearing his Imperial Crown; the Earl of Warwick bearing up his Train, and the Earl of Oxford the Sword before him. The next day in all uſual places about London, King Edward was proclaimed an Uſurper, and all his partakers Traytors to God and the King; whereof John Lord Tiptoft Earl of Worceſter, as a partaker with King Edward, was made the firſt example. This Lord had been Lieutenant for King Edward in Ireland, where having done ſomething for which he fled, he was afterward found on the top of a high tree, in the Forreſt of Waybridge, in the County of Huntington; and being there taken, was brought to London, attainted, and beheaded on the Tower-Hill, and after buried at the Black-Friers.

King Edward proclaimed an Uſurper.

The extreme melancholy of Sir John Hawkſford or Hankford

About this time happened an accident not unworthy to be related: Sir William Hawkſford Knight, one of the chief Juſtices at the Law, who dwelt at Annory in Devonſhire, a man of great poſſeſſions; and having no Son, the Lord Fitzwarren, Sir John Sentleger, and Sir William Bolloin, married his Daughters, and were his Heirs: This man grew into ſuch degree of Melancholy, that one day he called to him the Keeper of his Park, charging him with negligence in ſuffering his Deer to be ſtolen: and thereupon commanded him, that if he met any man in his Circuit in the night time, that would not ſtand or ſpeak, he ſhould not ſpare to kill him whoſoever he were. The Knight having thus laid his foundation, and meaning to end his doleful dayes, in a certain dark night ſecretly conveyed himſelf out of his houſe, and walked alone in his Park. The Keeper in his night-walk hearing one ſtirring, and coming towards him, asked, who was there? but no anſwer being made, he willed him to ſtand; which when he would not do, the Keeper ſhot, and killed him, and coming to ſee who it was, found him to be his Maſter.

On the twentieth day of November a Parliament is held at Weſtminſter, wherein King Edward and all his partakers are attainted of high Treaſon, and all their Lands and Goods ſeized on to King Henry's uſe. George Plantagenet Duke of Clarence is by Authority of this Parliament, adjudged Heir to Richard Duke of York his Father, and that Dutchy ſettled upon him and his Heirs, notwithſtanding the Primogeniture of Edward: Upon him alſo was entailed the Crown of England, in caſe Heirs male of the Body of King Henry failed. Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford are fully reſtored to their Lands and Honour; and Warwick and Clarence are made Governours of the King and Kingdom. To this Parliament came the Marqueſs Montacute, excuſing himſelf, that for fear of death he had taken King Edward's part; which excuſe was accepted. Queen Margaret is ſent into France, but by reaſon of contrary windes was kept back all that Winter, King Henries prophetical ſpeech of Henry afterward K. Henry the ſeventh.

About this time Jaſper Earl of Pembroke going into Wales to view his Land in Pembrokeſhire, found there the Lord Henry, born of Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir of John the firſt Duke of Somerſet, not being then full ten years of age, kept in manner like a Captive, but honourably brought up by the Lady Herbert. Him he brings with him to London, and preſents him to King Henry; whom when the King had a good while beheld, he ſaid to the Lords about him: Lo, this is he, to whom both we and our Adverſaries, leaving the poſſeſſion of all things, ſhall hereafter give place. Which if it be true, it ſhews a very Prophetical Spirit to have been in King Henry; that could ſo long before foretel a thing ſo unlikely to happen; for this was he that was afterward King Henry the Seventh, before whom at that time there were many lives in being, of both the Houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Shortly after this, by the Duke of Burgoignes means, King Edward is furniſhed with eighteen tall Ships, two thouſand Dutchmen, and fifty thouſand Florens of Gold; and thus furniſhed, he took to Sea, and landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where he found but cold entertainment;

King Edward assisted by the Duke of Burgoign takes to sea and lands in York-shire.

He swears deeply that he came but only to recover his own Inheritance.

nevertheleſs he made a wary march to York, where likewiſe be found no great expreſſion of welcome; ſo as he was forced to change his pretence, ſwearing deeply and receiving the Sacrament upon it, that he came not to diſturb King Henry, but only to recover his own Inheritance; and for the more ſhew thereof, wearing an Eſtrich Feather, Prince Edward's Livery; which propoſition ſeemed ſo reaſonable, that many, who reſiſted him before, were as ready to aſſiſt him now: And if he be blamed for breaking his Oath, it muſt be conſidered, it was Regni cauſâ, to recover his Kingdom, which perhaps was the Inheritance he meant, when he took his Oath, that he intended nothing but to recover his Inheritance: and ſo he brake not his Oath neither. From York he marched towards Wakefield and Sandal, leaving the Caſtle of Pomfret upon his left hand, where the Marqueſs Montacute with his Army lay, but did not offer to ſtop him: from Wakefield he came to Doncaſter, and from thence to Nottingham, where there came to him Sir William Parre, and Sir James Harrington with ſix hundred men; alſo Sir Thomas Burgh, and Thomas Montgomery, with their aids, who cauſed him to make a Proclamation in his own name; affirming they would ſerve no man but a King. From Nottingham he came to Leiceſter, where three thouſand able men, and well armed came unto him: From Leiceſter he came before the Walls of Coventry, into which City the Earl of Warwick had withdrawn himſelf, keeping himſelf cloſe therein with his people, being about ſix or ſeven thouſand men: three dayes together King Edward provoked him to come forth to Battel; but he ſtayed for more Forces, and would not do it: whereupon King Edward marched forward to Warwick, eight miles from Coventry, thinking thither at leaſt he ſhould have drawn the Earl of Warwick; but neither would that do it: Indeed the Earl looked for the coming of the Duke of Clarence, with twelve thouſand men to joyn with him; but that expectation proved vain. For the Duke was now fully reconciled to his Brother King Edward, and brought all his Forces to joyn with him, only he ſought to make amity between King Edward and the Earl: But though King Edward offered general pardon, and other fair conditions; yet none would pleaſe the Earl without reſtoring of King Henry. But now to repair the defection of the Duke of Clarence, there came to the Earl of Warwick at Coventry, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Exeter, and the Marqueſs Montacute; by whoſe coming that ſide was not a little ſtrengthened; yet all this aid would not make the Earl of Warwick to come to Battel: whereupon King Edward marched forward towards London. Both ſides ſeek to make London their friend, the Earl of Warwick ſends to his Brother the Archbiſhop of York, to labour in it; who thereupon cauſed King Henry to mount on Horſeback, and to ride from Pauls through Cheap, down Walbrook, ſuppoſing that this ſhewing of the King would have allured the Citizens to aſſiſt him; but this device prevailed little, brought not in above ſeven or eight thouſand men, a ſmall proportion to withſtand King Edward: and when the Archbiſhop of York ſaw this backwardneſs in the Citizens, or rather indeed an inclination to King Edward, he ſecretly ſent to him to receive him into grace; which, upon promiſe to continue faithful hereafter, he obtained. The eleventh of April, in the year 1471. and the eleventh of his reign, King Edward made his entry into the City of London, riding firſt to Pauls Church, and from thence to the Biſhops Palace, where the Archbiſhop of York preſented himſelf unto him, and having King Henry by the hand delivered him to King Edward (ſix months after his re-adeption of the Crown) and then King Edward being ſeiſed of his perſon, went from Pauls to Weſtminſter, and there gave God moſt hearty thanks for his ſafe return. The reaſons alledged here by Philip Commines for the Citizens receiving of King Edward, ſeem ſcarce worthy of ſo good an Author: One cauſe (ſaith he) was becauſe King Edward being extremly indebted in the City, if they had not received him, they ſhould have loſt their debt; Another, becauſe he had won the love of many Citizens Wives, who importuned their Husbands to receive him.

He comes to Coventry where the E. of Warwick lay; but would not come forth to battel.

King Edward makes his entry into London and is joyfully received.

King Henry is delivered into his hands.

The Earl of Warwick comes with his Army to Barnet

The Earl of Warwick having Intelligence that King Edward was received into London, and King Henry delivered into his hand, marched out, and encamped at St. Albans, and after ſome refreſhing of his Army, removed towards Barnet, and in a large plain there called Cladmore-heath, pitched his Camp; which King Edward hearing, on Eaſter Eve the thirteenth of April, he marched forth, and came that evening to Barnet, where he would not ſuffer a man of his Army to ſtay in the Town, but commanded them all to the field, and lodged with his Army more neer to the Enemy than he was aware, by reaſon of a Miſt, (raiſed ſome ſay by one Bungey a Conjurer) which made it ſo dark, that it could not well be obſerved where they were encamped. In taking his ground he cauſed his people to keep as much ſilence as was poſſible, thereby to keep the enemy from knowing of their approach. Great Artillery they had on both parts, but the Earl more than the King; and therefore in the night time, they ſhot from his Camp almoſt continually, but did little hurt, becauſe they ſtill over-ſhot them, as lying nearer than was conceived. On Eaſter day, early in the morning, both Armies are ordered for Battel; the Earl of Warwick appointed the Command of the Right Wing, which conſiſted of Horſe, to his Brother the Marqueſs Montacute, and the Earl of Oxford; the Left Wing, conſiſting likewiſe of Horſe, was led by himſelf and the Duke of Exeter; and the main Battel, conſiſting of Bills and Bows, was conducted by the Duke of Somerſet. On the Kings part, the Vaward was commanded by the Duke of Gloceſter; the Battel (in which was King Henry) was led by King Edward himſelf; and the Lord Haſtings brought on the Reer. After Exhortations for encouragement of their Souldiers, the fight began; which with great valour was maintained by the ſpace of ſix hours, without any apparent diſadvantage on either ſide; only the Earls Vaward, by the valiancy of the Earl of Oxford, ſeemed ſomewhat to over-match the Kings, which made ſome flying towards London, to carry news that the

The two Armies meet.

the Earl of Warwick had won the field; and he had perhaps done ſo indeed, but for a ſtrange misfortune which happened to the Earl of Oxford, and his men; for they having a Star with ſtreams on their Liveries, as King Edward's men had the Sun, the Earl of Warwick's men, by reaſon of the Miſt, not well diſcerning the badges ſo like, ſhot at the Earl of Oxford's men that were on their part: whereupon the Earl of Oxford cried Treaſon, and fled with eight hundred men. At length after great ſlaughter made on both ſides, King Edward (having the greater number of men, as ſome write, though others ſay the contrary.) cauſed a new power of freſh men (which he had kept of purpoſe) to come on; which the Earl of Warwick obſerving being a man of an invincible courage, nothing diſmayed, ruſhed into the midſt of his Enemies, where he adventured ſo far, that amongſt the preſs he was ſtricken down and ſlain. (Though ſome write, that the Earl ſeeing the deſperate eſtate of his Army, leapt on a Horſe to flie; and coming to a Wood where was no paſſage, one of King Edward's men came to him, killed him, and ſpoiled him to the naked skin.) The Marqueſs Montacute, thinking to ſuccour his Brother, loſt likewiſe his life, and left the Victory to King Edward. On both ſides were ſlain, as Hall ſaith, ten thouſand at the leaſt: Fabian ſaith but fifteen hundred, but then he means only of the Kings ſide. Upon the Kings part were ſlain the Lord Cromwel, the Lord Say, the Lord Montjoyes Son and Heir, Sir Humfrey Bourchier Son and Heir to the Lord Berners, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. On the Earls part, were ſlain the Earl himſelf, the Marqueſs Montacute, and three and twenty Knights, of whom Sir William Tyrrel was one, The Duke of Somerſet, and the Earl of Oxford fled into Wales, to Jaſper Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Exeter being ſtrucken down, and ſo wounded, that he was left for dead, amongſt other the dead bodies, becauſe he was not known; but coming to himſelf, he got up, and eſcaped to Weſtminſter, and there took Sanctuary. The dead bodies of the Earl and Marqueſs were brought to London in a Coffin, and by the ſpace of three dayes lay open faced in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; and then buried with their Anceſtors in the Priory of Biſſam. This Earl of Warwick was Richard Nevil, Son and Heir of Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury, who married the Daughter of Richard Beauchamp, the ſixth Earl of Warwick, and in her right was Earl of Warwick, in his own, of Salisbury. He was alſo Lord Monthemer, great Chamberlain, and high Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the North Marches towards Scotland, and High Steward of the Dutchy of Lancaſter: He had iſſue two Daughters, Iſabel married to George Duke of Clarence, and Anne, firſt married to Prince Edward, King Henry the Sixth's Son, and after to Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

Where the Earl of Warwick with many other Lords is ſlain.

The Honours he enjoyed, and of his Iſſue.

We may here obſerve a conſtellation of diſaſtrous influences, concurring all to the overthrow of this great Warwick; whereof if any one had been miſſing, the wheel of his Fortune had not perhaps turned; for if the City of York had not too credulouſly believed King Edward's Oath, not to diſturb King Henry; or if the Marqueſs Montacute had ſtopped (as he might) his paſſage at Pomfret; or if the Duke of Clarence had not at the very point of the Battel, at St. Albans, deſerted his party and joyned with King Edward; or if Queen Margaret had not by tempeſt been kept from coming into England in time; or if the Londoners had not been retrograde, and deceived his expectation, he had never perhaps been overthrown as he was: But Fata viam invenient, deſtiny will finde wayes that were never thought of, will make way, where it findes none; and that which is ordained in heaven, ſhall be effected by means, of which Earth can take no notice.

Queen Margaret, when it was too late, accompanied with John Longſtrother, Prior of St. Johns, and the Lord Wenlock, with divers Knights and Eſquires, took ſhipping at Harflew, the four and twentieth of March, but by tempeſt was kept back till the thirteenth of April; and then with her Son Prince Edward, ſhe landed at Weymouth, and from thence went to an Abbey hard by, called Ceern, and then to Bewly in Hampſhire, whither there came unto her, Edmund Duke of Somerſet, and Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, with divers others; amongſt whom it is reſolved once more to try their fortune in the Field. But then the Queen would have had her Son Prince Edward to be ſent into France, there to remain in ſafety, till the next Battel were tried; but they being of a contrary minde, and eſpecially the Duke of Somerſet, ſhe at length conſented, though afterward ſhe repented it. From Bewly ſhe with her Son and the Earl of Somerſet paſſeth on to Briſtow, intending with what power they could raiſe in Gloceſterſhire, to march into Wales, to joyn with Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, who was there making preparation of more Forces. King Edward hearing of theſe things, reſolves to croſs this conjunction, and follows Queen Margaret with a great power ſo cloſe, that near Tewksbury in Gloceſterſhire he overtakes her Forces, who reſolutely turn and make head againſt him; where Somerſet, on the Queens part, leading the Vant-guard, performed the part of a valiant Commander; but finding his Souldiers through wearineſs begin to faint, and that the Lord Wenlock, who had the conduct of the Battel on the Queens part, moved not, he rode unto him, and upbraiding him with cowardiſe or treachery, never ſtaid, but with a Pollax beat out his brains: And now before he could bring in his men to the reſcue, their Vaward was routed, and John Earl of Devonſhire, with above three thouſand of the Queens part were ſlain. The Queen her ſelf, John Beaufort the Duke of Somerſets Brother, the Prior of Saint John's, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers others were taken priſoners; all which except the Queen, were the next day beheaded. At which time Sir Richard Crofts preſented to King Edward King Henry's Son Edward, whom he had taken priſoner; to whom King Edward at firſt ſhewed no uncourteous countenance; but demanding of him, how he durſt ſo preſumptuouſly enter into his Realm with Arms? And he anſwering, though truly, yet unſeaſonably, To recover my Fathers Kingdom and Heritage: King Edward with his hand thruſt him from him, or Queen Margaret cometh over, and gets two Armies.

But is overthrown by King Edward.

The Queen is taken priſoner.

(as some say) struck him with his Gantlet, and then presently George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Gray Marques Dorset, and William Lord Hastings standing by, fell upon him in the place, and murthered him. His body was homely interred with other ordinary Corps, in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-fryers in Tewkslury. After the victory thus obtained, King Edward repaired to the Abbey Church of Tewkslury, to give God thanks for his good success; and finding there a great number of his enemies that were fled thither to save themselves, he gave them all free pardon; only Edmund Duke of Somerset, John Longstrother Prior of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Tresham, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers other Knights and Esquires, who were apprehended there, and brought before the Duke of Gloucester, sitting that day as Constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk as Marshal, were all arraigned, condemned, and judged to dye; and accordingly upon the Tuesday, being the seventh of May, they were all, and twelve other Knights more, on a Scaffold set up in the middle of the Town, beheaded, but not dismembred, and permitted to be buried. The same day Queen Margaret was found in a poor house of Religion, not far from thence, into which she was fled for safeguard of her life; but she was after brought to London, and there kept a prisoner, till her Father ransomed her with great sums of money. This was the last pitcht Battel that was fought in England, in King Edward the fourths dayes; which happened on the fourth of May, being Saturday, in the eleventh year of his Reign, and in the year of our Lord 1471.

Her Son Prince Edward is murthered.

The Duke of Somerset, and others beheaded.

Queen Margaret is kept in durance, till her Father fetched her away.

King Edward being assured that as long as any partakers of King Henry lived and were at liberty, he should never be free from plots against his life, sent Roger Vaughan, a Gentleman much reckoned of in his own Countrey, to entrap Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who had escaped from the last encounter; but he having notice of the plot before, prevented it by striking off Vaughans head.

After these great Clouds were thus dispersed, there arose a little Cloud, which gave the Realm, at least the City of London, no small disquiet. For now, Thomas Bastard Fauconbridge, who had been employed by the Earl of Warwick to scowr the Seas, hearing of these defeats; having inriched himself by Piracy, gathered together an Army of seventeen thousand men; and coming to London, imperiously commanded admission into the City, and releasement of King Henry out of prison: but being denyed entrance, and hearing that King Edward with a great power was coming towards him, he brings up his Shipping to Saint Katherines, and taking with him his most desperate men, with them he marched to Kingstone-bridge; but finding that Bridge broken down, and all the places of passage guarded, he withdrew his Forces into Saint Georges field, from whence he prepared to assault the City of London: for the effecting whereof he landed all his Ship Ordnance, and planted them all along the Banks side, with which he battered down many houses, and much annoyed the City: but the Citizens on the other side lodged their great Artillery against their Adversaries, with which they so galled them, that they durst not abide in any place along the water side, but were driven even from their own Ordnance. Then he appointed his men to set fire on the Bridge, and withal caused three thousand to pass over the Thames, and some of them to assault Aldgate, and some Bishopsgate; but they were in all places by the industry of the Citizens repelled, and chiefly by Robert Basset, and Ralph Jocelyne Aldermen. Upon this he retired to Black heath, and there encamped by the space of three dayes, but then hearing that King Edward was coming with a great Army, he got him to his Ship, but the rest fled, some one way, some another. The one and twentieth of May, the King coming to London, thanked the Citizens for their pains and care, and dubbed the Mayor, the Recorder Ursewick, and Basset and Jocelyne Aldermen, Knights.

The Bastard Fauconbridge makes disturbance about London.

And now the time was come for King Henry to be delivered out of all his troubles; for the bloody Duke of Gloucester entring the Tower, where he found King Henry nothing at all troubled with all his Crosses, struck him into the heart with his Dagger, and there slew him. And now we have had within the space of half a year, one Parliament proclaiming King Edward an Usurper, and King Henry a lawful King; and another proclaiming King Edward a lawful King, and King Henry an Usurper: That we may know in humane affairs, there is nothing certain, but uncertainty; nothing stable, but instability.

King Henry is murthered by the Duke of Gloucester.

King Edward, presently after the interment of King Henry, draws his Forces towards Sandwich in Kent, where some of the followers of Fauconbridge, to the number of eight or nine hundred, had in the Castle there, strongly fortified themselves; but upon their asking pardon, and submitting themselves to the King, with promise to be faithful Subjects ever after, they had their pardon granted them, and then they delivered up both Castle and Ships, to the number of thirteen, to the Kings use. But how this Composition was observed, may be imagined; when Fauconbridge, who was comprised in the same pardon, was afterward taken and executed at Southampton; Spicing, and Quintine the Captains that assailed Aldgate and Bishopsgate, and were in Sandwich Castle at the surrender thereof, were presently beheaded at Canterbury; and their heads placed on Poles, upon those Gates. And by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, many both in Essex and Kent, were arraigned and condemned for this Rebellion, and more fined.

Fauconbridge executed.

And now King Edward desiring to be secured from all suspected persons, sent the Archbishop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, over to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe custody; and there he remained a long time, till at length by friendship he was delivered, and shortly after died. Likewise John Earl of Oxford, who after Barnet Field yielded himself to King Edward, had his life pardoned; but yet was sent over Sea to the Castle of Hammes, where for the space of twelve years he was shut up in a strong Prison, and narrowly looked to; whose Lady all that time was not suffered to come unto to him, nor had any thing to live upon, but what people of their charities gave her; or what she could get by Needle or other work. As for the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond, who were fled out of the Realm to the Duke of Britain, King Edward sent to the Duke, requiring to have them delivered up to him, upon promise of great rewards; to which the Duke made answer, that he could not with his honour deliver them up, whom he had taken into his Protection; but that for King Edward's sake, he would take such care of them, that he should need to take no care for them; and to that end he sequestred their own servants from them, and appointed Britains to attend upon them.

King Edward seeks to get the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond into his hands.

It was now the thirteenth year of King Edward's Reign, in which a Parliament was called at Westminster: wherin all Acts formerly made by him, are confirmed or revived; and all their Lands and Goods confiscated, that had taken part against him and were fled, and all their Lands and Goods restored to such as had taken part with him.

1473.

King Edward being destin'd to be alwayes in troubles; now that he had quietness at home, was drawn into new broils abroad; for the Duke of Burgoigne at this time having Wars with France, thought he could no way make a better harvest to himself, then by sowing seeds of dissention between France and England: and to this end he sends Ambassadours to King Edward, to solicit him to set on foot his Title to the Crown of France, making great offers, with protestation to assist him in it, both with Purse and Person. This Proposition being seriously debated by the Kings Privy Council, is at last approved of, as being both lawful and behoveful, for the honour of the King, and good of the Kingdom. Only means to bear the charges of the War, were wanting; to supply which by a Parliamentary course, would ask too much time: A new course therefore is devised, to procure money from the Subject by way of Benevolence; and this course was taken.

King Edward is moved by the Duke of Burgoigne to make War upon France.

A Benevolence to raise money.

About this time Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, and Earl of Huntington disinherited by Act of Parliament in the fourth year of this King, (though he had married King Edward's Sister) yet grew to so great misery, that passing over into Flanders, I there saw him (saith Commines) running bare-legged after the Duke of Burgundies train, begging his bread for Gods sake; whom the Duke of Burgundy at that time not knowing (though they had married two Sisters) but hearing afterward who he was, gave him a small Pension to maintain him; till not long after he was found dead upon the shore of Dover, and stripped all naked; but how he came to his death, could never by any enquiry be brought to light.

Henry Holland Duke of Exeter his miserable life and death.

Provision for this French expedition being throughly made, and order taken for the quiet Government of the Kingdom in his absence, and the stop of incursions, if any by the Scots should be made: King Edward with an Army of fifteen hundred men at Arms, all of the Nobility and Gentry, fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback, eight thousand common Souldiers, and three thousand Pioneers, came down to Dover; whither the Duke of Burgoigne had sent five hundred flat Bottom'd Boats to transport the Horse to Callice; yet for all that help, it was two and twenty dayes before the Kings Forces were all past over. Before the Kings departure from Dover, (to the end he might not seem to surprize him) he sent an Herauld named Garter, a Norman by birth, with a Letter of Defiance to the French King, (so well written, saith Commines, that he thought it not of any English mans inditing; as though English men could not indite as well as the French) requiring him to yield unto him the Crown of France, his unquestionable Inheritance; which if he should dare to deny, he would then endeavour to recover it by the Sword. This Letter the French King read, and thereupon withdrawing himself, caused the Herauld to be brought to his presence, to whom in private he gave this answer: That the Duke of Burgoigne, and the Earl of Saint Paul the Constable, (by whose instigation he knew the King of England was drawn to this design) would but delude him, for that they were Dissemblers and Impostors; and therefore said, it would conduce more to the honour of the King of England to continue in League with him, though an old Adversary; than to hazard the fortune of the Wars, upon the promised assistance of new-come Deceivers: And so commend me (saith he) to the King thy Master, and say what I have told thee; and then with an honourable reward of three hundred Crowns, dismist him. The Herauld promised to do all that in him lay, and (beyond his Commission) shewed the French King wayes, (by working upon the Lords Howard and Stanley) by which he might enter into a Treaty for Peace, which he doubted not would sort to a good conclusion. The French King glad to hear it, gave the Herauld, besides the other reward, a piece of Crimson Velvet of thirty yards long; and withal sent to King Edward the goodliest Horse he had in his Stable, as also an Ass, a Wolf, and a Wilde Boar, beasts at that time rare in England: And then the Herauld returning to Callice, delivered to King Edward the French Kings answer.

He sends a Herauld to the King of France to demand the Crown.

The Heralds instruction to the King of France what to do.

And now to make good the French King's allegation to the Herauld, the Duke of Burgoigne who had promised in the word of a Prince, to bring to Callice by this time two thousand Launces, and four thousand Stadiots or light-Horse, failed to come: Whereupon the Lord Scales is by King Edward sent to the Duke, to put him in minde of his promise, and to hasten his coming with his promised Forces: But the journey was to little purpose, only it occasioned the Duke with a small troop of Horse to come to the King, formally to excuse himself for having been so backward; but the cause (he said) was, for that having been imbroyled in the siege of Nuz, he could not depart thence, without infinite disgrace, if neither composition nor submission were enforced; which now notwithstanding, because he would not too much trespass upon his patience, he was enforced to do, by the obstinacy of the besieged; but promised to supply all defects, both with his presence and power, and that speedily.

The Duke of Burgoigne and the Constable of France fail King Edward in performance of their promises.

King Edward with an Army passeth over into France.

The

The Conſtable likewiſe by his Letter perſwades the King of England to proceed in the action, and not to doubt both from the Duke and himſelf to be ſufficiently every way accommodated.

King Edward thus encouraged, paſſeth on, but in his way found no performance of promiſes either on the Dukes or Conſtables part; for the Duke did not accommodate the Souldiers, at their coming to Peronne, with Victuals or Lodging, in ſuch manner as was requiſite and expected: and the Conſtable, inſtead of ſurrendring up St. Quintins according to agreement, made a ſally out upon ſuch as were ſent from the King of England to take poſſeſſion, and plaid upon them with his great Ordinance; whereupon King Edward began to ſuſpect the truth of the French Kings deſcription of the Dukes and Conſtables conditions; and from thence forward ſtood upon his own Guard, and gave no further credit to their Proteſtations; which the Duke of Burgoigne reſenting, pretending occaſions for the haſtning forward his Forces, and promiſing ſpeedy return together with them, taketh his leave and departeth, which did not a little increaſe the Kings ſuſpicion.

The King of France ſends a counterfeit Herauld to King Edward to propound conditions of Peace.

The French King having intelligence of the Duke of Burgoignes departure, fore-caſting the danger, if they ſhould unite their Forces; reſolved with himſelf to aſſay what might be done to mediate a Peace in the Dukes abſence; and yet ſo to treat, that if it took not effect, he might diſclaim the knowledge of the overture: Whereupon he privately diſpatcheth a meſſenger, in ſhew an Herauld; but was indeed a fellow of no office or eſtimation, and not known to any of the Kings houſhold, but to Villiers the Maſter of the Horſe, who only was acquainted with the plot and party. This counterfeit Purſuivant at Arms, with a Coat made of a Trumpets Banner-rowl, addreſſed himſelf to the King of England, and upon admiſſion to his preſence, inſinuates the French Kings deſire, which was, to have Commiſſioners on both parts aſſigned, to confer of the means to reconcile the differences between the two Kings; or at leaſt to conclude a ceſſation from Arms for ſome time. And ſo well this Meſſenger delivered his errand, that it was credited, and the Kings requeſt granted; and thereupon Letters of ſafe conduct are ſent of both ſides, for ſuch Commiſſioners as to this purpoſe ſhould meet at Amyens. For King Edward came the Lord Howard, Sir Anthony Sentleger, and Doctor Morton, after made Lord Chancellour of England. For King Lewis came the Admiral of France, the Lord Saint Piers, and Heberg Biſhop of Eureux.

The conditions of Peace between the two Kings.

After long Conference, Articles of Peace were concluded on to this effect: That the French King ſhould pay preſently to the King of England, threeſcore and fifteen thouſand Crowns, and from thenceforth annually fifty thouſand Crowns, during the life of King Edward: That within one year, the French King ſhould ſend for the Lady Elizabeth the King of England's Daughter, and joyn her in Marriage to the Dauphin: That the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheyney Maſter of the Horſe, ſhould remain in Hoſtage there, till the Engliſh Army had quitted France, and a general Peace for nine years: wherein the Dukes of Burgoigne and Britain, are included if they will accept thereof. This Concluſion was the more eaſily compaſſed by the King of France his following the Heraulds counſel; for he diſtributed ſixteen thouſand Crowns amongſt King Edward's Counſellors and Favourites; two thouſand Crowns to the Lord Haſtings the Kings Chamberlain; and to the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Anthony Sentleger, and Montgomery, the reſidue; beſides great ſtore of Plate and Jewels, diſtributed amongſt inferiour Officers of the Court. The Duke of Gloceſter only oppoſed this accord, as not ſuiting with his deſign; nevertheleſs it proceeded, and notice thereof is preſently ſent to the Duke of Burgoigne, who thereupon only with fifteen Horſe, comes poſting to the Engliſh Camp, whom King Edward perſwades to enter into the Peace, according to the reſervation; but he in great chafe, reproacheth King Edward for entring into it himſelf; ſaying, That his Predeceſſors had by many brave exploits gotten fame and reputation upon the French; and now he had brought his Souldiers only to ſhew them the Countrey, and return as they came; adding withal, that to make it appear he was able without help of the Engliſh to ſubſiſt of himſelf, he utterly diſclaimed any benefit by that Truce, until three months after the Engliſh were returned to their own Countrey; and ſo in a great ſnuffe returned home.

The Duke of Burgoigne reproacheth King Edward for making the Peace.

For the better confirmation of what is agreed upon between the two Kings, an enterview is deſired; but before the ſame is effected, the French King ſends the Engliſh Army an hundred Tonne of Gaſcoigne Wine, to be drunk out amongſt the private Souldiers, and therewithal free licence for Commanders and Gentlemen to recreate themſelves in Amyens; where they were lovingly entertained by the Burgers of the Town, by the Kings expreſs command. The place of enterview of theſe two Kings, is agreed on to be at Picquiny, a Town three miles diſtant from Amyens, ſeated in a bottom, through which the River of Some runneth; over which a ſtrong Bridge was built, and in the midſt thereof a grate made overthwart with Bars, no wider aſunder then a man might well thruſt in his Arm; covered with boards over head, to avoid the rain: four of the Bed-Chamber on both ſides, are appointed to ſearch the rooms, to prevent traps or Inſtruments of treachery: and being by them certified that all was clear, the Kings advance themſelves. King Edward being come in ſight of the place, made a ſtand; being told, that the circumſtance of coming firſt to the place was a matter of great diſparagement in point of State: but the French King more regarding ſubſtance than circumſtance, gave the King of England the advantage to come at his pleaſure, and went firſt to the Bar appointed for Conference, and there did attend King Edward's leiſure. He had in his company John Duke of Bourbon, with his Brother the Cardinal, and eight hundred men at Arms. King Edward had with him his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Chamberlain and Chancellour, and at his back his whole Army in Battel. The Kings lovingly ſalute each other, and compliments of courteſie reciprocally paſs: which finiſhed, they, with their Noblemen there preſent, take all their Oaths upon the Holy Evangeliſts, in all their power, to obſerve the Articles of Accord agreed on. After which, in private, the French King importunes King Edward that the Duke of Britain might be left out of theſe Articles: but after much urging to that purpoſe, King Edward gave this reſolute anſwer, that if King Lewis deſired the friendſhip of England, he ſhould not moleſt the Duke of Britain; for that he was reſolved, at any time to come in perſon to relieve him, if he were diſturbed: King Edward pretended the many kindneſſes he had formerly received of the Duke of Britain; but it was conceived, that the deſire of compaſſing the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke, now in the Duke of Britains Countrey, were the greateſt motives of his ſtanding ſo firmly for him. After more ſerious diſcourſe, King Lewis told King Edward, that he would one day invite him to Paris, there to court his French Ladies, with whom, if he committed any ſin, he merrily told him, that Cardinal Bourbon ſhould be his Confeſſor, who (he might be ſure) would aſſign him an eaſie penance; as one that loved to kiſs fair Ladies himſelf: but when King Edward ſeemed not unwilling to accept his offer, he was then glad to put it off with other diſcourſe: for that (as he told Commines) too many Engliſh Princes had been there before.

The money to be paid to King Edward by the Articles, is accordingly paid; and thereupon the French Hoſtages are delivered, and the Engliſh Army retires to Callice, and from thence is tranſported into England; and then the Engliſh Hoſtages are likewiſe delivered. This Peace was ſaid to be made only by the Holy Ghoſt; becauſe on the day of meeting, a white Dove came and ſate upon the King of England's Tent: though the Dukes of Gloceſter and Burgoigne thought it was made by no good ſpirit.

King Edward being returned into England, had his minde running ſtill upon the danger that might grow from the Earl of Richmond: he therefore diſpatched Doctor Stillington, and two other his Ambaſſadors, to the Duke of Britain, to ſend him over to him, under this ſubtle pretence, that he meant to match him in marriage with the Lady Cicely his younger Daughter; and withal, ſent alſo no ſmall ſtore of Angels to ſpeak for him; which ſo prevailed with the Duke, that he delivered the Earl of Richmond to the Ambaſſadors, who conducted him thence to Saint Malos; where whileſt they ſtayed for a wind, the young Earl by the cunning plotting of Peter Landois, the Dukes Treaſurer, (more out of ſcorn that he was not gratified by the Engliſh Ambaſſador, to the proportion of his place, than for any love to the Earl) eſcapes into the Sanctuary; from whence neither prayers nor promiſes could get him out: Nevertheleſs upon Peter Landois his promiſe he ſhould be ſafely kept there, the Ambaſſadors departed, and returned home, acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Britains courteſie in delivering him, and their own negligence in ſuffering him to eſcape; only making amends with the promiſe of Peter Landois: which might be to King Edward ſome contentment, but was no ſatisfaction.

1475. King Edward ſends to the Duke of Britain to deliver the Earl of Richmond to him.

The Earl is delivered, but makes eſcape; and how.

At Chriſtmas following, being the ſixteenth year of his Reign, he created his eldeſt Son Edward, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, and Earl of Cheſter. His ſecond Son he made Duke of York; giving the Order of Knighthood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He created alſo four and twenty Knights of the Bath, whereof Brian Chief Juſtice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common Pleas were two. 1476. King Edward's Son Edward created Prince of Wales. &c

About this time, there were two examples of ſeverity ſeen; not unworthy the relating, if but only to make us ſee how dangerous a thing it is Ludere cum ſanctis, to ſpeak words that may be taken as reflecting upon the King. The firſt was of one Walter Walker, a wealthy Citizen, dwelling at the Crown in Cheapſide: This man one day when his Childe cried, bid him be quiet, and he would make him Heir of the Crown: which words being ſubject to interpretation, he was called in queſtion about them, arraigned, condemned, and put to death. The other was of Thomas Burdet of Arrow in Warwickſhire Eſquire: It happened that King Edward hunted in his Park, he being from home, and there killed a white Buck, whereof Maſter Burdet made ſpecial account: ſo as coming home, and finding that Buck killed, he wiſhed it horns and all in his belly that had counſelled the King to kill it: and becauſe none counſelled the King to kill it but himſelf, it was thought thoſe words were not ſpoken without a malignant reflecting upon the King: and thereupon Burdet was arraigned and condemned, drawn to Tyburn, and there beheaded: though Markham, then Chief Juſtice, choſe rather to loſe his place, then aſſent to the Judgement. 1477.

Two great examples of ſeverity: one upon Walter Walker.

The other upon Mr. Burdet.

And now began ambition to boil in Richard Duke of Gloceſter; whereof the firſt heat fell upon his Brother the Duke of Clarence, how to rid him out of the way; to which end, he ſeeks to raiſe jealouſies in King Edward's head againſt him, telling him, that ſome of Clarence his followers were Sorcerers and Necromancers, and had given forth ſpeeches, that one whoſe name begun with G. ſhould diſinherit his Children, and get the Crown: and for a colour of this ſuggeſtion, one of the Duke of Clarence his Servants, who came with him out of Ireland from Dublin, where the Duke was born, is in his Maſters abſence, by the procurement underhand of the Duke of Gloceſter, indicted, arraigned, condemned, and executed at Tyburn for a Conjurer, and all within the ſpace of two dayes: and the Duke of Gloceſter, to make ſhew that he had no hand in this fellow's death, ſet on the Duke of Clarence to complain of it to King Edward; and in the mean time findes matter, at leaſt colour of matter to make him be committed to the Tower: And then again to make ſhew he had no hand in his impriſonment, bids him be of good chear, for it ſhould not be long e're he would ſee him releaſed: and he kept his word; for not long after, by his procurement, he was drowned in a But of Malmſey, (and this was his releaſement) and then laid in his bed, to make the people believe that he

he died of diſcontent; whoſe death King Edward, though perhaps conſenting to it, ſo much reſented, that afterwards, when he was ſued to for any mans Pardon, he would ſighing break out into ſuch words: Oh unfortunate Brother! for whoſe life not one man would open his mouth. Being dead, he was buried at Tewkſbury in Glocesterſhire, by the Body of his Dutcheſs, who great with Childe, died of poyſon a little before.

1482. A match treated on between the King of Scots eldeſt Son and a Daughter of King Edward.

It was now the two and twentieth year of King Edward's Reign, when James King of Scotlaud ſent Ambaſſadors to treat of a marriage between his eldeſt Son James Duke of Rothſay, and Cicely King Edward's ſecond Daughter. This overture for a Match, was by the King and his Council readily embraced, and a great part of the Portion was delivered to the Scots with this Proviſo, That if the marriage did not proceed, the Provoſt and Merchants of Edenburgh ſhould be bound to repay it again. But the Scottiſh King, who had other phantaſies in his head, and would take counſel of none but his own will, and diverted alſo perhaps by the King of France; not only dallied the proceeding in the Match, but affronted thoſe of the Nobility that perſwaded him to it; inſomuch that his Brother the Duke of Albany was enforced to abandou the Countrey, and to fly for refuge into England: by whom King Edward being informed of King James his fickle diſpoſition, was ſo much incenſed, that under the conduct of the Duke of Gloceſter, accompanied with the Duke of Albany, he ſent an Army of twenty thouſand againſt Scotland; who in their way took in Berwick, and beſieged the Caſtle; which being reſolutely defended by the Earl Bothwel, the Duke left the Lord Stanley to continue the ſiege, whiles he with the reſt of the Army, marcheth toward Edenburgh; where within the Caſtle of Maydens, King James had immur'd himſelf. But the Nobility of Scotland ſeeing the danger they were in, endeavoured by humble ſubmiſſion to procure a Peace, at leaſt a ceſſation from War; which with much importunity they obtained, upon theſe conditions: That full ſetisfaction ſhould be preſently given, for all damages ſuſtained by the late incurſions: That the Duke of Albany ſhould be fully reſtored to grace and place, with an abolition of all diſcontents between his Brother King James and him: That the Caſtle of Berwick, (which had been now out of the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, one and twenty years) ſhould immediately be ſurrendred into the Ge-Generals hands, aand from thence no reduction of that, or the Town attempted: That all ſuch ſums of money as upon propoſition of the marriage had been delivered, ſhould be repaid. All which, except the firſt Article, were accordingly performed.

But dallied by the King of Scots.

Whereupon K. Edward enters Scotland with an Army.

And brings the Scots to ſubmiſſion.

When this buſineſs with Scotland was indifferently accommodated; King Edward receives intelligence from his Ambaſſadour Leiger in France, that the French King not only denied the payment of the annual Tribute of fifty thouſand Crowns, agreed upon and ſworn to, upon the ratification of the late concluded Peace, but had alſo married the Dauphin of France to the Lady Margaret Daughter of Maximlian, Son of the Emperour; which ſo much incenſed King Edward, that he reſolves to revenge it; and by the advice of his Council, open War was preſently Proclaimed againſt France: But whileſt King Edward is making preparation, and intentive to the buſineſs, he is attached by the hand of death; and upon the ninth of April, in the year 1483. at Weſtminſter ended his mortal life.

Of his Taxations.

IN his ſecond year, he ſent his Privy Seal through England, to move men to give him a certain ſumme of money towards reſiſting the Scots. which was granted and given liberally: In his ſeventh year, in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, were reſumed all manner of gifts, which the King had given from the firſt day he took poſſeſſion of the Realm, to that time. In his eighth year, at a Parliament were granted two fifteens and a Demy. In his thirteenth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein a Subſidy was granted; aad the year following, towards War to be undertaken in France, a new way of raiſing money is deviſed, called a Benevolence, by which great ſummes of money were gotten of the Subject: And it is not unworthy the relating, what an old rich Widow at this time did; whom King Edward, amongſt others, having called before him, merrily asked, what ſhe would willingly give him towards his great charges? By my troth (quoth ſhe) for thy lovely countenance, thou ſhalt have even twenty pounds. The King looking ſcarce for half that ſumme, thanked her, and lovingly kiſt her; which ſo wrought with the old Widow, that ſhe preſently ſwore, he ſhould have twenty pound more; and paid it willingly. Not long before his death he was by ill Counſellors put upon a diſtaſteful courſe for raiſing of money; which was, by fining men for Delinquencies againſt Penal Statutes: by which courſe ſome money was gathered; but before it came to full execution, he dying, that alſo died with him.

IN his fourth year, he newly deviſed the Coin both of Gold and Silver, as at this day it is; the Gold, he named Royals and Nobles, the Silver, Groats, and half Groats: the new Groat weighing ſcantly three pence; and the Noble of ſix ſhillings eight pence, appointed to go for eight ſhillings four pence, In his fifth year it was proclaimed in England, that the Beaks or Pykes of Shoes and Boots ſhould not paſs two Inches, upon pain of curſing by the Clergy, and forfeiting twenty ſhillings to be paid, one Noble to the King, another to the Cordwayners of London, and the third to the Chamber of London: and for other Countreys and Towns the like order was taken. Before this time, and ſince the year 1382. the Pykes of Shoes and Boots were of ſuch length, that they were fain to be tied up to the knees with Chains of Silver, and Gilt, or at leaſt with ſilken laces.

New Coyn ordained.

The length of Beaks and Pykes of Shooes limitted.

Affairs

Affairs of the Church in his time:

The year of Jubile brought from fifty to five and twenty.

IN this Kings time the Jubile, which was before but every fiftieth year, was, by Pope Sixtus the fourth, brought to be every five and twentieth year. Alſo, where before this time, the Scottiſh Biſhops had no Metropolitan, but the Biſhop of York was Metropolitan and Primate of Scotland: Now in this Kings time, Pope Sixtus appointed the Biſhop of Saint Andrews to be Metropolitan of Scotland, who had twelve Biſhops under his obedienc e

THis King laid the foundation of the new Chappel at Windſor, and his Queen Elizabeth founded the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, and endowed it with large Poſſeſſions. About his fifteenth year, Doctor Woodlark Provoſt of Kings Colledge in Cambridge, founded Katherine-hall there. In his ſeventeenth year, the Wall of the City of London, from Cripplegate to Biſhopſgate, was builded at the Charges of the Citizens; alſo Biſhopſgate it ſelf was new built by the Merchants Almans of the Steelyard. Alſo in this year died Sir John Crosby, Knight, late Mayor of London, who gave to the repairing of the Pariſh Church of St. Helens in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, where he was buried, 500. Marks: to the repairing of the Pariſh Church of Henworth in Middleſex, forty pounds: to the repairing of London Wall, an hundred pounds: to the repairing of Rocheſter Bridge, ten pounds: to the Wardens and Commonalty of the Grocers in London, two large Pots of ſilver chaſed half gilt, and other Legacies. About this time alſo, Richard Rawſon, one of the Sheriffs of London, cauſed an houſe to be builded in the Church-yard of St. Mary Hoſpital without Biſhopſgate, where the Mayor and Aldermen uſe to ſit and hear the Sermons in Eaſter Holy-dayes. In his nineteenth year, William Taylor Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements; for which the City is bound to pay for ever, at every fifteen granted to the King, for all ſuch as ſhall dwell in Cordwainer-ſtreet-ward, ſeſſed at twelve pence a piece, or under. And about the ſame time, one Thomas Ilam, Sheriff of London, builded, at his coſts, the great Conduit in Cheap-ſide. In his ſeventeenth year, ſo great a Peſtilence reigned in England, that it ſwept away more people in four months, than the Wars had done in fifteen years paſt. Alſo in his nineteenth year was another Peſtilence; which beginning in the latter end of September, continued till the beginning of Novemb. twelve-months following; in which ſpace of time innumerable people died.

Of his Wife and Iſſue.

KIng Edward had been contracted to Eleanor Daughter to John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, married after to Sir Thomas Butler, Baron of Sudely: but he married Elizabeth the Widow of Sir John Gray, Daughter of Richard Woodvile, by his Wife Jaqueline Dutcheſs of Bedford: She lived his Wife eighteen years and eleven months; by whom he had three Sons and ſeven Daughters. Edward his eldeſt Son, born in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter: Richard his ſecond Son, born at Shrewsbury: George his third Son, born alſo at Shrewsbury, but died a Childe. Elizabeth his eldeſt Daughter promiſed in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France; but married afterward to King Henry the Seventh: Cicely his ſecond Daughter promiſed in marriage to James Duke of Rothſay, Prince of Scotland; but was married afterward to John Viſcount Wells, whom ſhe out-lived, and was again re-married, but by neither Husband had any Iſſue: She lieth buried at Quarena in the Iſle of Wight. Anne his third Daughter was married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marſhal and high Treaſurer of England, by whom ſhe had two Sons, both dying without Iſſue: ſhe lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolk. Bridget his fourth Daughter, born at Eltham in Kent, became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford in Kent, which King Edward had founded, Mary his fifth Daughter was promiſed in marriage to the King of Denmark, but died in the Tower of Greenwich, before it could be ſolemnized: ſhe lieth buried at Windſor. Margaret his ſixth Daughter died an Infant: Katherine his ſeventh Daughter was married to William Courtney Earl of Devonſhire; to whom ſhe bare Lord Henry, who by King Henry the eight was created Marqueſs of Exeter.

This woman was born in London, worſhipfully deſcended, and well married; but when the King had abuſed her, anon her Husband (as he was an honeſt man, and did know his good, not preſuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her up to him altogether.

By theſe he had natural iſſue, Arthur ſurnamed Plantagenet (whoſe mother, as is ſuppoſed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) created Viſcount Liſle, by King Henry the eight, at Bridewel in London: and Elizabeth, who was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight; to whom ſhe bare Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did deſcend.

The late Lord Lumley from whom deſcended.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was (ſaith Comines) the goodlieſt perſonage that ever mine eyes beheld, exceeding tall of ſtature, fair of complexion, and of moſt Princely preſence: and we may truly ſay, he was of full age before he came to one and twenty; for being but eighteen years old when his Father died, he ſued out his Livery preſently: ſo as he began the race of his fortune juſt like Auguſtus Caſar, each of them at the ſame age ſucceeding an Anceſtour after a violent death; and each of them left to ſet on a roof, where but only a foundation was laid before. For his conditions, he was of an erected compoſure both of body and minde, but ſomething ſagging on the fleſhes ſide; and never any man, that did marry for love, did ſo little love marriage; for he took as much pleaſure in other mens Wives as in his own. He was never more confident, then when he was in danger, nor ever more doubtful then when he was ſecure. Of the four Cardinal Vertues, Fortitude and Prudence were in him naturally: Temperance and Juſtice, but to ſerve his turn. He was Politick even to irreligion; for to compaſs his ends he would not ſtick to ſwear what he never meant. Yet he was Religious beyond Policy; for before Battels, he uſed to make his Prayers to God, after Victories to give him Thanks. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious: and could uſe familiarity, and yet retain Majeſty. He was a great Briber; and what he could not get by Force, he would by Rewards; as much as what he could not get by Battery, he would by Mines. He was too credulous of Reports, which made him be in errour, ſometimes to the hurt of himſelf, oftentimes of others. He had made the White Roſe to flouriſh as long as Henry the Fourth made the Red, if he had not made it change colour with too much Blood. He had been fortunate in his Children, if he had not been unfortunate in a Brother; but he was well enough ſerved, that would think a Wolf could ever be a good Shepherd. He had an excellent art in improving his favours; for he could do as much with a ſmall courteſie, as other men with a great benefit: And that which was more, he could make advantage of diſadvantages: for he got the love of the Londoners by owing them money; and the good will of the Citizens by lying with their Wives.

Of his Death and Burial.

WHether it began from his minde, being extreamly troubled with the injurious dealing of the King of France; or from his body by intemperance of diet, to which he was much given: He fell into a Sickneſs (ſome ſay a Catarrhe, ſome a Feaver) but into a Sickneſs whereof he died. In the time of which ſickneſs, and at the very point of death, Sir Thomas Moor makes him to make a ſpeech to his Lords; which I might think to be the ſpeech of a ſick man, if it were not ſo found; and of a weak man, if it were not ſo long: But it ſeems Sir Thomas Moor delivers rather what was fit for him to ſay, than what he ſaid, the Contents being only, to exhort his Lords, whom he knew to be at variance, to be in love and concord amongſt themſelves; for that the welfare of his Children, whom he muſt now leave to their care, could not otherwiſe be preſerved but by their agreement. And having ſpoken to this purpoſe as much as his weakneſs would ſuffer him, he found himſelf ſleepy; and turning on one ſide, he fell into his long ſleep, the ninth of April, in the year 1483. when he had lived one and forty years, reigned two and twenty and one month, and was buried at Windſor, in the new Chappel, whoſe foundation himſelf had laid.

His ſpeech to his Lords at his death.

Of Men of Note in his time:

MEN of valour in his time were many, but himſelf the chiefeſt; the reſt may be obſerved in reading his ſtory. For men of Letters, we may have leave at this time to ſpeak of ſome ſtrangers, having been men of extraordinary fame; as Johannes de Monte Regio, Purbachius and Blanchinus, all great Aſtronomers; Ludovicus Pontanus, Paulus Caſtrenſis, and Anthonius Roſſellanus, all great Lawyers; Serviſanus, Savanarola, and Barzizius, all great Phyſicians; Baſſarion and Cuſanus, both great Cardinals; Argyropole, Philelphus, Datus, Leonardus, Aretinus, and Poggius, all great men in humane Literature. And of our Countreymen, John Harding an Eſquire, born in the North parts, who wrote a Chronicle in Engliſh Verſe; and, among other ſpecial points therein touched, hath gathered all the Submiſſions and Homages made by the Scottiſh Kings, even from the dayes of King Athelſtan: whereby it may evidently appear, how the Scottiſh Kingdom, even in manner, from the firſt eſtabliſhing thereof here in Britain, hath been appertaining unto the Kings of England, and holden of them as their chief and ſuperiour Lords. Julian Bemes, a Gentleman of excellent gifts, who wrote certain Treatiſes of Hawking and Hunting; alſo a Book of the Laws of Arms, and knowledge appertaining to Heraulds. John Forteſcue a Judge, and Chancellour of England, who wrote divers Treatiſes concerning the Law and Politick Government: Rochus, a Charterhouſe Monk, born in London, who wrote divers Epigrams. Walter Hunt, a Carmelite Fryer, who for his excellent learning, was ſent from the whole body of the Realm, to the General Council holden firſt at Ferrara, and after at Florence, by Pope Eugenius the fourth; where he amongſt others diſputed with the Greeks, in defence of the Order and Ceremonies of the Latine Church. William Caxton, who wrote a Chronicle called Fructus Temporum, and an Appendix unto Treviſa, beſides divers other Books and Tranſlations. John Milverton, a Carmelite Fryer of Briſtow, and Provincial of his Order, who, becauſe he defended ſuch of his Order as preached againſt endowments of the Church with Temporal Poſſeſſions, was committed to priſon in the Caſtle of Saint Angelo in Rome, where he continued three years. David Morgan, a Welchman, who wrote of the Antiquities of Wales, and a deſcription of the Countrey. John Tiptoft, a Nobleman born, who wrote divers Treatiſes, but loſt his head in the year 1471. Robert Huggon born in Norfolk, who wrote certain vain Propheſies.

William Caxton who wrote a Chronicle.

Thomas

Scogan at this time lived.

Thomas Littleton, who wrote the Tenures, at this time lived.

Thomas Norton, born in Briſtow, an Alchymiſt. Scogan a learned Gentleman, and a Student for a time in Oxford; who for his pleaſant wit and merry conceits, was called to Court. But moſt worthy of all to be remembred, Thomas Littleton a reverend Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great part of the Law into Method, which lay before confuſedly diſperſed; and his Book called Littleton's Tenures.

The REIGN of KING EDWARD THE FIFTH.

1483. King Edward proclaimed King; but never Crowned.

KIng Edward the fourth being dead, his eldeſt Son Edward, ſcarce yet eleven years old, ſucceeded in the Kingdom, but not in the Crown; for he was proclaimed King, but never Crowned: and indeed it may not ſo properly be called the Reign of Edward the Fifth, as the Tyranny of Richard the Third; for from the time of King Edward's death, though not in name, yet in effect, he not only ruled as King, but raged as a Tyrant. Prince Edward, when his Father died, was at Ludlow in Wales, where he had lived ſome time before, the better by his preſence to keep the Welſh in awe; he had about him of his Mothers Kindred many; but Sir Anthony Woodvile, the Earl Rivers his Uncle, was appointed his chief Counſellor and Director. The Duke of Gloceſter was at this time in the North, but had word preſently ſent him from the Lord Haſtings, Lord Chamberlain, of his Brother King Edward's death; who acquainted him withal, that by his will, he had committed the young King, his Queen, and other Children, to his care and government; and thereupon putting him in minde, how neceſſary it was for him ſpeedily to repair to London: But the Duke of Gloceſter needed no ſpur to ſet him forward, who was already in a full career; for he had long before projected in his minde, how he might come to attain the Crown; and now he thought the way was made him. For as it is ſaid, the very night in which King Edward died, one Miſſelbrook, long e're morning, came in great haſte to the houſe of one Potter dwelling in Redcroſs-ſtreet without Cripple-gate; where he ſhewed unto Potter that King Edward was departed: To whom Potter anſwered, By my troth man, then will my Maſter the Duke of Gloceſter be King: What cauſe he had ſo to think, is hard to ſay; but ſurely it is not likely he ſpake it of nought. And now the young King was coming up to London with a ſtrong guard, partly to make a firſt expreſſion of his greatneſs, and partly to oppoſe any diſorders that might be offered. But the Duke of Gloceſter finding this proceeding like to be a rub in his way, at leaſt, not fit for his deſigns, he preſently falls to undermining; writes moſt loving Letters to the Queen, proteſting all humble and faithful ſervice to the King and her; but withal perſwading her, that this great guard about the King might be preſently diſmiſſed; which did but miniſter matter of ſuſpicion, and would be apt to breed new jealouſies in them who were now throughly reconciled. The Queen of a nature eaſie to be wrought upon, gives credit to his glozing Letters; and thereupon ſends in all haſte to her Son, and to her Brother the Lord Rivers; requiring them by all means, for ſome cauſes to her known, to diſmiſs their Guard, (not mentioning by whoſe advice ſhe writ them; which if ſhe had done, they would never have done it) but now upon her Letters they preſently did, and came forward with only a ſober company. And now is Gloceſter's firſt work done; but he, knowing that the work yet behinde was too great to be done by himſelf alone, gets the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Haſtings, two of the greateſt men of power at that time in the Kingdom, to joyn with him in opinion, that it was not fit the Queens Kindred ſhould be ſo wholly about the King; and others of better blood and deſert, to be eſtranged from him, and therefore by all means fit, to endeavour to remove them: To which the Duke of Buckingham is eaſily wrought, upon a promiſe to have the Earldom of Hartford conferred upon him: and the Lord Haſtings not hardly, upon a hope by this means to cut off many, whom in King Edward's dayes he had juſtly offended. And now another great work was done; it remains in the next place to put it in execution, which was preſently thus effected. The young King had been at Northampton, and from thence was gone to Stony-Stratford, whither the two Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham arrived; but pretending the Town to be too little for the entertainment of their Companies, they went back to Northampton, and alighting at the ſame Inne where the Earl Rivers had taken up his lodging for that night, intending the next morning early to overtake the King. Upon this their accidental meeting, great ſhews of courteſie paſſed between them; and Supper ended, the Dukes pretending wearineſs, retire to their Lodgings, the Earl to his: but the Dukes being entred into their Chambers, enter into conſultation with their private friends, in which they ſpent a great part of the night, and then ſecretly get the Keys of the Inne Gates, ſuffering none to paſs either in or out; whereof the Earl having notice by his Hoſt, though he ſuſpected the worſt, yet ſetting

He perſwades the Queen, that her Son may diſmiſs his guard.

The Duke of Gloceſter hearing of his Brothers death, poſts out of the North to London.

And thereupon ſeizeth upon the Kings Uncle and other friends.

ting a good countenance upon the matter, and truſting to his own innocency, he boldly went to the Duke of Gloceſter's Chamber, where he found the Duke of Buckingham and the reſt cloſely ſet in Council; with whom he expoſtulates the reaſon of this courſe, to impriſon him in his Inne againſt his will: But they inſtead of anſwer, command preſently to lay hands on him, charging him with many crimes, whereof themſelves were only guilty: And then taking order for his ſafe impriſonment, they ſpeedily took Horſe, and came to Stony-Stratford, at ſuch time as the King was taking horſe, whom in all reverent manner they ſaluted: But preſently in the Kings preſence, a quarrel is pickt againſt the Lord Richard Gray, the Kings half Brother: The Duke of Buckingham making relation to the King, that he and the Marqueſs his Brother, with the Earl Rivers the Queens Brother, had endeavoured, and almoſt effected, to draw to themſelves the whole managing the affairs of the Kingdom, and to ſet variance between the Peers of the Realm; and particularly, that the Lord Marqueſs without any Warrant, had taken out of the Tower of London both Treaſure and Armour, to a great quantity: but to what purpoſe though they were ignorant, yet there was juſt cauſe to ſuſpect it was to no good end: And therefore it was thought expedient by the advice of the Nobility, to attach him at Northampton, to have him forth coming to make his anſwer for theſe and many other his over-bold actions: The King unable to ſound the depth of theſe plots, mildly ſaid unto him: What my Brother Marqueſs hath done, I cannot ſay; but for my Uncle and Brother here, I dare anſwer, that they are ignorant of any unlawful practices either againſt me or you. Oh (ſaith the Duke of Buckingham) that hath been their cunning to keep their treachery from your Graces knowledge: And thereupon, inſtantly in the Kings preſence, they arreſted the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, Sir Richard Hall, and brought the King and all his company back to Northampton, putting away all his old Servants, and placing in their rooms creatures of their own, whom they had power to command. At which dealing the young King wept, but it booted nothing; and to colour the matter, the Duke of Gloceſter at Dinner ſent a Diſh from his own Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheer, for all ſhortly ſhould be well: But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Meſſenger to carry it to the Lord Richard, with the ſame meſſage for his comfort, as one to whom ſuch adverſity was ſtrange; but as for himſelf, he had all his dayes been acquainted with it, and therefore could the better bear it. But for all this comfortable courteſie of the Duke of Gloceſter, he ſent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Countrey, into divers places to priſon, and afterward to Pomfret, where in concluſion they were all beheaded.

The Earl Rivers and other Lords beheaded at Pomfret.

And now the Duke of Gloceſter having thus gotten the cuſtody of the King, ſet forwards toward London, giving out by the way, that the Marqueſs and the Queens Kindred had plotted the deſtruction of the King, and of all the ancient Nobility of the Kealm, and to alter the Government of the Common-wealth; and that they were only impriſoned to be brought to their tryal according to Law: And the better to ſettle theſe ſuggeſtions in the apprehenſion of the Vulgar, they brought along with them divers Carts laden with Armour, (of their own providing) with Dry-fats and great Cheſts, wherein they reported to be Treaſure for the payment of Souldiers; with which they ſo poſſeſt the common people, that all was believed for truth which was thus rumored: But the fineſt device of all was, to have five of the Duke of Gloceſter's inſtruments manacled and pinioned like Traytors; and theſe in every place where the King lodged, to be diſperſed and given out to be men of great birth, drawn into this vile plot of Treaſon by the Queens Brother: who muſt ſeem to be penitent for their offence, and to confeſs their own guilt: And this device continued acting till the King came to London, where their Vizards were pulled off, and the diſguiſe was ſoon diſcovered.

The Duke of Gloceſter gives out colours for theſe Lords Impriſonment.

The Queen with her young Son and Daughters takes Sanctuary.

The Queen in the mean time having intelligence of theſe doleful accidents, and fearing there were worſe to follow; with her ſecond Son and five Daughters takes Sanctuary at Weſtminſter; and the young King hearing of theſe things, with tears and ſighs expreſſed his grief: but the Dukes making proteſtation of their fidelity, and care of his ſafety, ſeemed only to marvail why he ſhould be melancholy.

At this time a meſſenger came from the Lord Chamberlain to the Archbiſhop of York, Lord Chancellour of England, to ſignifie to him, that there was no fear of any thing, for that he aſſured him all ſhould be well. Well (quoth the Archbiſhop) be it as well as it will; I aſſure him, it will never be ſo well as we have ſeen it. And thereupon, preſently after the meſſengers departure, he calleth up his Servants (being then in the night) and taking the great Seal with him, came before day to the Queen, whom he found ſitting alone on the Ruſhes, all deſolate and diſmayed, whom he comforted the beſt he could; aſſuring her, that if they Crowned any King but her Son, whom they had with them, he would preſently after Crown his Brother whom ſhe had with her; and therewithal delivering to her the Great Seal, departed: but ſoon after bethinking himſelf better, he thought he had done too raſhly, to deliver the Great Seal to the Queen; and therefore ſent for it again, and had it delivered him: yet ſhortly after, reproved for delivering it by the Council Table, he had it taken from him, which was then delivered to Doctor Ruſſel, Biſhop of Lincoln, the moſt learned man of that time.

The Lord Chancellour delivers the great Seal to the Queen, and after feteheth it from her again.

The Duke of Gloceſter is appointed Protector of the King and King-dom.

And now the Duke of Gloceſter ſo reſpectively carries himſelf towards the King, with ſo much ſhew of care and faithfulneſs, that by a general conſent of the Council, he is appointed and eſtabliſhed Protector of the King and Kingdom; and by this means, he hath the King in his cuſtody: It remains now, how to get his Brother the Duke of York; for without having both, he were as good (as to his purpoſe) have neither: And to effect this, he makes makes the effect to become a cauſe: for whereas by his undue dealings, he had made the King melancholy, he now makes that Melancholy a cauſe to require his Brothers company to make him merry: and therefore wiſhes ſome courſe may be taken, either by perſwaſion or otherwiſe, to procure the Queen to ſend the Duke of York to keep his Brother the King company.

The Archbiſhop of York is ſent to perſwade the Queen to ſend her young Son to keep his Brother company.

Here the Archbiſhop of York, the Lord Cardinal, the man thought moſt fit to be ſent in this employment, riſeth up and ſaith, he would do his beſt endeavour to perſwade her; but if he could not, he then thought it was not to be attempted againſt her will, for that it would turn to the high diſpleaſure of God, if the priviledge of that holy place ſhould now be broken, which had ſo many years inviolably been kept, which both Kings and Popes ſo good, had granted, ſo many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more than five hundred years ago, by Saint Peter in his own perſon, accompanied with great numbers of Angels by night, ſo ſpecially hallowed and dedicated to God; and for proof whereof, there is yet in the Abby, St. Peters Cope to ſhew; that from that time hitherward, there never was ſo undevout a King, that durſt violate that ſacred place, nor ſo holy a Biſhop that durſt preſume to conſecrate it: and therefore (ſaith he) God forbid, that any man, for any earthly thing, ſhould enterpriſe to break the immunity and liberty of that ſacred Sanctuary: and I truſt with Gods Grace, we ſhall not need it, at leaſt my endeavours ſhall not be wanting; if the Mothers dread and womaniſh fear be not the let. Womaniſh fear, nay womaniſh frowardneſs, (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it upon my Soul, ſhe well knoweth there is no need of any fear, either for her Son, or for her ſelf: and proſecuting his diſcourſe, declareth at large, that as there was no juſt cauſe for the Queen to keep her Son, ſo there was great cauſe for them to require him; and that for breach of Sanctuary in this caſe there could be none; for that he had often heard of Sanctuary men, but never heard of Sanctuary Children. And to this purpoſe having ſpoken much, it was well aſſented to by the Lords that were preſent, and with this Inſtruction is the Archbiſhop (upon whom the Queen ſpecially relyed) ſent unto her; who after humble ſalutations, acquaints her with his Meſſage, earneſtly perſwading her not to oppoſe the Lord Protectors requeſt, and giving her many reaſons, firſt that ſhe ought not, and then that ſhe could not keep him in Sanctuary. She anſwered all his reaſons, though with great mildneſs, yet with great earneſtneſs; ſo as the Archbiſhop finding little hope to prevail with her by perſwaſion, turns the tenor of his ſpeech another way; telling her plainly, that if ſhe did not conſent to ſend her Son, he doubted ſome ſharper courſe would ſpeedily be taken. This warning ſank ſo deep into the Queens minde, that after a little pauſing, taking her Son by the hand, ſhe ſaid, My Lord Archbiſhop, here he is, for my own part I will never deliver him; but if you will needs have him, take him, and at your hands I will require him: and therewith weeping bitterly, Dear Childe (ſaith ſhe) let me kiſs thee, before we part. God knows whether ever we ſhall meet again: and ſo the Childe weeping as faſt as ſhe, went along with the Archbiſhop to the Star-Chamber, where the Lord Protector and other Lords had ſtayed all the while looking for his coming back: and as ſoon as he was entred the Room, the Protector ſpying the Child, riſeth up and embraceth him, ſaying, Dear Nephew, now welcome with all my heart, next to my Sovereign Lord your Brother, nothing gives me ſo much contentment as your preſence: and we may believe him, he ſpake as he thought; for now he had the prey which he ſo much deſired. A few dayes after, pretending to have them lodged in a place of more ſecurity, until the diſtempers of the Common-wealth might better be quieted; he cauſed them in great pomp and ſtate, to be conveyed through London to the Tower, there at pleaſure to remain, till the time of Coronation; whereof there was great ſhew of preparation made.

The Duke of Buckingham vilifies the priviledge of Sanctuary.

The Archbiſhops reaſons prevail with the Queen to deliver her Son, but with great heavineſs.

The Protectors ſhew of kindeneſs to the young Prince.

The two Princes are with great ſhew of honour conveyed to the Tower.

But now the great work is to be done, the Princes are to be made away; and how to have it done, Hoc opus, hic labor eſt: there muſt be potent Inſtruments, and none ſo potent as the Duke of Buckingham; and he, by a match to be concluded betwixt their Children, and an equal partition of the Treaſure of the Realm betwixt them two; not only is drawn to condeſcend, but is moſt forward to contrive and plot ſtratagems to effect it. The firſt rub in the way was the Lord Haſtings; who being found ſo firm to his old Maſter King Edward's Sons, that nothing could remove him, it was fit to remove him out of the way; which was done in this manner: All the Lords of the Privy Council, in the Protectors name, are convoked to the Tower; where fitting preparations for the Coronation of the young King, are propoſed, until the Protector came in; who taking his Chair, very affably ſaluted them, merrily jeſting with ſome, and more then ordinarily pleaſant with them all: when after a little talk, he ſaid to the Biſhop of Ely; My Lord, I hear you have very good Strawberries at your Garden in Holborn; I pray let us have a meſs of them: Moſt gladly (ſaid the Biſhop) and preſently ſent for ſome: And then the Protector riſing up, prayed the Lords to ſpare his abſence a little; and ſo departed. Within the ſpace of an hour he returned; but ſo changed in countenance, and with ſuch inward perturbations, which with ſighings and other paſſionate geſtures he expreſſed ſo, that it made them all to marvail. After long ſilence (the better to prepare them to the more attention) he confuſedly interrogates, What they deſerved that nefariouſly had practiſed his deſtruction? This unexpected interrogation ſtruck ſuch amazement amongſt the Lords, that they all ſate gazing on one another, and were as it were, ſtricken dumb: At length the Lord Haſtings, by Buckingham's inſtigation, as one preſuming of his intimacy with the Protector, boldly anſwered, that they deſerved the puniſhment of Traytors; which all the reſt by their ſilence approved: Whereat the Protector riſeth up, and with a ſtern look upon the Lord Haſtings, replyed: Why it is the old Sorcereſs my Brothers

The Lord Haſtings firm to the Princes, and therefore is firſt made away, and in what manner.

thers Widow, and her partner that common Strumpet Jane Shore, that have by incantation conſpired to bereave me of my life: and though by Gods Grace I have eſcaped the end of their malice, yet ſee the miſchief they have done me; for behold (and then he bared his left arm to the elbow, and ſhewed it) how they have cauſed this dear limb of mine to wither, and grow uſeleſs; and ſo ſhould all my body have been ſerved, if they might have had their will a little longer. Thoſe to whom the Queens Religious courſes were not unknown, and who knew his withered arm to have been ſuch from his birth, ſate gazing one upon another, not knowing what to think or ſay; until the Lord Haſtings, thinking thereby to leave all blame upon the Queen, and excuſe his Paramour Miſtriſs Shore, (whom ever ſince the death of King Edward he had entertained for his bed-fellow, and had but that morning parted from her) with a ſober look ſubmiſſively ſaid, If the Queen have conſpired—which word was no ſooner out of the Lord Haſtings mouth, then the Protector clapping his hand upon the board, and frowningly looking upon him, ſaid: Telleſt thou me of If and And? I tell thee, They, and none but they have done it; and thou thy ſelf art partaker of the villany. Who I, my Lord, quoth he? Yea thou Traytor, quoth the Protector; and therewith, upon a Watch-word given, thoſe prepared before for that purpoſe, in the outer Chamber, cried, Treaſon, Treaſon! when preſently a great number of men in arms came ruſhing in, as it were to guard the Protector; one of which with a Pollax ſtrook a main blow at the Lord Stanley, and wounded him on the head, and had ſlain him outright, if he had not avoided the ſtroke by ſlipping backward, and falling down to the ground. Forthwith the Protector arreſted the Lord Haſtings of High Treaſon, and wiſhed him to make haſte to be confeſſed; for he ſwore by St. Paul (his uſual Oath) that he would not touch bread nor drink till his head were off. It booted not to ask, why; for he knew the Protectors actions were not to be examined. So he was led forth unto the Green (before the Chappel) within the Tower, where his head was laid down upon a long log of Timber, and there ſtrucken off. His body afterward with his head were interred at Windſor, beſides the body of King Edward. In this mans death we may ſee how inevitable the blows of Deſtiny are: for the very night before his death, the Lord Stanley ſent a ſecret meſſenger to him at midnight, in all haſte to acquaint him with a Dream he had; in which he thought that a Boar with his tuſks ſo goared them both by the heads, that the blood ran about their ſhoulders: and foraſmuch as the Protector gave the Boar for his Cogniſance, this Dream made ſo fearful an impreſſion in his heart, that he was throughly reſolved to ſtay no longer; and had made his Horſe ready, requiring the Lord Haſtings to go with him, and that preſently, to be out of danger, before it ſhould be day. But the Lord Haſtings anſwered the Meſſenger: Good Lord! leaneth your Maſter ſo much to ſuch trifles, to put ſuch faith in Dreams, which either his own fear fantaſieth, or elſe do riſe in the nights reſt, by reaſon of the dayes thoughts? Go back therefore to thy Maſter, and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and have no fear; for I aſſure him, I am as ſure of the man he wotteth of, as of my own hand. The man he meant, was one Catesby well learned in the Laws of the Land; who by his favour was grown into good authority in Leiceſterſhire, where the Lord Haſtings Eſtate lay. Of this man he made himſelf ſo ſure, that he thought nothing could be plotted againſt him, which he would not preſently reveal unto him. But this man deceived him, and was grown ſo inward with the Protector, that being ſet by the Protector to draw him to be a party in his deſigns, and finding he could not do it, was himſelf the firſt mover to rid him out of the way. Another warning the Lord Haſtings had; the ſame morning in which he was beheaded, his Horſe twice or thrice ſtumbled with him, almoſt to falling: which though it often happen to ſuch to whom no miſchance is toward, yet hath it of old been obſerved as a token foregoing ſome great misfortune. Alſo at the Tower-Wharf, near to the place where his head ſoon after was ſtrucken of, he met with one Haſtings a Purſuivant of his own name; to whom he ſaid, Ah Haſtings, doeſt thou remember I met thee here once with a heavy heart? Yea my Lord, ſaith he, I remember it well; and God be thanked that time is paſt. In faith man, ſaid the Lord Haſtings, I never ſtood in ſo great dread of life, as I did when thou and I met here: and loe, how the world is changed! Now ſtand my Enemies in the danger, as thou mayeſt hap to hear hereafter: (for the Enemies he meant, were the Lord Rivers, and others of the Queens Kindred, who that very day were beheaded at Pomfret) and I never ſo merry, nor in ſo good ſurety as now I am. That we may know, there is not a greater Omen or ſign of ill fortune, then to preſume of good. And indeed, ſuch is the uncertainty of our eſtate in this life, that we ſeldom know when we are in a tempeſt at Sea, nor when we are in a Calm on ſhore; thinking our ſelves oftentimes moſt ſafe, when we are moſt in danger; and oftentimes to be in danger, when we are moſt ſafe: He only is in the true Haven that can ſay, as Chriſt teacheth us, Thy Will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven.

The Lord Haſtings is beheaded.

His neglect of Preſages and Warnings.

But this Lord being thus put to death, the Lord Protector, to colour the matter, immediately after dinner, in all haſte, ſent for many ſubſtantial Citizens; at whoſe coming, himſelf with the Duke of Buckingham ſtood harneſſed in old ruſty Brigandines, to make a ſhew they were forced by the ſudden danger to take ſuch as they could firſt come by: and withal, a Herauld of Arms is ſent with a Proclamation in the Kings name, ſignifying that the Lord Haſtings with ſome others had conſpired the ſame day to have ſlain the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, as they ſate in Council; and after to have taken upon them to rule the King and Kingdom at their own pleaſures. Now was this Proclamation made within two hours after the Lord Haſtings was beheaded; and was ſo curiouſly indicted, and ſo fair written in Parchment, and withal ſo long, that every Childe might perceive it was prepared before; which made made one that was Schoolmaſter of Pauls ſtanding by when the Proclamation was read, to ſay, Here is a gay goodly caſt; foul caſt away for haſte: To whom a Merchant anſwered, It was written by Propheſie. And now by and by as it were in revenge of her offence, the Protector ſent the Sheriffs of London into the houſe of Shore's Wife, and ſpoiled her of all her Goods, above the value of three thouſand Marks; and then conveying her through London to the Tower, there left her priſoner; where he laid to her charge, that ſhe went about to bewitch him, and was of counſel with the Lord Haſtings to deſtroy him. In concluſion ſhe was laid into Ludgate, and by the Biſhop of London put to open Penance for Incontinency; going before the Croſs in Proceſſion upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand: in which, although ſhe were out of all array, ſave her Kirtle only; yet went ſhe ſo fair and lovely, and withal ſo womanly and demurely, that many who hated her courſe of life, yet pitied her courſe uſage, and were not a littlc grieved to ſee her miſery. And indeed, this may be ſaid in her behalf, that being in extraordinary favour with King Edward, yet ſhe never uſed it to the hurt of any, but to the relief of many: and was ever a Mediator, an Oppreſſor never.

Shore's Wife how puniſhed.

Now it was ſo contrived by the Protector, that the very day in which the Lord Haſtings was beheaded at London, and about the very ſame hour, there were beheaded at Pomfret, the Lord Rivers, and the other Lords and Knights that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony-Stratford; which was done in the preſence, and by the Order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whoſe ſervice the Protector ſpecially uſed in that buſineſs; who bringing them to the Scaffold, and not ſuffering them to declare their innonency, leſt their words might have inclined men to hate the Protector, cauſed them haſtily without Judgement or Order of Proceſs to be beheaded.

When theſe were thus rid out of the way, then thought the Protector, that now was the time to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of the Crown: but all the ſtudy was, by what means this matter being ſo hainous in it ſelf, might be broken to the people, in ſuch wiſe as that it might be well taken: for which purpoſe, it was thought fit to call to this Counſel Edmund Shaw Knight, the then Mayor of London; who upon promiſe of advancement, ſhould frame the peoples inclination to it. And becauſe ſpiritual men are beſt hearkened to, for matters of Conſcience, ſome of them were uſed alſo; amongſt whom, choice was made of John Shaw Clerk, Brother to the Mayor; Fryer Penker, Provincial of the Order of the Auguſtine Fryers: both great Preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. Theſe two were appointed to preach, the one at Pauls Croſs, the other at the Spittle, in praiſe of the Protector: Penker in his Sermon ſo loſt his voice, that he was fain to leave off and come down in the midſt: Shaw by his Sermon loſt his reputation, and ſoon after his life, for he never after durſt come abroad, for very ſhame of the world.

Shaw Mayor of London is made an inſtrument for bringing the Duke of Glocester to the Crown.

But now was all the labour and ſtudy, to finde out ſome convenient pretext, for which the people ſhould be content to have the Prince depoſed, and the Protector be received for King; to which purpoſe many things were deviſed; the chief was to alledge Baſtardy either in King Edward himſelf, or in his Children, or in both. To lay Baſtardy to King Edward, ſounded openly to the reproach of the Protector's own Mother, who was Mother to them both; he would therefore that point ſhould more favourably be handled: but the other point concerning the Baſtardy of his Children, he would have enforced to the uttermoſt: The ground whereof was, that King Edward had been formerly contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, by whom he had a Childe; though the ſaid Lady, having been examined about it, confeſſed plainly, they were never aſſured. Yet upon this pretext, Doctor Shaw taking for his Text, Baſtard Plants ſhall take no deep root; in his Sermon declared, that King Edward was never lawfully married to the Queen, but was before God, Husband to the Lady Elizaleth Lucie, and ſo his Children Baſtards, And beſides that, neither King Edward himſelf, nor the Duke of Clarence were reckoned very ſure for the Children of the noble Duke Richard, as thoſe that by their favours more reſembled other known men; but the Lord Protector (ſaith he) is the Fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his viſage, the plain expreſs likeneſs of that noble Duke. Now, it was before deviſed, that juſt at the ſpeaking of theſe words, the Protector ſhould have come, to the end that theſe words meeting with his preſence, might be taken among the hearers, as though the Holy Ghoſt had put them in the Preachers mouth, and ſo ſhould move the people even then to cry King Richard, King Richard! that it might be after ſaid, he was ſpecially choſen by God, and in a manner by Miracle: But this device failed; for whether by toe Protectors ſlackneſs in coming, or the Doctors haſte in preaching, he had paſſed thoſe words, and was gone clean to another matter before the Protector came; ſo as afterward ſeeing him come, he was fain to leave the matter he had in hand, and out of all order and frame begin to repeat thoſe words again: This is the very noble Prince, the Fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his viſage, the plain expreſs likeneſs of that noble Duke. While theſe words were in ſpeaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, paſſed through the people into the place where the Doctors ſit; and there ſate to hear the Sermon: But the people were ſo far from crying King Richard, that they cried ſhame on the Preacher, for abuſing his ſacred Function with ſo ſhameful a Sermon.

Cauſes deviſed to make the two Princes illegitimate.

The Tueſday following this Sermon, the Duke of Buckingham with divers Lords and Knights came to the Guildhal in London; and there before the Mayor and whole aſſembly of Citizens, made a very ſolemn and long Oration, wherein he recited many grievances of the late King Edward's Government; his many unneceſſary Taxations and unjuſt ſeverities; thereby to bring his Children into hatred: and then remembred them of the late Sermon made at Paul's Croſs, by a learned Doctor; who clearly clearly ſhewed the Baſtardy of King Edward's Children; and that Richard Duke of Gloceſter was the only rightful and indubitate Heir to the Crown of England: which the Lords of the Kingdom having taken into their conſideration, had thereupon agreed to accept him for their King; and now himſelf was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their conſents. Which oration ended, all men ſtood wondering at the motion, but no man offered to ſpeak a word. At which the Duke marvelling, as ſuppoſing the Mayor had prepared them before; he asked the Mayor privately, what this ſilence meant? who anſwered, that perhaps they had not heard or underſtood what it was he ſaid. Whereupon the Duke with a more audible voice repeated the ſame matter again, in a more earneſt and plain expreſſion; yet neither did that move them to ſhew any inclination to the motion. Then the Duke whiſpering with the Mayor, it was thought that the Citizens being uſed to have ſuch motions made them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him; and thereupon the Recorder is commanded to move them in it: but the Recorder (called Fitzwilliams) being an honeſt man, and newly come to his place; repeated only as near as he could the words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; ſo as neither did this move the people to break their ſilence. At laſt the Duke ſeeing their reſolved ſullenneſs, told them plainly, that all the Nobility and Commons of the Realm were agreed to chooſe the Protector for their King, as the true and undoubted Heir; ſo as he needed not to have moved them to it, but only for the great reſpect they all bear to this honourable City; and therefore required them plainly to ſpeak their mindes, whether they would joyn with them in this choice or no. At this, certain ſervants of the Dukes, and other of their procuring, ſtanding at the lower end of the Hall, caſt up their Caps, and cried aloud, King Richard, King Richard; whereat, though the whole multitude of Citizens marvelled what they meant; yet the Duke taking advantage of it, as of an unanimous conſent: A goodly cry (ſaith he;) and thanked them all for their univerſal approbation; promiſing he would acquaint the Protector with the great love they ſhewed toward him: and then requiring the Mayor and chief Citizens to meet him the next morning at Baynards Caſtle, where the Protector then lay, there to joyn with him in petitioning the Protector to accept of this their freely profered ſubjection; he took his leave and ſo departed.

The Duke of Buckingham and the Mayor of London make ſuit unto the Protector to take the Crown upon him.

The next morning according to appointment, they all meet at Baynards Caſtle; where the Duke of Buckingham ſends up word to the Lord Protector, that himſelf with the Lord Mayor and his Brethren, were come to preſent a ſupplication to him, concerning a buſineſs of great importance: But the Protector (though preacquainted with all paſſages, yet) made it ſtrange what their ſupplication ſhould be; and anſwered, that though he ſuſpected nothing which the Duke of Buckingham preſented to him, yet he deſired at leaſt ſome ſlight intimation to what it might tend. To this it was anſwered, that the buſineſs they came about was to be made known to himſelf in perſon; and therefore humbly beſought him of admiſſion in his preſence. Upon this, as if not yet well aſſured of their meaning towards him; he appears unto them in an upper Gallery, making ſemblance as though he would prevent all danger, by ſtanding ſomething aloof and in his Fort: To whom the Duke of Buckingham, in behalf of the Mayor and Nobility there preſent, in moſt reſpective and reverent manner makes requeſt, that his Grace would pardon what he ſhould deliver to him: and much circumſtance he uſed, before he would diſcover their cauſe of coming: but though long firſt, yet at laſt he told it: That in reſpect of the urgent neceſſities of the Common-wealth, they all humbly intreated him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom, as in his own right, to whom they all rendred their Allegiance. At which words, the Protector ſtarting back, as if he had heard ſomething moſt unpleaſing to him, paſſionately anſwered: I little thought, good Couſin, that you of all men would have moved me to a matter which of all things in the world I moſt decline: Far be it from me to accept of that, which without apparent wrong to my dear deceaſed Brothers ſweet Children, and my own upright Conſcience, I cannot well approve of. And then being about to proceed in his premeditated diſſimulation; the Duke in a ſeeming abrupt paſſion, kneeling upon his knee, ſaid: Your Grace was pleaſed to give me free liberty to deliver unto you in the name of this worthy aſſembly the tender of their dutiful Obedience to you: but I muſt further add, that it is unanimouſly reſolved on, that your late Brother King Edward's Children, as being generally known to be Illegitimate, ſhall never be admitted to the Crown of England; and therefore if your Grace ſhall neither regard your ſelf nor us ſo much, as to accept it, we are directly determined to confer it upon ſome other of the Houſe of Lancaſter, that will be more ſenſible of his own and our good. Theſe words wrought ſo powerfully upon the Protector's paſſions, that with ſome change of countenance, and not without ſeeming reluctation, he ſaid: Since I perceive the whole Realm is ſo reſolved, by no means to admit my dear Nephews, being but Children, to reign over you; and ſeeing the Right of ſucceſſion belongs juſtly to me, as the indubitate Heir of Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, my illuſtrious Father: We are contented to condeſcend to your importunities, and to accept of the Royal Government of the Kingdom, and will, to the uttermoſt of my power, endeavour to procure and maintain the welfare thereof. And having ſo ſaid, he came down from his Gallery, and very formally ſaluted them all: which ſo pleaſed the giddy multitude, that preſently they fell to acclamations, Long live King Richard our dread Sovereign Lord! and then every man departed.

The Protector ſtarted at their motion.

But yet accepts it.

The REIGN of KING RICHARD THE THIRD.

1483. IT was now the eighteenth day of June, in the year 1483. when Richard Duke of Gloceſter took upon him the Crown: ſo as the imaginary Reign of Edward the fifth continued but juſt ten weeks. The next day, King Richard with a great train went to Weſtminſter Hall, and placed himſelf in the Court of the Kings Bench, ſaying, he would take the Crown upon him in that place where the King himſelf ſitteth and miniſtreth the Law; becauſe he conſidered that it is the chiefeſt duty of a King to adminiſter the Laws: And here to get the love of the people by a feigned clemency, he ſent for one Fogge out of Sanctuary, who for fear of his diſpleaſure was fled thither; and there in the ſight of all the people, cauſed him to kiſs his hand.

King Richard marries the relict of Prince Edward, Son to Henry the ſixth.

After his return home, he took to Wife the Lady Anne, youngeſt Daughter of the great Warwick, and the relict of Prince Edward, Son of Henry the ſixth, though ſhe could not be ignorant, that he had been the Author both of her Husbands and Fathers death. But womens affections are Eccentrick to common apprehenſion; whereof the two Poles are Paſſion and Inconſtancy.

Againſt his Coronation he had ſent for five thouſand men out of the North; and theſe being come under the leading of Robin Riddeſdale, upon the fourth of July; together with his new Bride, he went from Baynards Caſtle to the Tower by water, where he created Edward his Son a childe of ten years old, Prince of Wales; John Lord Howard Duke of Norfolk, his Son Sir Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey; William Lord Berckley Earl of Nottingham; Francis Lord Lovel Viſcount Lovel and his Chamberlain, and the Lord Stanley (who had been committed priſoner to the Tower, in regard his Son the Lord Strange was reported to have levied Forces in Lancaſhire) not only that day was releaſed out of Priſon, but was made Lord Steward of his Houſhold. The Archbiſhop of York was likewiſe then delivered; but Morton Biſhop of Ely (as one that could not be drawn to the diſinheriting of King Edward's Children) was committed to the Duke of Buckingham, who ſent him to his Caſtle of Brecknock in Wales, there to be in cuſtody. The ſame night were made ſeventeen Knights of the Bath, Edmund the Duke of Suffolk's Son, George Gray the Earl of Kents Son, William the Lord Zouches Son, Henry Aburgaveny, Chriſtopher Willoughby, Henry Babington, Thomas Arundel, Thomas Boleign, Gervis Clifton, William Say, Edmund Bedingfield, William Enderby, Thomas Lewknor, Thomas of Urmond, John Brown, and William Berckley. The next day, being the fifth of July, the King rode through the City of London to Weſtminſter, being accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk, Buckingham, and Suffolk; the Earls of Northumberland, Arundel, Kent, Surrey, Wiltſhire, Huntington, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincoln; the Viſcounts Liſle, and Lovel, the Lords Stanley, Audley, Dacres, Ferrers of Chartley, Powis, Scroop of Upſale, Scroop of Bolton, Gray of Codnor, Gray of Wilton, Sturton, Colham, Morley, Burgaveny, Zouch, Ferrers of Croby, Wells, Lumley, Matrevers, Herbert and Beckham, and fourſcore Knights. On the morrow, being the ſixth of July, the King, with Queen Anne his Wife, came down out of the White Hall, into the great Hall at Weſtminſter, and went directly to the Kings Bench; and from thence, going upon Ray-cloth, bare-footed, went to St. Edward's Shrine, all his Nobility going with him, every Lord in his degree. The Biſhop of Rocheſter bore the Croſs before the Cardinal: Then followed the Earl of Huntington, bearing a pair of gilt Spurs, ſignifying Knighthood: Then followed the Earl of Bedford, bearing St. Edward's Staff for a Relick: After him came the Earl of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointleſs Sword in his hand, ſignifying Mercy: The Lord Stanley bare the Mace of Conſtableſhip: The Earl of Kent bare the ſecond Sword, on the right hand of the King, naked, with a point; which ſignified Juſtice to the Temporality: The Lord Lovel bore the third Sword on the Kings left hand, with a point, which ſignified Juſtice to the Clergy: The Duke of Suffolk followed with the Scepter in his hand, which ſignified Peace: The Earl of Lincoln bore the Ball and Croſs, which ſignified Monarchy: The Earl of Surrey bore the fourth Sword before the King, in a rich Scabbard; which is called the Sword of Eſtate: Then went three together; in the midſt went Garter King of Arms, in his rich Coat; and on his right hand went the Mayor of London, bearing a Mace; and on his left hand went the Gentleman-Uſher of the Privy Chamber: Then followed the Duke of Norfolk, bearing the Kings Crown between his hands: Then followed King Richard chard in his Robes of Purple Velvet, and over his head a Canopy, borne by four Barons of the Cinque-ports; and on each ſide of the King went a Biſhop; on one ſide the Biſhop of Bath; on the other of Durham: Then followed the Duke of Buckingham, bearing the Kings train, with a white Staff in his hand, ſignifying the Office of High Steward of England. Then followed the Queens Train; before whom was born the Scepter, the Ivory Rod, with the Dove, (ſignifying Innocency) and the Crown: her ſelf apparelled in Robes like the Kings, under a rich Canopy, at every Corner thereof a Bell of Gold, On her head ſhe wore a Circlet, ſet full of precious Stones, the Gounteſs of Richmond bearing her train; the Dutcheſſes of Norfolk and Suffolk in their Coronets, attending, with twenty Ladies of Eſtate moſt richly attired. In this order they paſſed the Palace into the Abbey: and going up to the High Altar, there ſhifted their Robes; and having other Robes open in divers places from the middle upward, were both of them Anointed and Crowned: and then after the Sacrament received, (having the Hoſt divided betwixt them) they both offered to St. Edward's Shrine, where the King left St. Edward's Crown, wherewith he had been Crowned, and put on his own: and this done, in the ſame order and ſtate as they came, they returned to Weſtminſter Hall, and there held a moſt Princely Feaſt: at the ſecond courſe whereof, there came into the Hall Sir Robert Dymock the Kings Champion, making Proclamation, that whoſoever would ſay that King Richard was not lawful King of England, he was there ready to prove it againſt him; and thereupon threw down his Gantlet; and then all the Hall cried, King Richard, King Richard. And thus with ſome other Ceremonies the Coronation ended; and the King and Queen returned to their lodgings.

King Richard ſends to make amity with the King of France, but he rejects it.

Preſently after this, King Richard ſent a Solemn Ambaſſage to Lewis King of France, to conclude a League and Amity with him: but the French King ſo abhorred him and his cruelty, that he would not ſo much as ſee, or hear his Ambaſſadors; but ſent them away with ſhame, in diſgrace of their Maſter.

At this time, with his Queen, he made a Progreſs to Gloceſter, under colour to viſit the place of his old Honour; but indeed to be out of the way, having a ſpecial villany to be acted: for though he had ſatisfied his Ambition, by depriving his dear Nephews of their livelihoods; yet it ſatisfied not his fear, if he deprived them not alſo of their lives. For effecting whereof, his old Friend the Duke of Buckingham was no fit inſtrument; it muſt be one of a baſer Metal: and to finde out ſuch a one, he needed not go far; for upon inquiry, he was told of two that lay in the next Chamber to him; Sir Thomas and Sir James Tyrrel, two Brothers like Jacob and Eſau, not more near in blood then different in conditions; of equal goodlineſs of perſonage both, but not of equal goodneſs of minde; Sir Thomas a man of an honeſt and ſober diſpoſition; but Sir James of a turbulent ſpirit, and one who gaping after preferment, would not ſtick to make a fortune out of any Villany. Being told of this man as he was ſitting at the Cloſe-ſtool, he preſently roſe and went to him: where being met, the match is ſoon made up between them; for he found Sir James more ready to undertake the work, than he was himſelf to ſet him about it. It only remained to procure him free paſſage to the place where the work was to be done: for King Richard had formerly ſent a truſty Privado of his named John Green, to Sir Robert Brackenbury then Lieutenant of the Tower, thinking that he, having been raiſed by him, would not have refuſed to do the deed himſelf: but when he heard how averſe he was from it, Good Lord (ſaith he) whom may a man truſt? Once he ſaw plainly, that whileſt he was Lieutenant, there was no poſſibility to effect it. To remove therefore this rub, he ſends his Letters Mandatory to Brackenbury, to deliver preſently the Keyes of the Tower to Sir James Tyrrel, who being now Lieutenant for the time, and having the two innocent Princes under his cuſtody, gets two other, as very Villains as himſelf; the one Miles Forreſt, the other James Dighton, his Horſe-keeper, a big ſturdy Knave: and theſe he makes his under-agents; who coming into the Childrens Chamber in the night, (for they were ſuffered to have none about them, but one Black Will, or William Slaughter, a bloody Raſcal) they ſuddenly lapped them up in their cloaths, and keeping down by force the Feather-Bed and Pillows hard under their mouths, ſo ſtifled them, that their breath failing they gave up their innocent ſouls to God: whom when the Murtherers perceived, firſt by their ſtrugling with the pains of death, and then by their long lying ſtill, to be throughly dead; they laid their bodies out upon the bed, and then fetched Sir James to ſee them; who preſently cauſed their bodeis to be buried under the ſtairs, under a heap of ſtones: from whence they were afterward removed to a place of Chriſtian Burial, by a Prieſt of Sir Robert Brackenburies; who dying within a few dayes after, and none knowing the place but himſelf, was cauſe that it hath not been known to this day; and gave occaſion afterward to the Impoſture of Perkin Warbeck in King Henry the Sevenths Reign. Some report that King Richard cauſed their bodies to be taken up, and cloſed them in lead, and then to be put in a Coffin full of holes, hooked at the ends with iron, and ſo caſt into a place called the Black Deeps, at the Thames mouth; to be ſure they ſhould never riſe up, nor be ſeen again. And now ſee the Divine Revenge upon the Actors of this execrable murther: Miles Forreſt, at St. Martins le Grand, piece-meal rotted away: Dighton lived at Callice a long time after; but deteſted of all men, died in great miſery: Sir James Tyrrel was beheaded afterward on the Tower hill for Treaſon: and King Richard himſelf, after this abominable fact done, never had a quiet minde, troubled with fearful Dreams; and would ſometimes in the night ſtart out of his bed, and run about the Chamber in great fright, as if all the Furies of Hell were hanging about him: that it was verified in him, Ultrix Tiſiphone vocat agmina ſæva ſororum.

King Richard ſets Sir James Tyrrel to murther the two Princes.

The Princes are murthered.

But where buried not known.

The Murtherers miſerable ends.

Confederacies in evil are ſeldom long-lived,

King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham fall at variance.

and commonly end in a reciprocal deſtruction: and ſo was it now with King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham; They had confederated together to the deſtruction of many; and now their confederacy diſſolves in both their ruines: but what the cauſe was of their diſſolving, is not ſo certain: whether it were that the Duke thought not himſelf ſo well rewarded, as his great ſervices had deſerved; or whether it were, that King Richard thought not himſelf abſolute King, as long as the Duke, by whoſe means he came to be King, was in ſuch a height of greatneſs; or whether it were (as was rather thought) that the Duke being a man ambitious, and of an aſpiring ſpirit; though he had himſelf been the means to bring King Richard to the Crown; yet when the Crown was put upon his head, ſo envied at it, that he turned his head another way, as not enduring the ſight; and for the ſame cauſe, was willing not to have been preſent at the Coronation, pretending ſickneſs in excuſe of his abſence: but that King Richard ſent him a ſharp meſſage, requiring him to come, or he would fetch him: wherenpon the Duke went, but with ſo ill a minde, that he bore it in minde ever after. Whatſoever it was, certain it is, that preſently after the Coronation, there grew great jealouſies between them, and the Duke retired himſelf to his Caſtle at Brecknock, where he had the Biſhop of Ely in cuſtody. And here we may obſerve the unſearchable depth of the Divine Providence; the bottom whereof, the ſoundeſt judgement of man can never ſound, as working effects by contrary cauſes: for where King Richard had committed the Biſhop to the Duke, as to one that would have a moſt watchful eye over him; this which the King did for the Biſhops greater puniſhment, proved a means afterward of the Biſhops greater advancement, and a means at the preſent of King Richard's ruine: for the Duke being retired home, and having his head ſo full of thoughts, that of neceſſity it required vent; for his own recreation, would ſometimes fall in talk with the Biſhop; with whoſe diſcourſe (as he was a man of great wit and ſolid judgemrnt) the Duke was ſo taken, that he grew to delight in nothing more than to be conferring with him. One time it happened that the Duke had opened his minde ſomething freely to him; and the Biſhop following him in his own way, and cunningly working upon that humour of the Duke, which he found moſt working in the Duke; which he perceived to grow out of envy to King Richard, he ſaid to this purpoſe: My Lord, you know I followed firſt the part of King Henry the Sixth, and if I could have had my wiſh, his Son ſhould have had the Crown, and not King Edward: But after that God had ordained King Edward to Reign, I was never ſo mad, that I would with a dead man ſtrive againſt the quick. And ſo was I to King Edward alſo a faithful Chaplain, and glad would have been that his Childe had ſucceeded him: Howbeit, if the ſecret Judgement of God have otherwiſe provided, I purpoſe not to labour to ſet up that which God pulleth down. And as for the Lord Protector, and now King;——and even there he left: ſaying, he had already medled too much with the world; and would from that day meddle with his Books and his Beads, and no further. Then longed the Duke exceedingly to hear what he would have ſaid; becauſe he ended with the King, and there ſuddenly ſtopped; and thereupon intreated him to be bold to ſay whatſoeyer he thought; whereof he faithfully promiſed there ſhould never come hurt, and peradventure more good than he would think; and withal, that himſelf intended to uſe his ſecret counſel; which (he ſaid) was the only cauſe for the which he had procured of the King to have him in his cuſtody. The Biſhop humbly thanked him, and ſaid, In good faith my Lord, I love not to talk much of Princes, as a thing not all out of peril, though the word be without fault; for ſo much as it ſhall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaſeth the Prince to conſtrue it. And ever I think on Æſop's Tale, that when the Lion had proclaimed on pain of death, that no horned Beaſt ſhould abide in a certain Wood; one that had in his forehead a bunch of fleſh, fled away a great pace: the Fox that ſaw him run ſo faſt, asked him whither he made all that haſte? who anſwered, In faith I neither wot nor reck, ſo I were once hence, becauſe of the Proclamation made of horned Beaſts: Why fool (quoth the Fox) thou mayeſt abide well enough, the Lion meant it not by thee, for it is no horn that is in thy head: No marry (quoth he) that wot I well enough; but what if he call it a horn, where am I then? The Duke laughed at the Tale, and ſaid: My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boar ſhall pick any matter at any thing here ſpoken; for it ſhall never come near their ear. Then ſaid the Biſhop, In good faith Sir, if it did, the thing I was about to ſay, taken as well as afore God I meant it, could deſerve but thanks; and yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turn me to little good, and you to leſs. Then longed the Duke much more; to hear what it was: whereupon the Biſhop ſaid, My Lord, as for the late Protector, ſith he is now King in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title: but for the weal of the Realm, I could wiſh he had in him thoſe excellent vertues which God hath planted in the perſon of your Grace; and there left again. The Duke ſomewhat marveling at this ſudden pauſe, ſaid, My Lord, I cannot but note your ſudden ſtopping in your ſpeech, ſo as your words come not to any direct ſentence, whereby I may have knowledge, either what your inward intent is now toward the King, or what your affection is toward me: I therefore intreat you to uſe no more ſuch obſcurity but plainly to diſcloſe your minde unto me, who upon mine honour will be as ſecret in the caſe, as the deaf and dumb perſon is to the ſinger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Biſhop then upon confidence of the Dukes promiſe, ſaid, My Lord, I plainly perceive, the Kingdom being in the caſe as it is, under ſuch a King as now we have, muſt needs decay and be brought to confuſion; but one hope I have, that when I conſider and daily behold your noble Perſonage, your Juſtice, your ardent Love towards your Countrey, and in like manner the great love of your Countrey towards you; I muſt

The Duke of Buckingham plots with Morton Biſhop of Ely, to put down King Richard, and to bring in the Earl of Richmond.

muſt needs think this Realm fortunate, that hath ſuch a Prince in ſtore, meet and apt to be a Governour; in whoſe perſon conſiſteth the very undoubted Image of true honour. And then taxing the preſent King with many cruelties and oppreſſions, he concluded, ſaying, And now my Lord, if either you love God, your Lineage, or your native Countrey, you muſt your ſelf take upon you the Crown and Imperial Diadem of this Realm; but if your ſelf will refuſe to take it upon you, I then adjure you, by the faith you own to God, and by the love you bear to your native Countrey, to deviſe ſome way how the Realm may by your Princely Policy be reduced to ſome convenient regiment, under ſome good Governour by you to be appointed: And if you could deviſe to ſet up again the Lineage of Lancaſter, or advance the eldeſt Daughter of King Edward to ſome puiſſant Prince: not only the new Crowned King ſhould little enjoy the glory of his Dignity, but all Ciuil War ſhould ceaſe, and Peace and Profit ſhould again flouriſh. When the Biſhop had ended his ſaying, the Duke ſighed, and ſpake not of a good while; which ſore abaſhed the Biſhop, and made him change colour; which the Duke perceiving, he ſaid, Be not afraid my Lord, all promiſes ſhall be kept; ſo for that time they parted. The next day the Duke ſent for the Biſhop, and having rehearſed unto him the communication had between them the day before, he went on and ſaid. My Lord of Ely, ſince I perceive your true heart and ſincere affection toward me, I will now diſcover unto you all that hath paſſed my own imaginations. After I had found the diſſimulation and falſeneſs of King Richard, and ſpecially after I was informed of the murther of the two young Princes, to which (God be my judge) I never condeſcended; I ſo much abhorred the ſight, and much more the company of him, that I could no longer abide in his Court; but feigning a cauſe to depart, I took my leave of him, (he thinking nothing leſs, than that I was diſpleaſed) and ſo returned to Brecknock to you; but in that returning, whether it were by inſpiration, or elſe through ſome melancholick diſpoſition, I had divers imaginations how to deprive this unnatural and bloody Butcher of his Royal Seat and Dignity. Firſt, I fantaſied, that if I liſt to take upon me the Crown, now was the time, when this Tyrant was abhorred and deteſted of all men; and knowing not of any that could pretend Title before me: In this imagination I reſted two dayes at Tewkſbury; in my journey from thence, I muſed and thought, that it was not beſt nor convenient to take upon me as a Conquerour, for then I was ſure that all men, and ſpecially the Nobility would oppoſe me; but at laſt there ſprung up a branch in my head, which I ſurely thought would have brought forth fair flowers, but they turned indeed to dry weeds: for I ſuddenly remembred that the Lord Edmund Duke of Somerſet, my Grandfather was with King Henry the Sixth, in two or three degrees of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter: ſo that I thought certainly, my Mother being eldeſt Daughter to Duke Edmund, that I was next Heir to King Henry the ſixth, of the Houſe of Lancaſter: This Title pleaſed well ſuch as I made of my Council, and much more it elevated my ambitious intent; but while I was in a maze, whether I were beſt ſuddenly to ſet this Title open amongſt the Common people, or elſe keep it ſecret a while, ſee what chanced: As I rode between Worceſter and Bridgenorth I met with the Lady Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, now Wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the Daughter and ſole Heir to John Duke of Somerſet, my Grandfathers elder Brother (which was as clean out of my minde, as if I had never ſeen her) ſo that ſhe and her Son the Earl of Richmond have both of them Titles before mine; and then I clearly ſaw how I was deceived: whereupon I determined, utterly to relinquiſh all ſuch fantaſtical imaginations concerning the obteining the Crown my ſelf; and found there could be no better way to ſettle it in a true eſtabliſhment, than that the Earl of Richmond, very Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter, ſhould take to Wife the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to King Edward, the very Heir of the Houſe of York; ſo that the two Roſes may be united in one: and now (ſaith the Duke) I have told you my very minde. When the Duke had ſaid this, the Biſhop was not a little glad, for this was the mark he had himſelf aimed at: and thereupon, after ſome complements of extolling his device, he ſaid: Since by your Graces incomparable wiſdom, this noble conjunction is now moved; it is in the next place neceſſary to conſider, what friends we ſhall firſt make privy of this intention. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with the Counteſs of Richmond the Earls Mother; who knoweth where he is, either in Captivity, or at large in Britain. And thus was the foundation laid of a League, by theſe two great men; by which the death of the two young Princes was fully revenged: and it was not talkt of only, but preſently put in execution; for now is Reynold Bray employed by the Biſhop, to his Miſtriſs the Dutcheſs of Richmond; Doctor Lewis the Dutcheſſes Phyſician was employed by her to the Queen Elizabeth; Hugh Conway and Thomas Rame were employed to the Earl of Richmond to acquaint them, but in moſt ſecret manner, with the intended plot, and to procure their promiſes to the propounded marriage; which was no hard matter to make them all willing to their own wiſhes. This done, Inſtruments are employed to draw in parties to the confederacy; Bray by his credit drew in Sir Giles Dawbeny, Sir John Cheyney, Richard Guildford, Thomas Rame, and others; Urſwick likewiſe drew in Hugh Conway, Thomas Colepepper, Thomas Roper, with ſome others: Doctor Lewis drew in Edward Courtney and his Brother Peter Biſhop of Exeter. It is memorable that Thomas Conway being ſent moſt part by Sea, and Thomas Rame moſt part by Land; yet came to the Earl of Richmond in Britain, within the ſpace of little more than an hour; upon whoſe information of the plot, the Earl acquaints the Duke of Britain with it, who, though by Hutton King Richard's Ambaſſadour, he had by many great offers been ſolicited to detain him in priſon; yet he both readily promiſed, and really performed both his advice and and aid to the Earls proceedings. In this mean time Biſhop Morton, not without asking the Dukes leave, though without obtaining it, ſecretly in diſguiſe, gets him into his Iſle of Ely; and there having done the Earl good Offices by procuring of friends, he thence paſſeth into Britain to him; from whence returned no more, till afterward the Earl being King, ſent for him home, and made him Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Biſhop Morton in diſguiſe paſſeth over into Britain to the Earl of Richmond.

But though all theſe things were carried cloſely, and Oath taken by all for ſecrecy, yet came it to King Richard's knowledge: who notwithſtanding diſſembling it, ſends for the Duke of Buckingham to come unto him; and he, putting off his coming with pretended excuſes, is at laſt peremptorily ſent for to come upon his Allegiance: when he returned this reſolute anſwer: that he owed no Allegiance to ſuch a perjur'd inhumane Butcher of his own Fleſh and Blood: and ſo from that time preparation for Arms is made on both ſides. The Duke had gotten a good power of Welſhmen, and the Marqueſs of Dorſet having gotten out of Sanctuary, was labouring in Yorkſhire to raiſe Forces; the like did the two Courtneys in Devonſhire and Cornwal, and Guilford and Rame in Kent. King Richard ſetting forward with his Forces, the Duke of Buckingham doth the like, intending at Gloceſter to have paſſed the Severn, and ſo to have joyned with the two Courtneys; but ſuch abundance of rain at that time fell, that the Severn was broken out, and impoſſible to be paſſed over; which the Welſhmen ſeeing, and taking it for an ill ſign, they ſecretly ſlipt away: ſo as the Duke left well-near alone, without either Page, or ſo much as a Foot-man, repaired to the houſe of one Humfrey Banniſter near to Shrewsbury; who having been raiſed by him, and his Father before him; he thought himſelf ſafe under his roof: But Banniſter upon Proclamation made by King Richard, that whoſoever could apprehend the Duke, ſhould have a thouſand pound for his labour; like an ungrateful and perfidious wretch, diſcovered him to John Mitton, High Sheriff of Shropſhire, who took him in a pilled black Cloak, as he was walking in an Orchard behinde the houſe; and carried him to Shrewſbury, where King Richard then lay; and there without Arraignment or Legal proceeding, he was in the Market-place beheaded. Whether Banniſter received the Proclaimed reward from the hand of the King, is uncertain; but certain it is, that he received the reward of a Villain from the hand of Divine Juſtice, for himſelf was afterward hanged for man-ſlaughter, his eldeſt Daughter was deflowred by one of his Carters, or as ſome ſay, ſtrucken with a foul Leproſie; his eldeſt Son in a deſperate Lunacy murthered himſelf, and was found to have done ſo, by the Coroners Inqueſt; and his younger Son in a ſmall puddle was ſtrangled and drowned.

The Duke of Buckingham ſent for by King Richard, refuſeth to come.

The Duke of Buckingham betakes himſelf to the houſe of one Humfrey Banniſter his own Servant, who betrayes him.

And is beheaded.

The Judgement of God upon Banniſter.

Upon this diſaſter of the Duke of Buckingham, his complices ſhifted for themſelves; ſome taking Sanctuary, ſome keeping themſelves in unknown places, but many conveyed themſelves into Britain to the Earl of Richmond; of whom the Marqueſs Dorſet, John Lord Wells, the Biſhop of Exeter and his Brother Sir John Bourchier, Sir Edward Woodvile Brother to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeny, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir John Cheyney, and his two Brethren, Sir William Brackley, Sir William Brandon, and his Brother Thomas, Sir Richard Edgecome, Hollowel and Poynings Captains, were the chief. Whileſt theſe things are in doing, King Richard receives intelligence from Hutton his Ambaſſador lieger in Britain, that the Duke not only refuſeth to reſtrain the Earl of Richmond, but intendeth alſo to give him aſſiſtance: whereupon the King took preſent order for preparing his Navy to ſtop the Earls landing in any Port of England. He apprehended alſo in divers parts of the Realm, certain Gentlemen of the Earl of Richmonds confederation; but coming himſelf to the City of Exeter, and to the Caſtle there, and underſtanding that it was called Rugemont, he ſuddenly fell into a dump, and as one aſtonied, ſaid; Well, I ſee my dayes be not long: He ſpake this of a Prophecy told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he ſhould not live long after: which fell out to be true, not in reſpect of this Caſtle, but in reſpect of Henry Earl of Richmond.

Upon the twelfth day of October, in the year 1484. the Earl of Richmond with forty Ships, and five thouſand waged Britains took to Sea; but that evening by tempeſt of weather, his whole Fleet was diſperſed; ſo as only the Ship wherein the Earl himſelf was, with one little Bark, was driven upon the Coaſt of Cornwall; where diſcovering upon the ſhore great ſtore of armed Souldiers to reſiſt his landing, he hoiſed Sail, and returning toward France, arrived in Normandy; from whence ſending Meſſengers to Charles the Eighth King of France, he was by him not only kindely invited to come to his Court, but was aided alſo with good ſummes of money to bear his charges. After this, the Earl returning into Britain, received there the news of the Duke of Buckingham's death, and the diſperſing of the Confederates Forces; with which, though he was at firſt much troubled, yet was he as much comforted afterward, when he ſaw the Marqueſs Dorſet, and thoſe other Lords and Captains come unto him: ſoon after whoſe coming, upon Chriſtmas day before the High Altar in the great Church of Rheims, the Earl of Richmond gave Oath, to marry the Lady Elizabeth, as ſoon as he ſhould be quietly ſettled in the Government of England: and thereupon all the Lords and Knights there preſent did him homage; and in the ſame place each to other Religiouſly vowed, taking the Sacrament upon it, never to ceaſe proſecuting War againſt King Richard, till either his Depoſition or Deſtruction.

He takes Oath to marry the Lady Elizabeth King Edward's eldeſt Daughter.

King Richard being informed of theſe things, makes diligent enquiry after all ſuch as might be ſuſpected to be favourers of Richmond's aſſociation; of whom Sir George Brown, and Sir Roger Clifford, with four other Gentlemen are apprehended and executed at London: Sir Thomas Sentleger, who married Anne the Duke of Exeter's Widow, this Kings own Siſter, and Thomas Rame Eſquire were executed at Exeter. Thomas

Thomas Marqueſs Dorſet, and all ſuch as were with the Earl of Richmond, were at a Parliament then holden attainted of Treaſon, and all their Goods and Lands ſeiſed on to the Kings uſe: Beſides theſe, a poor Gentleman called Collingborn, for making a ſmall rhyme of three of his wicked Counſellors; the Lord Lovel, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby: which rhyme was thus framed: The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel the Dog, rule all England under a Hog: was put to death, and his body divided into four quarters.

At this time a Truce is concluded betwixt England and Scotland, for three years; and for ſettling a firmer amity between the two Kingdoms, a marriage is treated of between the Duke of Rothſay, eldeſt Son to the King of Scots, and the Lady Anne de la Pool, Daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne Siſter to King Richard: which Siſter he ſo much favoured, that after the death of his own Son, who died ſome time before, he cauſed John Earl of Lincoln, her Son and his Nephew, to be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown of England.

King Richard ſeeks by great gifts to have the Earl of Richmond delivered to him.

And now King Richard, to take away the root of his fear, once again ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Britain, with order (beſides the great gifts they carried with them) to make offer, that King Richard ſhould yearly pay and anſwer the Duke of all the Revenues and Profits of all Lands and Poſſeſſions, as well belonging to the Earl of Richmond, as of any other Nobleman or Gentleman that were in his company; if he after that time would keep them in continual priſon, and reſtrain them from liberty. But the Duke of Britain being at that time fallen into ſuch infirmity, that the Ambaſſadors could have no audience; they addreſſed themſelves to Peter Landois the Dukes chief Treaſurer: and he taken with this golden hook, faithfully promiſed to ſatisfie their Requeſt; and had done ſo indeed, but that Biſhop Morton ſojourning then in Flanders, having by his friends intelligence of his purpoſe, preſently informed the Earl thereof. The Earl was then at Vannes, who upon the Biſhops information, taking with him only five Servants, as though he went but to viſit ſome friend; when he was five miles forward on his way, ſuddenly turned into a Wood adjoyning; and there changing Apparel with one of his Servants followed after as their attendant, and never reſted, till by wayes unknown he came to his company abiding at Angiers: yet was not his departure ſo ſecret nor ſo ſudden, but that Peter Landois had notice of it; who ſending Poſts after him, was ſo neer overtaking him, that he was ſcarce entred one hour into France, when the Poſts arrived at the Confines, and then durſt go no further. In the mean time Sir Edward Woodvile and Captain Poynings, who with their Companies were left behinde in Vannes, had been in danger of Peter Landois his malice; but that the Duke being informed by the Chancellour of their caſe, not only protected them, but furniſhed them with all neceſſaries for their journey to the Earl: and was ſo incenſed againſt Landois for this action of his, that for this and ſome other over-bold preſumptions he was afterward hanged.

Which plot the Earl eſcapes by Morton's information; and in what manner.

Peter Landois hanged.

The Earl having paſſed this danger in Britain, and being arrived in France, addreſſeth himſelf to the French King, imploring his aid; and hath it promiſed and performed: and in this time John Vere Earl of Oxford, who had long time been kept priſoner in the Caſtle of Hammes, ſo far prevailed with James Blunt Captain of the Fortreſs, and Sir John Forteſcue, Porter of the Town of Callice; that not only they ſuffered him to be at liberty, but accompanied him alſo to the Earl of Richmond, to whom Captain Blunt gave aſſurance that the Fortreſs remained wholly at his Devotion. At this time alſo there reſorted to the Earl, divers young Gentlemen that were Students in the Univerſity of Paris, proferring him their ſervice; amongſt whom was Richard Fox, at that time famous for his learning; with whom afterward the Earl adviſed in all his affairs, made him one of his moſt Privy Council, and at laſt Biſhop of Wincheſter.

Richard Fox made firſt known to the Earl of Richmond.

But now King Richard having been diſappointed of his deſign in Britain, hath another way in his head to diſappoint the Earl of Richmond of his Marriage with the Daughter of Queen Elizabeth: and to this end, he ſent to the Queen, (being ſtill in Sanctuary) divers meſſengers, who ſhould firſt excuſe and purge him of all things formerly attempted and done againſt her; and then ſhould largely promiſe promotions innumerable, not only to her ſelf, but alſo to her Son Lord Thomas Marqueſs Dorſet: by Force of which promiſes the meſſengers ſo prevailed with her, that not only ſhe began to relent, but at laſt was content to ſubmit her ſelf wholly to the Kings pleaſure. And thereupon putting in oblivion the murther of her innocent Children, the butchering of her own Brother and Son, the infamy of her Royal Husband, the aſperſion of Adultery caſt upon her ſelf, the imputation of Baſtardy laid to her Daughters, forgetting alſo her Oath made to the Earl of Richmond's Mother: ſeduced by flattering words, ſhe firſt delivered into King Richard's hands her five Daughters, and after ſent Letters to the Marqueſs her Son, being then at Paris with the Earl of Richmond; willing him by any means to leave the Earl, and with all ſpeed to repair into England; where for him were provided great Honours and Promotions: Aſſuring him further, that all offences on both parts were forgotten and forgiven; and both he and ſhe incorporated in the Kings Favour. If we wonder at this credulity in the Queen, we may conceive ſhe was moved with the two great motives of Fear and Hope; ſhe feared (no doubt) that if ſhe denied the Kings requeſt, he would preſently take ſome ſharp courſe both againſt her and her Daughters; and ſhe hoped that if ſhe yielded to his requeſt, he would undoubtedly perform his promiſe, ſeeing it was as eaſie for him to keep it as to break it.

King Richard ſeeks to marry the Lady Elizabeth King Edward's Daughter.

1485.

But now King Richard's purpoſe being to marry one of his Brother King Edward's Daughters; there was one impediment which directly hindred it, that he had a Wife living, and how to be rid of her, that he might not bring new aſperſions upon himſelf, he could not well tell: yet this he reſolved, that be rid of her her he would by ſome way or other: but before he would uſe extremity, he would firſt try milder wayes; and firſt he abſtained both from her bed and company, and complained to divers of her barrenneſs; which coming to her ear, he hoped might cauſe her to dye with grief: And when this device failed, he then cauſed a rumour to be ſpread among the people, that ſhe was ſuddenly dead; hoping the very conceit thereof would kill her: When this device alſo failed, (for the Queen hearing of it, and miſtruſtring the worſt, with a moſt ſorrowful countenance came unto him, demanding what ſhe had done, that he ſhould judge her worthy to dye? who anſwered with fair words, bidding her be of good chear, for (to his knowledge ſhe ſhould have no other cauſe) he then made ſure work; for within few dayes after, whether by poyſon, or by what other means, it is not certainly known, ſhe departed this life; and with all ſolemnity, not without ſome formal tears of King Richard, was interred in St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter.

King Richard rids himſelf of his preſent Wife, and by what devices.

He makes love to the Lady Elizabeth.

King Richard now by his Wives death, having made himſelf way to marry another; uſeth all the alluring means he can deviſe, to win the love of the Lady Elizabeth his Neece; but meaning at laſt to purchaſe his deſire by Rape, if he could not otherwiſe; and had perhaps done it, but that the ſtorms threatned from beyond the Seas, growing every day more ſtrong than other, forced him to prorogue the execution of his deſires, and look to the prevention of his preſent danger. The Lord Stanley is commanded preſently to levy Forces for the Kings aid, as he will juſtifie his integrity to him; but yet is not permitted to go down into the Countrey, until he had left George Lord Strange his eldeſt Son, as a pledge of his Loyalty behinde him. And now King Richard being informed (though the information was craftily ſuborned by his Enemies) that the Earl of Richmond was out of hope of any great aſſiſtance from France, diſchargeth the Ships which he had appointed to guard the Seas, and likewiſe all the Souldiers; only order is given for diligent watching of the Beacons.

At this time, one Morgan Kidwelly, a Student at the Inns of Court, with great hazard of his life, paſſed over to the Earl; informing him, that King Richard by all means laboured to match himſelf with the Lady Elizabeth; which ſo wrought with the Earl, that he ſaw there was no lingering: and the more, being by him further informed, that Rice ap Thomas and John Savage, two powerful men in their Countreys, were ready with great Forces to aſſiſt him: Whereupon, not having above two thouſand Mercenaries, and but indifferent Shipping to convey him over, about the middle of Auguſt he put to Sea, and by the advice of the ſaid Kidwelly, ſteered his courſe for Wales, and on the ſeventeenth day after his departure from Harflew, arrived at Milford Haven; and there landing his Forces without trouble or impeachment, from thence marched peaceably to Hereford, where by the Inhabitants he was joyfully received. Here he receiveth news by Captain Arnold Butler, that the Earl of Pembroke with all his retinue was upon the way to joyn with him; alſo thither came to him Richard Griffith, and John Morgan, with a band of brave Welſhmen; and the ſame day Sir Gilbert Talbot with all the Earl of Shrewsbury's Tenants, (being about two thouſand well appointed men) came unto him: with theſe he marched toward Shrewsbury, at which time word is brought him, that Sir Robert Herbert and Rice ap Thomas, were ready with a great power to ſtop his paſſage, which ſomewhat troubled him, that his friends ſo ſuddenly ſhould revolt: but it was but a trick of Rice ap Thomas to make his bargain the ſurer: for ſoon after, Rice ap Thomas meets him, and offers him his ſervice, ſo as the Earl will pledge his faith to perform his promiſe formerly made; which was, that having once obtained the Crown, he would make Rice ſole Governour of Wales: which was now aſſented to, and afterward performed. At this time the Lord Stanley with five thouſand men had taken up his lodging at the Town of Leiceſter; but hearing of the Earls march that way, he left Leiceſter and went to Adderton, not daring to ſhew himſelf openly for the Earl, for fear the King ſhould put his Son the Lord Strange to death, whom he had left an Hoſtage with him.

Which makes him haſten his coming over

To whom many Lords and others come.

All this time King Richard lay at Nottingham, and was as it were fatally taken with a ſpirit of ſecurity, hearing that the Earl had but ſmall aſſiſtance either from France or in England; and therefore ſlighting him as little able to do any greater matter: but when he heard that part of his own Forces was revolted to him, then he began to look about him, and ſends preſent direction to the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with Sir Thomas Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, with all ſpeed to bring their Forces to him at Lutterworth; from whence upon their arrival, hearing that the Earl was encamped at Lichfield, he marcheth thitherward: At which time, Sir Walter Hungerford and ſome others, withdrew themſelves from King Richard's part; and Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Stanford, and Sir Simon Digby, with their ſeveral Forces, joyned with the Earl.

Near to Boſworth their Armies meet: and how King Richard's Army was marſhalled.

King Richard took the advantage of a large Plain near Boſworth, adjoyning to a hill called Anne Beame; where he encamped: And obſerving by his Adverſaries manner of approach, that they meant to give him Battel, he the next morning put his Forces in order: The Vaunt-guard was led by the Duke of Norfolk, which conſiſted of one thouſand two hundred Bowmen, flanked with two hundred Cuyraſſiers, under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey: The Battel King Richard led himſelf, which conſiſted of a thouſand Bill-men, empaled with two thouſand Pikes: The Rereward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, conſiſting of two thouſand mingled Weapons, with two wings of Horſemen, containing fifteen hundren, all of them caſt into ſquare maniples; expecting the Lord Stanley's coming with two thouſand, moſt of them Horſemen: But the Lord Stanley carried himſelf ſo warily, that he might neither give cauſe of ſuſpicion to the King, nor yet cauſe of diſadvantage to the Earl: that when early in the morning the Earl ſent unto him, deſiring his his preſent repair; he anſwered, that he muſt look for no aid from him, till the Battels ſhould be joyned; and therefore adviſed him, with all poſſible ſpeed to give the onſet. This anſwer ſomewhat ſtaggered the Earl, becauſe his number did but little exceed one half of the Kings: Yet to make the beſt ſhew he could, by the advice of his Council of War, he made his Vaward open and thin; of which John Earl of Oxford had the leading: The Earl himſelf led the Battel, Sir Gilbert Talbot commanding the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left: whoſe Souldiers being all alike clad in white Coats and Hoods of Frize, by the reflexion of the Sun upon them, made them appear in the view of their Enemies, double the number. The Rereward was governed by the Earl of Pembroke, which conſiſted moſt of Horſe, and ſome Pikes and black Bills. King Richard, to to incourage his Souldiers, made a ſolemn ſpeech unto them: But alas! what hope could he have to put them in heart, whoſe hearts he had loſt? or to raiſe alacrity in others, who had none in himſelf? For now the remembrance of his fore-paſſed villanies, and ſpecially a fearful Dream he had the night before, (wherein it ſeemed to him, he ſaw divers Images like Devils, which pulled and haled him, not ſuffering him to take any reſt or quiet) ſo damped his ſpirits, that although he ſet a good face upon the matter, yet he could not chooſe but have a preſaging fear, that the date of his dayes was not far from expiring. The Earl of Richmond on the other ſide, having a clear conſcience in himſelf, and ſpeaking to men that followed him for love, had the eaſier means to give them encouragement: which he did with ſo chearful a countenance, as though alalready he had gotten the Victory, After their military exhortations ended, King Richard commanded to give the onſet. Between both Armies there was a great Marſh; which the Earl left on his right hand, that it might be a defence for his Souldiers on that ſide; and beſides, by ſo doing he had the Sun at his back, and in the faces of his Enemy. When King Richard ſaw that the Earls company was paſſed this Marſh, he commanded with all ſpeed to ſet upon them. Then were the Arrows let fly on both ſides, and thoſe ſpent, they came to hand-ſtrokes; at which encounter comes in the Lord Stanley, and joyns with the Earl. The Earl of Oxford in the mean time, fearing leſt his company ſhould be compaſſed in with the multitude of his Enemies, gave charge in every rank, that no man ſhould go above ten foot from the Standard: whereupon they knit themſelves together, and ceaſed a while from fighting: which the Enemy ſeeing, and miſtruſting ſome fraud, they alſo pauſed and left ſtriking. But then the Earl of Oxford, having brought all his Band together, ſet on the Enemy afreſh; which the Enemy perceiving, they placed their men ſlender and thin before, but thick and broad behinde; and reſolutely again began the fight. While theſe two Van-guards were thus contending, King Richard was informed that the Earl of Richmond with a ſmall number was not far off: whereupon he preſently makes towards him; and being of an invincible courage, whereof he was now to give the laſt proof, he made ſo furious an aſſault, that firſt with his own hands he ſlew Sir William Brandon, who bore the Earls Standard; next he unhorſt and overthrew Sir John Cheyney, a ſtrong and ſtout man at Arms; and then aſſaulted the Earl of Richmond himſelf, who (though no man would have thought it, yet) for all the Kings fury held him off at his Launces point, till Sir William Stanley came in with three thouſand freſh men: and then oppreſt with multitude, King Richard is there ſlain. It is ſaid that when the Battel was at the point to be loſt, a ſwift Horſe was brought unto him; with which he might have ſaved himſelf by flight, but out of his undaunted courage he refuſed it, ſaying, He would that day make an end of all Battels, or elſe loſe his life. In this Battel Henry Earl of Northumberland, who led King Richard's Rereward, never ſtrook ſtroke; as likewiſe many other, who followed King Richard more for fear than love: and ſo King Richard, who had deceived many in his time, was at this time deceived by many: which was not unforeſeen by ſome, who cauſed a Rhyme to be ſet upon the Duke of Norfolk's Gate the night before the Battel, which was this:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dicken thy Maſter is bought and ſold:

King Richard encounters the Earl of Richmond hand to hand.

Yet notwithſtanding this warning, the noble Duke continued firm to King Richard; and more conſidering what he was towards him, than what towards others, followed him at the laſt, and in his quarrel loſt his life. This John Howard was the Son of Sir Robert Howard Knight, and Margaret eldeſt Daughter of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, in whoſe right he was created Duke of Norfolk by King Richard the Third, in the year 1483. having been made a Baron before by King Edward the Fourth. The whole number ſlain in this Battel on King Richard's part was not above a thouſand perſons; whereof of the Nobility, beſides the Duke of Norfolk, only Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby, one of the chief Counſellours of King Richard, with divers others, was two dayes after beheaded at Leiceſter. Amongſt thoſe that ran away, were Francis Viſcount Lovel, Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his Brother, who took Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Gloceſter. Of Captives and Priſoners there were great number. Henry Earl of Northumberland, who though on King Richard's ſide, intermeddled not in the Battel, was incontinently taken into favour, and made of the Council: But Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, though he ſubmitted himſelf, yet, as having been ſpecially familiar with King Richard, was committed to the Tower; where he remained a long time: but at laſt was delivered and highly promoted. On the Earl of Richmond's part were ſlain ſcarce a hundred perſons; (ſome ſay but ten) of whom the principal was Sir William Brandon, the Earls Standard-bearer. This Battel was fought at Rodmor, near Boſworth in Leiceſterſhire, the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the year 1485. having continued little above two hours. Preſently after the Battel, the Earl Knighted in the field, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Poynts, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir John Turbervile, Sir Hugh Perſhal, Sir R. Edgecomb, Sir John Pykenil, and Sir Edmund Carew: and then kneeling down, he rendred to Almighty God his hearty Thanks for the Victory he had obtained; and commanded all the hurt and maimed perſons to be cured: whereat the people rejoycing, clapped their hands and cried, King Henry, King Henry: which good will and gladneſs of the people when the Lord Stanley ſaw, he took the Crown of King Richard, which was found amongſt the ſpoils in the field, and ſet it on the Earls head, as though he had been elected King by the voice of the people. It may not be forgotten, that when King Richard was come to Boſworth, he ſent to the Lord Stanley to come preſently to his preſence: which if he refuſed to do, he ſwore by Chriſts Paſſion, that he would ſtrike off his Sons head before he dined: whereto the Lord Stanley anſwered, That if he did ſo, he had more Sons alive, and he might do his pleaſure; but to come to him, he was not then determined. Which anſwer when King Richard heard, he commanded the Lord Strange immediately to be beheaded; but being at the very time when both Armies were in ſight of each other; his Lords perſwaded him, it was now time to fight, and not to put to execution; and ſo the Lord Strange eſcaped.

The Lord Stanley takes the Crown from King Richard's head, and puts it on the Earl of Richmond.

Of his Taxations.

WE muſt not look for Taxations in kinde in this Kings Reign; for he drew from his Subjects not money ſo much as blood; and the money he drew was moſt by blood, which drew on Confiſcations: whereof let never any Prince make a Precedent: for where Taxations properly do but Tondere, theſe did Deglubere. Yet in his ſecond year, he called a Parliament, wherein, beſides the great confiſcations of thoſe that were then attainted, he impoſed upon the people a great Tax, which what it was, is not recorded,

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HAving gotten the Crown by peſtilent courſes, he ſought to eſtabliſh it by wholeſome Laws; for in no Kings Reign were better Laws made, than in the Reign of this man. Amongſt other of his Laws, it was enacted, That from thenceforth the Commonalty of the Realm ſhould in no wiſe be charged by any impoſition called a Benevolence, nor any ſuch like charge; and that ſuch actions called a Benevolence, before this time taken, ſhall be taken for no example to make any ſuch like charge hereafter; but ſhall be damned and annulled for ever. Many other good Laws were by him made; that we may ſay he took the wayes of being a good King, if he had come to be King by wayes that had been good.

No Benevolence to be required.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN his time the troubles of the Temporality kept the Clergy at quiet; and though there were complainings in the ſtreets, there was none in the Church. Only Shore's Wife might complain, why ſhe ſhould do Penance for offending lightly againſt only the Seventh Commandment; and King Richard do none for offending heavily againſt all the ten; but that perhaps he had gotten ſome good fellow to be his Confeſſor.

Works of Piety done by him.

AS bad as this King was, yet ſome good works he did; he founded a Colledge at Middleham beyond York; and a Collegiate Chauntry in London; near unto the Tower, called our Lady of Barking: He endowed the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, with five hundred Marks of yearly Revenue; and diſforeſted the great field of Whitchwood, which King Edward his Brother had incloſed for Deer.

Of Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his ſecond year, at the time when the Duke of Buckingham meant to paſs with his Army over Severn, ſo great an inundation was of water, that men were drowned in their beds, houſes were overturned, children were carried about the fields ſwimming in Cradles, beaſts were drowned on Hills: which rage of water continued ten dayes; and is to this day in the Countreys thereabout, called the Great Water, or the Duke of Buckingham's water.

A great Inundation called the Duke of Buckingham's water.

Of his Wife and Iſſue.

HE married Anne the ſecond Daughter of Richard Nevil the great Earl of Warwick, being the Widow of Edward Prince of Wales, the Son of King Henry the ſixth: ſhe lived his Wife to the laſt year of his Reign; and then, to make way for another, was brought to her end, and laid at reſt in the Abby of Weſtminſter: By her he had only one Son, born at Middleham near Richmond in the County of York: at four years old, created Earl of Salisbury by his Uncle King Edward the Fourth; at ten years old created Prince of Wales by his Father King Richard, but died ſoon after.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

THere never was in any man a greater uniformity of Body and Minde than was in him; both of them equally deformed. Of Body he was but low, crook-back'd, hook-ſhouldered, ſplay-footed, and goggle-eyed, his face little and round, his complexion ſwarthy, his left arm from his birth dry and withered: born a Monſter in nature, with all his teeth, with hair on his head, and nails on his fingers and toes. And juſt ſuch were the qualities of his minde: One quality he had in ordinary, which was, to look fawningly when he plotted, ſternly when he executed. Thoſe Vices, which in other men are Paſſions, in him were Habits: and his and his cruelty was not upon occaſion, but natural. If at any time he ſhewed any vertue, it was but pretence; the truth of his minde was only lying and falſhood. He was full of courage, and yet not valiant; valour conſiſting not only in doing, but as well in ſuffering, which he could not abide. He was politick, and yet not wiſe; Policy looking but to the middle, Wiſdom to the end: which he did, and did not. And it was not ſo much Ambition that made him deſire the Crown, as Cruelty; that it might be in his power to kill at his pleaſure: And to ſay the truth, he was ſcarce of the number of men who conſiſt of fleſh and blood, being nothing but blood. One miracle we may ſay he did; which was, that he made the truth of Hiſtory to exceed the fiction of Poetry, being a greater Harpy than thoſe that were feigned. He would fain have been accounted a good King, but for his life he could not be a good Man; and it is an impoſſible thing to be one without the other. He left no Iſſue behinde him: and it had been pity he ſhould, at leaſt in his own Image. One ſuch Monſter was enough for many Ages.

Of his Death and Burial.

King Richard baſely uſed being dead.

BEing ſlain in the Battel at Boſworth, as before is related; his body was left naked and deſpoiled to the very skin, not ſo much as a clout left about him to cover his privy parts: and taken up, was truſſed behinde a purſuivant at Arms, one Blanch Senglyer, or White-boar; his head and arms hanging on one ſide of the Horſe, and his legs on the other; and all beſprinkled with mire and dirt, he was brought to the Gray-Friers Church within the Town of Leiceſter, and there for ſome time lay a miſerable ſpectacle; and afterward, with ſmall Funeral Pomp, was there interred. But after this, King Henry the Seventh cauſed a Tomb to be made, and ſet up over the place where he was buried, with a Picture of Alablaſter, repreſenting his perſon; which at the ſuppreſſion of that Monaſtery was utterly defaced: Since when, his Grave, overgrown with Nettles and Weeds, is not to be found; only the Stone-Cheſt, wherein his Corps lay, is now made a Drinking-Trough for Horſes at a common Inne in Leiceſter, and retaineth the only memory of this Monarchs greatneſs. But his body (as is reported) was carried out of the City, and contemptuouſly beſtowed under the end of Bowbridge, which giveth paſſage over a branch of Stowre, upon the Weſt ſide of the Town. Upon this Bridge (the like report runneth) ſtood a Stone of ſome height; againſt which King Richard, as he paſſed toward Boſworth, by chance ſtrook his Spur: and againſt the ſame Stone, as he was brought back, hanging by the horſe ſide, his head was daſhed and broken: as a wiſe Woman (forſooth) had foretold; who before his going to Battel, being asked of his ſucceſs, ſaid, That where his Spur ſtrook, his head ſhould be broken. But theſe are but reports. He had lived ſeven and thirty years, Reigned two, and two months.

Of men of Note in his time.

OF men of Note for wickedneſs and villany, enough have been mentioned in the body of the Story: and for men of Valour and Learning, they will fitter be placed in a better Kings Reign.

Mayors and Sheriffs of London in this Kings time.

In his firſt year,
William Billeſdon was Mayor.
Thomas Newland, William Martin, Sheriffs.

In his ſecond year,
Thomas Hill was Mayor:
Richard Cheſter; and he dying, Ralph Aſtry, Thomas Britain, Sheriffs.

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE SEVENTH.

1485. King Henry's first Title.

HENRY Earl of Richmond born in Pembroke Caſtle, Son to Edmund Earl of Richmond, by his Wife Margaret, ſole Daughter of John Duke of Somerſet, which John was Son of John Earl of Somerſet, Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, by his third Wife Katherine Swinford; and by this deſcent, Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter: having won the Battel at Boſworth, againſt King Richard, is by publick acclamations ſaluted King of England, on the 22. day of Auguſt, in the year 1485. and this was his firſt Title. And now to take away a root of danger, before his departure from Leiceſter, he ſent Sir Robert Willoughby to the Caſtle of Sheriffehaton in the County of York, for Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence, being then of the age of fifteen years, whom King Richard had there kept a priſoner all his time; who was thence conveyed to London, and ſhut up in the Tower to be kept in ſafe cuſtody. In the ſame Caſtle alſo King Richard had left reſiding the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to King Edward the fourth: and her now King Henry appoints honourably attended to be brought up to London, and to be delivered to the Queen her Mother. This done, he took his journey towards London; where at his approaching near the City, Thomas Hill the Mayor, Thomas Britain and Richard Cheſter Sheriffs, with other principal Citizens, met him at Shoreditch, and in great ſtate brought him to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where he offered three Standards: In the one was the Image of St. George; in the other was a red fiery Dragon, beaten upon white and green Sarcenet; in the third was painted a Dun Cow, upon yellow Tartern. After Prayers ſaid, he departed to the Biſhops Palace, and there ſojourned a ſeaſon: And in the time of his ſtay here, he adviſed with his Council, and appointed a day for ſolemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth: before which time notwithſtanding, he went by water to Weſtminſter, and was there with great ſolemnity Anointed and Crowned King of England, by the whole conſent as well of the Commons as of the Nobility, by the name or Henry the Seventh, on the thirtieth day of October, in the year 1485. and this was his ſecond Title. And even this was revealed to Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britains, ſeven hundred ninety and ſeven years paſt; That his Off-ſpring ſhould Reign and bear Dominion in this Realm again.

Edward Plantagenet Son and Heir of George Duke of Clarence, ſhut up in the Tower.

The Earl of Richmond is Crowned King.

On the ſeventeenth day of November following, he called his High Court of Parliament: where, at the firſt ſitting, two ſcruples appeared; One concerning the Burgeſſes for that many had been returned Burgeſſes and Knights of Shires, who by a Parliament in King Richards time ſtood attainted ſtill: and it was thought incongruous for men to make Laws, who were themſelves out-lawed: For remedy whereof an Act was preſently paſſed for their reſtoring, and then they were admitted to ſit in the Houſe. The other concerning the King himſelf, who had been attainted by King Richard: but for this, It was reſolved by all the Judges in the Chequer Chamber, that the poſſeſſion of the Crown takes away all defects; yet for Honours ſake, all Records of his Attainder were taken off the File. And ſo theſe ſcruples thus removed, the Parliament began; wherein were attainted, firſt, Richard late Duke of Gloceſter, calling himſelf Richard the Third: Then his Aſſiſtants at the Battel of Boſworth: John late Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Earl of Surrey, Francis Viſcount Lovel, Walter Devereux late Lord Ferrers, John Lord Zouch, Robert Harington, Richard Charleton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berley of Wely, Robert Middleton, James Harington, Robert Brackenbury, Thomas Pilkington, Walter Hopton, William Catesby, Roger Wake, William Sapcote, Humfrey Stafford, William Clark of Wenlock, Geoffry St. Germain, Richard Watkins Herauld at Arms, Richard Sevel, Thomas Pulter, John Welſh, John Kendal late Secretary to the late King Richard, John Buck, Andrew Rat, and William Brampton of Burford. But notwithſtanding this Attainder, divers of the perſons aforeſaid were afterwards not only by King Henry pardoned, but reſtored alſo to their Lands and Livings. As likewiſe he cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever would ſubmit themſelves, and take Oath to be true Subjects, ſhould have their Pardon: whereupon many came out of Sanctuaries and other places; who ſubmitting themſelves, were received to mercy.

The poſſeſſion of the Crown takes away all defects.

Lords and others attainted by Parliament.

And now King Henry conſidering that Pœnâ & Præmio Reſpublica continetur; after puniſhing for Offences, he proceeds to rewarding for Service; and firſt, Jaſper Earl of Pembroke his Uncle he created Duke of Bedford: Thomas Lord

Dukes and Earls created.

Lord Stanley he created Earl of Derby; the Lord Chendow of Britain, his ſpecial friend, he made Earl of Bathe; Sir Giles Daubeny was made Lord Daubeny; Sir Robert Willoughby was made Lord Brook; and Edward Stafford eldeſt Son to Henry late Duke of Buckingham he reſtored to his Dignity and Poſſeſſions. Beſides, in this Parliament an Act was made, for ſetling the Crown upon the perſon of King Henry and the Heirs of his body ſucceſſively for ever. And then with all ſpeed he ſent and redeemed the Marqueſs Dorſet, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left Hoſtages in France for money: and called home Morton Biſhop of Ely, and Richard Fox, making Morton Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Fox Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Biſhop of Wincheſter. Beſides theſe, he made alſo of his Privy Council, Jaſper Duke of Bedford, John Earl of Oxford, Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, John Biſhop of Ely, Sir Will. Stanley, Lord Chamberlain of his Houſhold; Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brook, Lord Steward of his Houſhold; Giles Lord Daubeny; John Lord Dynham, after made Lord Treaſurer of England; Sir Reginold Bray, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Richard Guilford, Sir Richard Tunſtal, Sir Richard Edgecomb, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Edmund Poynings, Sir John Riſley, with ſome other.

Morton is made Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Fox is made Lord Privy Seal.

1486. King Henry marries the Lady Elizabeth.

Theſe things thus done, as well in performance of his Oath, as to make his Crown ſit the ſurer on his head; on the eighteenth day of January, he proceeded to the ſolemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth; which gave him a third Title: And indeed this conjunction made a wreath of three ſo indiſſoluble, that no age ſince hath ever queſtioned it: and it is fixt upon a Tree planted ſo happily by the waters ſide, and hath at this day ſo many flouriſhing branches, that there is good hope it will continue as long as the World continues.

The Kings Guard firſt ordained.

And now whether King Henry doubted any ſudden attempt upon his perſon, or whether he did it to follow the example of France; in the very beginning of his Reign, he ordained a band of tall perſonable men to be attending upon him, which was called the Kings Guard; which no King before, and all Kings ſince have alwayes uſed: But though he provided a Guard for defence of his own body, yet for the bodies of his people he could provide none; for at this time a Sickneſs (of the ſymptome called the Sweating Sickneſs) ſeized ſo violently upon them, that within a ſhort time many thouſands periſhed; particularly in London, two Mayors ſucceſſively, and ſix Aldermen within eight dayes died: and for this Sickneſs no Phyſick afforded any cure; till at laſt this remedy was found: If a man were taken with the ſweat in the day time, that then he ſhould preſently lie down in his Cloaths, and ſo lie ſtill the whole four and twenty hours; if he were taken in the night, then he ſhould not riſe out of his bed, for the ſpace of four and twenty hours; not provoking ſweat, nor yet eating or drinking at all, at leaſt but very moderately. In this ſickneſs there was one good circumſtance; that though it were violent, yet it laſted not long: for beginning about the one and twentieth of September, it cleared up before the end of October following.

A violent Sickneſs in London, and the remedy.

And now all things being ſet in good order in the South parts, there ariſeth a little ſtorm in the North, but was ſoon diſperſed. For King Henry, making a journey into the North parts, to ſhew himſelf there where he had not yet been; and where the reſpect to King Richard might have left ſome oppoſites: at his coming to Lincoln, was certified that the Lord Lovel and Humfrey Stafford were gone out of Sanctuary in Colcheſter; but whither, no man knew. The King therefore not much regarding it, went forward to York; and being come thither, it was then plainly told him, that the Lord Lovel with a ſtrong power was at hand, and would preſently invade the City. This made the King in a great ſtraight; for neither had he any Army ready; nor if he had men, had he any Weapons or Munition for them. Yet in this ſtraight, he commanded the Duke of Bedford, with three thouſand men to ſet out againſt him, but ſo ill armed, that their Armours for the moſt part were but of tanned Leather; who being come near the Camp of the Rebels, cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever would ſubmit themſelves as Loyal Subjects, ſhould have their Pardons, and be received into Grace: which Proclamaaion ſo prevailed, that it made the Lord Lovel ſecretly in the night to flee away; and then the Army, left without a head, ſubmitted themſelves to the Kings mercy. The Lord Lovel fled into Lancaſhire; and there for a time lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton, a man powerful in thoſe parts. Humfrey Stafford took Sanctuary in a Village called Culnham, two miles from Abbington: but the Sanctuary being judged, by the Juſtices of the Kings Bench, to be no lawful defence for Traytors; he was taken from thence by force, and conveyed to the Tower, afterward to Tyburn, and there hanged. His Brother Thomas was pardoned, becauſe it was thought he was drawn in by his Brother Humfrey.

The Lord Lovel raiſeth an Army againſt the King, but upon Proclamation of Pardon is diſperſed.

Sanctuary for Traytors.

In this year John Perſival the Mayor of London's Carver, waiting at his Table, was choſen one of the Sheriffs of London, only by Sir John Collets, then Mayor, drinking to him in a cup of Wine, (as the cuſtom is to drink to him whom he liſt to name Sheriff) and forthwith the ſaid Perſival ſate down at the Mayors Table, and covered his head, and was afterward Mayor himſelf.

The Mayors Carver choſen Sheriffe of London, and by what occaſion.

At this time a mean inſtrument attempted a great work; by which we may ſee, how far imagination may out-go reaſon: One Richard Simond a Prieſt, a man of baſe birth, though ſome learning; had a Scholar of baſer birth, the Son of a Shoomaker (ſome ſay a Baker) named Lambert Symnel; but of a pregnant wit, and comely perſonage: Him he gives out to be Edward Earl of Warwick, lately (as was ſaid) eſcaped out of Priſon, both of them being of like years and ſtature: with this Scholar of his, he ſails into Ireland, and ſo ſets forth the matter, that not only the Lord Thomas Fitz-Gerard Earl of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland; but many other of the Nobility gave credit to his words; and as thoſe that affected the Houſe of York, were ready to take his part, and even already ſaluted the young Symnel King. Withal they Lambert Symnel given forth to be Edward Earl of Warwick.

Countenanced in Ireland.

Chiefly by the Lady Margaret Dutcheſs of Burgoigne.

they ſent into Flanders to the Lady Margaret, Siſter to the late King Edward, and Widow of Charles Duke of Burgoigne, requiring aid and aſſiſtance from her. This Lady being of the Houſe of York, bore an inward grudge againſt King Henry, being of the Houſe of Lancaſter; and therefore, though ſhe well underſtood it was but a coloured matter, yet was willing to take advantage of it: and thereupon promiſed her aſſiſtance. King Henry being advertiſed of theſe things, adviſed with his Council; by whom it was agreed, that two things preſently ſhould be done. Firſt, to grant a pardon to any that would ſubmit themſelves, for any offence whatſoever, though it were for High Treaſon: The next, that the Earl of Warwick ſhould be openly ſhewed abroad in the City, and other publick places; whereby, the report ſpread abroad of his being in Ireland, might appear plainly to be falſe. Withal, the Queen Elizabeth, Widow of King Edward the fourth, and Mother to the preſent Queen, was adjudged to forfeit all her Lands and Poſſeſſions, and to live confined in the Abbey of Bermondſey in Southwark; where in great penſiveneſs within a few years ſhe died. But for what cauſe this ſeverity was uſed againſt this Queen, is not altogether certain: To ſay, (as was commonly ſaid) that it was for rendring her ſelf and her Daughters into the hands of King Richard, were manifeſt injuſtice, to puniſh her for doing a thing out of fear, which elſe ſhe ſhould have been compelled to do by force: and to ſay (as ſome alſo have ſaid) that it was for giving aid underhand to Perkin, were a manifeſt unlikelihood, that ſhe ſhould aid a Counterfeit againſt her own Son in law: we muſt therefore content our ſelves with knowing the bare colourable pretext, and leave the true reaſon as a ſecret of State. But this ſhewing abroad of the true Earl of Warwick, though it ſatisfied ſome, yet not all: for ſome gave out that it was but a trick of the King, and not the true Warwick. At leaſt the Earl of Lincoln, Son to John de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Siſter to King Edward the fourth, would not omit to take the advantage, though he knew that Symnel was a Counterfeit. And thereupon, as ſoon as the Parliament was diſſolved, he fled ſecretly into Flanders, to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheſs of Burgoign; between whom it was concluded, that he and the Lord Lovel ſhould go into Ireland, and there attend upon the Counterfeit Warwick, and honour him as a King; and with the power of the Iriſh men bring him into England: but it was concluded withal, that if their actions ſucceeded, then the Counterfeit Warwick ſhould be depoſed, and the true be delivered out of Priſon, and Anointed King. And to this purpoſe, the Earl of Lincoln by the aid of the Lady Margaret, had gotten together two thouſand Almains, with one Martin Swart, a valiant and expert Captain to be their Leader.

Queen Elizabeth hath all her goods confiſcate, and her ſelf confined.

By the Plot of the Earl of Lincoln, and the Lady Margaret, Symnel is conveyed into Ireland, and there Crowned King of England.

1487. With this power the Earl ſailed into Ireland, and at the City of Dublin, cauſed young Lambert, the Counterfeit Warwick, in moſt ſolemn manner, firſt to be proclaimed, and after to be Crowned King of England: and then with a great number of beggarly and unarmed Iriſh men, under the conduct of the Lord Thomas Gerardine Earl of Kildare, they ſailed into England, and landed at a place called the Pile of Fowdray, not far from Lancaſter; hoping there by the means of Sir Thomas Broughton, a powerful man in that Countrey, to have their Army both furniſhed and increaſed. King Henry hearing that the Earl of Lincoln was landed at Lancaſter, aſſembled a great Army, conducted by the Duke of Bedford, and the Earl of Oxford; and with theſe he marched to Nottingham, and there by a little Wood called Bowres, he pitched his Field; whither there came unto him, the Lord George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Strange, Sir John Cheyney, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. In which mean time the Earl of Lincoln being entred into Yorkſhire, paſſed quietly on his journey, without doing ſpoil or hurt unto any; truſting thereby to have won the people to come to his aid; but when he perceived few or none to reſort unto him, he then determined to venture a Battel with the Army he had already; and thereupon took his way from York to Newark upon Trent. King Henry underſtanding which way he took, came the night before the Battel to Newark; and going three miles further, near to a Village called Stoke, there waited the approach of the Earl of Lincoln; ſo the next day they joyned Battel; where after a long fight of at the leaſt three hours; though the Almains, and ſpecially their Captain Martin Swart behaved themſelves moſt valiantly; yet their Iriſh, being in a manner but naked men, were at laſt overthrown, four thouſand ſlain, and the reſt put to flight, but not one of their Captains; for the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Lovel, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and the Lord Gerardine were all found dead in the very place, where they had ſtood fighting; that though they loſt the Battel, yet they won the reputation of hardy and ſtout Souldiers. Only of the Lord Lovel, ſome report, that attempting to ſave himſelf by flight, in paſſing over the River of Trent, he was drowned. On the Kings part, though ſome were ſlain, yet not any man of note. This Battel was fought on a Saturday (obſerved as alwayes fortunate to King Henry) being the ſixteenth of June, in the ſecond year of King Henry's Reign. The young Lambert and his Maſter Simond the Prieſt, were both taken; and both had their lives ſaved: Lambert, becauſe but a Childe, Simond becauſe a Prieſt; yet Simond was kept in priſon, Lambert was taken into the Kings Kitchin, to turn the Spit in the turn of his fortune, and at laſt made one of the Kings Faulkners.

1488. In the beginning of his third year, King Henry having been in Yorkſhire, to ſettle the mindes of that people, about the midſt of Auguſt came to New-caſtle upon Tine, and from thence ſent Ambaſſadours into Scotland, Richard Fox, lately before made Biſhop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgecomb Comptroller of his Houſe, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James King of Scots: A Peace, by reaſon of the peoples backwardneſs, could not be obtained: but a Truce was concluded for the term of ſeven years; with a promiſe from the King, that it ſhould be renewed before fore the first seven years should be expired.

At this time Ambassadours came from the King of France, to King Henry; who declared, that their Master King Charles was now at War with Francis Duke of Britain, for that he succoured the Duke of Orleance and other Rebels against the Realm of France; and therefore requested, that for the old Familiarity that had been between them, he would either assist him, or not assist the Duke, but stand Neuter. King Henry answered, that having received courtesies from them both, he would do his uttermost endeavour to make them friends: and to that end, as soon as the French Ambassadours were departed, he sent Christopher Urswick his Chaplain over into France, who should first go to the French King, and after to the Duke of Britain, to mediate a Peace between them.

Queen Elizabeth is Crowned.

In the time of Urswicks Ambassage, King Henry caused his Wife the Lady Elizabeth to be Crowned Queen, on Saint Katherine's day in November, with all solemnity; and at the same time delivered the Lord Thomas Marques Dorset out of the Tower, and received him again into his former favour.

Urswick travelled between the two Princes to procure Peace: but they, though making a shew to incline to Peace, yet prepared for War, and offers on neither side would be accepted. In which time Edward Lord Woodvile, Uncle to the Queen, made suit to the King, for leave to go over with a power of men, in aid to the Duke of Britain; which suit though the King denied, yet the Lord Woodvile would venture it; and with a power of four hundred able men, got secretly over, and joyned with the Britains against the French. This the French King took ill at King Henry's hand; but being informed that it was against the Kings will, he seemed satisfied; and a Peace was concluded between France and England, to endure for twelve months. But in conclusion, King Henry finding that the French King dealt not really with him, but only held him on with pretences; he called his High Court of Parliament, requiring their advice what was fit to be done: where it was concluded, that the Duke of Britain should be aided; and to that end great summes of money were by Parliament granted. This determination of the Parliament, King Henry signifies to the French King, hoping it would have wrought him to some terms of Peace. But the King of France little regarding it, proceeded on in his violent courses against the Britains; so as at last, on the eight and twentieth day of July, the Britains gave Battel to the French, near to a Town called St. Aulbyn; having apparelled seventeen hundred of the Britains in Coats with red Crosses, after the English fashion, to make the French men believe they were all English, although indeed they had no more English than the four hundred of the Lord Woodvile's, But notwithstanding this device, the Victory fell to the French; so that all the English men almost were slain, with the Lord Woodvile himself; besides six thousand Britains. The Duke of Orleance, and the Prince of Orange, who were on the Britains part, were taken Prisoners. The French lost twelve hundred men; and amongst other, that valiant Italian Captain James Galeot.

A Peace between France and England.

The King of France overthrows the Duke of Britain's Army, where the Lord Woodvile is slain.

King Henry sends an Army to aid the Duke of Britain.

This news being brought into England, caused King Henry to make haste to send forth his Army: and thereupon the Lord Brook, with Sir John Cheyney, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lacon, and Sir Edmund Cornwal, are sent over with all speed into Britain; having with them eight thousand men, to aid the Duke of Britain against the French. But while this War was thus set forward, the Duke of Britain died; leaving in effect, one only Daughter, the Lady Anne (for the other being the younger, died soon after) and then the chief Rulers of Britain falling at dissention amongst themselves, little regarded the defence of the Countrey: whereupon the English returned home, within five months after their setting forth: and the French King getting the upper hand of the Britains, and marrying the Lady Anne sole Daughter of the Duke of Britain, incorporated that Dutchy to the Crown of France.

The French King marries the Heir of the Duke of Britain.

In the last Parliament, a Subsidy was granted, for the furnishing out an Army into Britain; and it was agreed that every man should be taxed after the rate of his substance, to pay the tenth penny of his goods: which Tax the most part of Yorkshire and the Bishoprick of Durham refused to pay: whereof the Collectors complained to Henry Earl of Northumberland, President of the North Parts; The Earl signifies it to the King, and the King commands him to levy the same, by distress or otherwise (without sparing of any) as he should think most meet. The rude multitude, hearing of this Command from the King, with great violence set upon the Earl, by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber; and alledging all the fault to be in the Earl, as chief author of the Tax; they cruelly murthered both him and divers of his houshold Servants. And to make good their seditious fact, they assembled a great number, and made one Sir John Egremond their Captain: Declaring, that in defence of their liberties, they would bid the King Battel. In this bravery they stood, as long as none opposed them: but when Thomas Earl of Surrey appeared with an Army, though they skirmished a while, yet they were soon discomfited, and their Ring-leader John a Chamber was taken, and at York on a Gibbet set upon a square pair of Gallows, like an Arch-traytor, was hanged, and many of his Complices on a lower Gallows; the innocent people for the most part pardoned. But Sir John Egremond fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret Dutchess of Burgundy; the common and sure refuge for all Rebels against King Henry. After this, the King appointed Sir Richard Tunstal to gather the Subsidy, and would not spare the payment of a Penny. This year, notwithstanding this Tax, the King borrowed of every Alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eighty two pounds, seventeen shillings and four pence, which was paid again at the time with great thankfulness; which he did at a time he needed not, to the end perhaps he might do it another time, when he needed.

At this time James the third, King of Scotland land, having by ſome errors of Government incurred the hatred of his Nobility and people, laboured with King Henry, as alſo with the Pope, and the King of France, to make an accord between him and his people; who had compelled Prince James his Son, to be the Titular head of thoſe Arms which they aſſumed againſt him. The Kings accordingly interpoſed their mediations by Ambaſſadours; but could receive no other, but this outragious, anſwer, That there was no talking of Peace, unleſs he would reſign his Crown. Which anſwer the Kings proteſted againſt, declaring by their Ambaſſadours, that they thought it a common injury to themſelves, and that the Example was not ſufferable for Subjects to lift their hands againſt their Sovereign. Hereupon it came to a Battel at Bannocks-born by Strivelin; where King James, raſhly beginning the fight, before his whole Forces were come, was (notwithſtanding the contrary commandement of the Prince his Son) ſlain in the Mill of that field, whither he fled, after the Battel ended.

About this time, a difference fell out which grew to a War, between the Emperour Frederick, and ſome Towns of his in Flanders, eſpecially Gaunt and Bruges: In this War, the Lord Ravenſtein a principal perſon about Maximilian, not only forſook the Emperour and his Son Maximilian his Lord, (corrupted as was thought from France) but made himſelf head of the popular party, ſeizing upon the Towns of Ipre and Sluce: and not this only, but forthwith ſent to the Lord de Cordes, Governour for the French King in Picardy, to aid him againſt ſome Towns in Flanders: To which the Lord de Cordes, willing of any occaſion to ſet foot in Flanders, was eaſily drawn. But King Henry not liking to have the French ſo near his Engliſh pale, ſent over the Lord Morley with a thouſand men, who ſhould joyn with the Lord Dawbeny then Depury of Callice, to reſiſt them. Amongſt other Acts by them performed, this was chief, That the Lord Dawbeny, with the Lord Morley, Sir James Tyrrel Captain of Guiſnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and Sir Humfrey Talbot Marſhal of Callice, and others to the number of two thouſand, iſſued ſecretly one night out of Callice, and came to Newport, and from thence to Dixmude; where the Lord Dawbeny commanded all men to ſend back their Horſes: which the Lord Morley only refuſing to do, was cauſe that he only of all the Captains was ſlain with a Gun: for the reſt after their arrows diſcharged, fell proſtrate to the ground; by which means the Enemies Ordinance over-ſhot them, killing only the Lord Morley that was on Horſeback. Here they ſlew of the Enemy to the number of eight thouſand; of the Engliſh part was ſlain the Lord Morley, and not above a hundred more. This Victory ſo enriched the Engliſh, that they who went forth in Cloth, came home in Silk; and they who went out on foot, returned back on Horſeback. Upon this defeat, the Lord de Cordes lying at Ipre with twenty thouſand, and thinking to be revenged, beſieged the Town of Newport; and ſo ſtrongly aſſaulted it, that one day his men entred, and ſet up his Banner upon a Tower of the Town; when ſuddenly a Bark arriving with only fourſcore freſh Engliſh Archers, ſo terrified them, thinking their number to be far greater, that the French were glad to leave their Banner behinde them, and give over the aſſault; and the night following the Lord de Cordes (who ſo much longed for Callice, that he would commonly ſay, he would be content to lie ſeven years in Hell, ſo that Callice were in the poſſeſſion of the French) brake up his ſiege, and returned to Helding with as much ſhame, as the Engliſh to Callice with honour.

King Henry ſends an Army to aſſiſt the Emperor againſt the French.

The French frighted with a conceit.

How much the French longed for Callice.

A little before this time, Francis Duke of Britain dying, left only one Daughter, the Lady Anne, affianced to Maximilian King of the Romans; and in ſo ſolemn a manner, that ſhe taking upon her to be the Bride, and being laid in her bed, was contented to permit Maximilian's Deputy, in preſence of many noble witneſſes, as well men as women, to put his leg ſtript naked to the knee, between the ſpouſal ſheets; accounting that Ceremony to amount to the Conſummation. The King of France likewiſe had been contracted to the Lady Margaret, Daughter to the foreſaid Maximilian, and had received her to that end: Yet all this notwithſtanding, out of a violent deſire to joyn the Dutchy of Britain to the Crown of France, he diſannulled and made void both the Contracts. But to the end he might do it without oppoſition of the King of England, he ſent Ambaſſadours, the Lord Francis of Lutzemburg, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gagnine, to King Henry; partly to conclude a Peace, but chiefly to procure King Henry's good will to make void the foreſaid Contracts: to which though King Henry was not willing to give conſent, yet he conſented willingly to have a Treaty for Peace; and to that end, ſent over Thomas Earl of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenſtone Prior of Chriſt's Church in Canterbury, to the French King about it. But during this Treaty, and before conditions of Peace could be agreed on, the French King had gotten into his poſſeſſion the Lady Anne of Britain, and ſolemnly married her. Which underhand dealing ſo incenſed King Henry, that he preſently called his High Court of Parliament, and there declared the juſt cauſe he had of War with France, deſiring their Benevolence to the Charge thereof; which was as readily granted as deſired, and great ſummes of money were ſoon collected.

1491.

In the year 1491. being the ſixth year of the Kings Reign, on the ſixth of April, the Nobility of the Realm aſſembled in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, where alſo was the Mayor and Aldermen, and principal Citizens in their Liveries: to whom Doctor Morton Lord Chancellour made an Oration; declaring from his own Letters, that the King of Spain had won the great and rich City and Countrey of Granado from the Moors, which had been in their poſſeſſion above ſeven hundred years: and having, in places of their ſuperſtition, built Churches to the Honour of Chriſt, was thereupon entituled the Catholick King. For joy whereof Te Deum was ſung with great ſolemnity.

In the month of May was holden a ſolemn Juſting at the Kings palace of Sheen, now called Richmond, which continued the ſpace of a month, month, ſometimes within the Palace, and ſometimes without, upon the Green before the Gate; in which Juſts, Sir James Parker running againſt a Gentleman named Hugh Vaughan, by reaſon of a faulty Helmet, was ſtrucken into the mouth at the firſt courſe; ſo that his tongue was born to the hinder part of his head, in ſuch ſort that he died preſently upon the place.

King Henry is drawn into France to aſſiſt the Emperour, upon promiſe, which the Emperor keeps not.

And now Maximilian having received back his Daughter from the King of France, was ſo diſpleaſed, that he preſently ſent an Ambaſſador, one James Contibald, to King Henry, requiring him to take his part in a War againſt the French King; towards which he promiſed to provide ten thouſand men, with pay for two years: King Henry conſented to it; and having provided himſelf of a puiſſant Army, on the ſixth day of October ſailed to Callice; but ſending his Almoner Chriſtopher Urſwick, and Sir John Reſley to Maximilian, requiring his promiſed Forces; they found him altogether unprovided of either men or money: which brought King Henry into a great ſtraight what he ſhould do: To proceed in the War, with his own Forces alone, would be full of hazard; to return home without doing any thing would bring an imputation upon him amongſt his Subjects; as though he had uſed the pretence of War but as a trick to get money: at laſt, he reſolved to do ſomething; and thereupon went and beſieged Boloigne, having in his Army, of chief Lords, Jaſper Duke of Bedford, his Lieutenant General, Thomas Marqueſs Dorſet, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Suffolk, Shrewsbury, Derby, Kent, Devonſhire, and Ormond, ſundry Barons, as Dawbeny, Aburgany, De la Ware, Zouch, Haſtings, Cobham, and others. During his ſiege of Boloigne, (in which there were but a few ſlain, and none of note, but Sir John Savage, who riding to take view at what place the Town might beſt be aſſaulted, was ſet upon by certain French men, and by them ſlain) King Henry was ſecretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Governour of Heynault, on the King of France's behalf, to accept of certain conditions of Peace. Who thereupon ſent Richard Fox, Biſhop of Exeter, and Giles Lord Dawbeny to conclude them; which amongſt other Articles were, That King Henry without quitting his claim to France, ſhould, for a Peace to continue during the two Kings lives, receive in preſent of Charles King of France, for his charges in that War, ſeven hundred forty and five thouſand Duckats, which in Engliſh money amounts to one hundred eighty ſix thouſand two hundred and fifty pounds; and five and twenty thouſand Crowns yearly, towards the expenſes he had been at before in aiding the Britains; which (by the Engliſh called Tribute) was duly paid, during all the Kings Reign, and alſo to King Henry his Son afterward, longer then it could continue upon any computation of charges. There were alſo aſſigned by the French King unto all King Henry's principal Counſellors, great Penſions, beſides rich gifts for the preſent. Which whether the King did permit, to ſave his own purſe from Rewards, or to communicate the envy of a buſineſs that was diſpleaſing to his people, was diverſly interpreted: for certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this Peace; and therefore a little before it was concluded, he had underhand procured ſome of his beſt Captains and Men of War, to adviſe him to a Peace under their hands in an earneſt manner, in the nature of a Supplication; that he might have it to ſhew for juſtifying himſelf, and to give ſome allay to the diſcontentments of many, who had ſold and engaged their eſtates upon the hopes of the War. After the Peace thus concluded, he went to Callice, where he ſtayed ſome time, and the ſeventeenth of December following came to Weſtminſter, where he kept his Chriſtmaſs.

King Henry hath a great ſumme of money of the King of France, to agree to a Peace.

Soon after his return, he elected into the Order of the Garter, Alphonſus Duke of Calabria, Son and Heir to Ferdinand King of Naples: to whom Chriſtopher Urſwick the Kings Almoner, was ſent to Naples to carry it; which as ſoon as Alphonſus had received, he apparelled himſelf preſently in the Habit, before a great aſſembly, indeed to ſhew what favour he was in with the King of England.

There had been diſturbance in the Realm before, by a Counterfeit Son of the Duke of Clarence; but that device had two main imperfections: One, that the true Son of the Duke was forth coming, and to be ſhewed openly for convincing the falſe; the other, that though the counterfeit had been the true, yet he could have laid no claim to the Crown, as long as any Daughters of King Edward the fourth were living: Now therefore a device is found, by which thoſe imperfections were both of them amended, for now a Counterfeit was ſet on foot, who pretended to be Richard the younger Son of King Edward the fourth; ſo that neither any other could be produced to convince him of being falſe, nor any Daughters of King Edward could hinder his Right for claiming the Crown. This device was firſt forged by Margaret Dutcheſs of Burgundy; a woman that could never be quiet in her minde, as long as King Henry was quiet in his Kingdom; and by this device ſhe hoped, if not to put him clean out of his ſeat, yet foully at leaſt to diſturb him in it; and this was the purpoſe of the plot: but by what inſtrument it was acted, by what abettours fomented, and what iſſue the device had, are worthy all to be related. The Dutcheſs having formerly given out, that Richard the younger Son of King Edward, was not murthered, but in compaſſion ſpared, and ſent ſecretly away to ſeek his fortune; and having after long ſearch gotten at laſt a fit Boy to perſonate a Prince, keeps him ſecretly a good time with her; in which time ſhe ſo throughly inſtructed him in all Circumſtances, and he afterward put them ſo graceſully in practice, that even thoſe who had ſeen and known the young Prince while he lived, could hardly perceive but that this was he. It is true, though he were not King Edward's Son, yet he was his Godſon; and might perhaps have in him ſome baſe blood of the Houſe of York. This Perkin Warbeck, (for ſo was the youths name, called Perkin, as a diminutive of Peter) when he ſo perfectly had learned his leſſon, that he was fit to come upon the Stage; ſhe ſent him into Portugal, that coming from a ſtrange Countrey, it might be thought, he had been driven to wander from one Countrey to another, for ſafeguard of his life, at leaſt that ſhe of all other might not be ſuſpected. From Portugal ſhe cauſed him to paſs into Ireland, where the Houſe of York was ſpecially reſpected, in reſpect of the great love which Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the fourth, had won amongſt them: by reaſon whereof, this Perkin as eſteemed his Grand-childe, was well entertained by them, and held in great eſtimation. He had not been long in Ireland, when the French King ſent for him; for being at that time at variance with King Henry, he thought he might make good uſe of Perkin, as a pretender againſt King Henry for the Crown. Perkin being come to Paris, was entertained in a Princely faſhion; and for his more honour, had a guard aſſigned him, over which the Lord Congreſhal was Captain: He had not been long at Paris, when there reſorted to him Sir George Nevil Baſtard, Sir John Taylour, Richard Robinſon, and about a hundred other Engliſh. Amongſt the reſt, one Stephen Fryon, that had been King Henry's Secretary for the French Tongue; but diſcontented, fled, and became a chief Inſtrument in Perkin's proceedings. But this float of Perkins laſted not long; for as ſoon as Peace was concluded between the two Kings, the King of France diſmiſſed Perkin, and would keep him no longer. Then paſſed he ſecretly to his firſt foundreſs, the Lady Margaret; who at his firſt coming, made a ſhew of ſuſpecting him to be a Counterfeit: but cauſing him in great aſſemblies to be brought before her, as though ſhe had never ſeen him before; and finding him to anſwer directly to all queſtions ſhe put unto him: ſhe openly profeſſed, that ſhe was now ſatisfied, and thought him verily to be her true Nephew; and thereupon aſſigned a Guard of thirty perſons, clothed in Murrey and Blue, and called him the White Roſe of England. Upon report hereof many in England were inclined to take his part; and Sir Robert Clifford, and Robert Barcley were ſent into Flanders, to acquaint the Dutcheſs with the peoples reſpect to Perkin: and indeed Sir Robert Clifford upon ſight and conference with him, wrote Letters into England, wherein he affirmed, that he knew him to be the true Son of King Edward, by his face, and other Lineaments of his body: King Henry hearing of theſe things, ſent certain eſpials into Flanders, that ſhould feign themſelves to have fled to Perkin, and by that means the better ſearch out who were of the Conſpiracy with him. Whoſe names being returned unto the King, he cauſed them to be apprehended and brought to his preſence: the chief of whom were John Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Montford, and Sir Thomas Thwayts Knights, William Dawbeny, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Creſſenor, and Thomas Aſtwood: Alſo certain Prieſts, William Richford D. of Divinity, Thomas Boyns, D. William Sutton, William Worſeley, Dean of Pauls, Robert Layborn, and Richard Liſley, of whom ſome hearing of it, fled to Sanctuary, others were taken and condemned, as Sir Simon Montford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeny, who were all three beheaded. The Lord Lord Fitzwater pardoned of life, was conveyed to Callice, and there laid in hold; where ſeeking to make eſcape by corrupting his Keeper, he loſt his head. Shortly after, Sir Robert Clifford, returning out of Flanders, (not as ſome think, ſent a ſpie from the beginning, but rather now at laſt, either diſcerning the fraud, or won by rewards) ſubmitted himſelf to the Kings mercy; diſcovering unto him as far as he knew, all that were either open or ſecret abettors of the Conſpiracy; amongſt whom, he accuſed Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain: his accuſation was this, that in conference between them, Sir William had ſaid, that if he certainly knew, that the young man named Perkin were the Son of King Edward the fourth, he would never fight nor bear Arms againſt him. Theſe words being conſidered of by the Judges, ſeemed to expreſs a tickle hold of Loyalty; for who could tell how ſoon he might be perſwaded that he knew it? and upon the matter was to be diſloyal to King Henry; but for want of better: and withal it ſtrook upon a ſtring, which had alwayes ſounded harſh in King Henry's ears, as preferring the Title of York before that of Lancaſter. Sir William being hereupon arraigned; whether truſting to the greatneſs of his favours, or the ſmalneſs of his fault, denied little of that wherewith he was charged, and upon confeſſion was adjudged to die; and accordingly on the ſixteenth day of February was brought to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded: after whoſe death, Giles Lord Dawbeny was made Lord Chamberlain. This was that Sir William Stanley, who came in to reſcue the Earl of Richmond, when he was in danger of his life, who ſet the Crown upon his head: and was the cauſe of his being ſaluted King: And could it enter into his breaſt, to put him to death, that had ſaved his life and done him ſo many great ſervices beſides? But it may be ſaid, It was not the Earl of Richmond that did it, but the King of England: for certainly, in many caſes, a King is not at liberty to ſhew mercy, ſo much as a private man may. Though there be that affirm, the cauſe of his death was not words only, but real acts, as giving aid to Perkin underhand by money. And it ſeems there was ſome conflict in the minde of King Henry, what he ſhould do in this caſe; for he ſtayed ſix weeks after his Accuſation, before he brought him to his Arraignment. However it was, the Summer following, the King went in Progreſs to Latham, to the Earl of Derby, who had married his Mother, and was brother to Sir William Stanley: perhaps to congratulate his own ſafety; perhaps to condole with him his Brothers death; but certainly to keep the Earl from conceiving any ſiniſter opinion of him: For to think that Sir William's ſuing to be Earl of Cheſter, (an Honour appointed to the Kings Son) or his great wealth, (for he left in his Caſtle at Holt, in ready money forty thouſand Marks, beſides Plate and Jewels) were cauſes that procured or ſet forward his death; are conſiderations very unworthy of ſo juſt a Prince, againſt a ſervant of ſo great deſerving.

But in this mean while Perkin having gotten a power of idle looſe fellows, took to Sea,

Is convicted and beheaded.

1495. A hundred and sixty of Perkin's followers executed.

Sea, intending to land in Kent; where, though he were repelled, yet some of his Souldiers would needs venture to go on Land, of whom a hundred and sixty persons were taken prisoners; whereof five were Captains; Mortford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintyn, and Gemyne; The hundred and sixty persons were brought to London, railed in Ropes, like Horses drawing in a Cart, who upon the Arraignment, confessing their offence, were executed, some at London, and some in Towns adjoyning to the Sea-Coast. Perkin finding no entertainment in Kent, sailed into Ireland, and having stayed there a while, and finding them also, being a naked people, to be no competent assistants for him, from thence he sailed into Scotland, where he so moved the King of Scots with his fair words and colourable pretext, (made no doubt before by the Dutchess of Burgoigne) that he received him in great state, and caused him to be called the Duke of York; and to perswade the world that he thought him so indeed, he gave him in marriage the Lady Katharine Gourdon, Daughter to Alexander Earl of Huntley, his own near Kinswoman; and soon after, in Perkin's quarrel, entred with a puissant Army into England, making Proclamation, that whosoever would come in and aid the true Duke of York, should be spared; but none coming in, he then used all kinde of cruelty, and the whole County of Northumberland was in a manner wasted: whereat Perkin at his return, expressed much grief, saying, It grieved him to the heart, to see such havock made of his people: To whom the King answered, Alas, alas, you take care for them, who for any thing that appears are none of yours; for not one of the Countrey came in to his Succour. King Henry, incensed with this bold attempt of the King of Scots, called his High Court of Parliament, acquainting them with the necessity he had of a present War to revenge his indignity offered him by the Scots; and thereupon, requiring their aid by money, had a Subsidy of sixscore thousand pounds readily granted him; and then in all haste a puissant Army is provided, and under the conduct of the Lord Dawbeny sent into Scotland; but before he arrived there, he was suddenly called back by reason of a commotion begun at Cornwal, for payment of the Subsidy lately granted, which though it were not great, yet they grudged to pay it. The Ringleaders of this Commotion were Thomas Flammock a Gentleman learned in the Laws, and Michael Joseph a Smith; who laying the blame blame of this exaction upon John Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Reynold Bray, as being chief of the Kings Council, exhorted the people to take up Arms; and having assembled an Army, they went to Taunton, where they slew the Provost Peryn, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidy, and from thence came to Wells, intending to go to London, where the King then lay, who having revoked the Lord Dawbeny, appointed Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey (after the death of the Lord Dinham, made Lord Treasurer of England) to have an eye to the Scots, and if they made invasion, to resist them. In the mean time James Twichet Lord Audley confederated himself with the Rebels of Cornwal, and took upon him to be their Leader, who from Wells went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, hoping there to have had great aid, but found none; for the Earl of Kent, the Lord Aburgain, John Brook, Lord Cobham, Sir Edmund Poynings, Sir Richard Guilford, Sir Thomas Bourchier, John Peachy, and William Scot, were ready in Arms to resist them; whereupon the Rebels brought their Army to Black-heath, four miles distant from London, and there in a Plain on the top of a hill encamped themselves; whereof when the King had knowledge, he presently sent John Earl of Oxford, Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, Edmund de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Sir Rice ap Thomas and Sir Humfrey Stanley to environ the hill on all sides, that so all hope of flight might be taken from them; and then set forward himself, and encamped in St. George's fields; where for encouragement he made divers Bannerets. The next day he sent the Lord Dawbeny to set upon the Rebels early in the morning, who first got the Bridge at Debtford Strand, though strongly defended by the Rebels Archers, whose Arrows were reported to be full Cloth-yard in length; but notwithstanding, the Lord Dawbeny coming in with his company, and the Earls assailing them on every side, they were soon overcome: In which conflict were slain of the Rebels above two thousand, taken prisoners a very great number; many of whom the King pardoned, but of the chief Authors none: for the Lord Audley was drawn from Newgate to Tower-hill, in a Coat of his own Arms, painted upon paper, reversed and all torn; and there on the four and twentieth day of June was beheaded; Thomas Flammock and Michael Joseph were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and their heads and quarters pitched upon stakes, set up in London; and other places, Of the Kings Army were slain not above three hundred. It is memorable; with what comfort Joseph the Blacksmith cheared up himself at his going to execution, saying, That yet he hoped by this that his name and memory should be everlasting; so dear even to vulgar spirits is perpetuity of Name, though joyned with infamy: what is it then to Noble Spirits, when it is joyned with Glory?

1496. The King of Scots invades the Frontiers, but is repelled.

In the mean time the King of Scots, taking advantage of these troubles in England, invaded the Frontiers, forraged the Bishoprick of Durham, and at last besieged the Castle of Norham, whereof Richard Fox then Bishop of Durham was owner; who thereupon sent presently to the Earl of Surrey, acquainting him with this Invasion: Whereupon the Earl, taking with him Ralph Earl of Westmorland, Thomas Lord Barnes, Ralph Lord Nevil, George Lord Strange, many other Lords and Knights, and an Army of little less then twenty thousand men; besides a Navy, whereof the Lord Brook was Admiral, set forward against the Scots, and not only forced the Scots to raise the siege of Norham Castle; but followed them also into Scotland; where he overthrew and defaced the Castle at Cawdestrains, the Tower of Heten-hall, the Tower of Edington, the Tower of Fulden, and at last by composition took the strong Castle of Hayton, and rased it to the ground.

At the Earls being at Hayton, the King of Scots ſent to him Marchemont and another Herald, requiring him at his Election, either to fight with him with their whole Armies, or elſe they two to fight with him in ſingle combat; upon condition, that if the victory fell to the Scottiſh King, the Earl ſhould deliver for his Ranſom the Town of Berwick: Whereunto the Earl made anſwer, that the Town of Berwick was the King his Maſters, and therefore not for him to diſpoſe of; but for his offer of ſingle Combat, he willingly accepted it, and thought himſelf highly honoured by ſuch a match: But King James of Scotland had no meaning to perform either one or other, but privily in the night fled back into Scotland, and then the Earl returned to Berwick. In the mean time, one Peter Hyalas, a man of great learning and policy, was ſent Ambaſſadour to the King of Scots, from the King of Spain, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings of England and Scotland; who finding the King of Scots conformable to his motion, found after the King of England (who was never averſe from Peace upon honourable conditions) no leſs inclining to it: and ſo a Truce was concluded for certain years; upon condition, that Perkin Warbeck ſhonld be ſent out of the Scottiſh Dominions.

A Truce between King Henry and the King of Scots.

About this time the Lord Camphyre, and others ſent from Philip Archduke of Auſtria and Duke of Burgundy, came to King Henry for a concluſion of Amity, and to procure the Engliſh Merchants reſort again to his Countrey; for King Henry ſometime before, upon diſpleaſure with the Flemings, but ſpecially with the Lady Margaret, for abetting Perkin Warbeck, not only had baniſhed all Flemiſh Wares and Merchandizes out of his Dominions, but had alſo reſtrained all Engliſh Merchants from having any Traffick in any of their Territories, cauſing the Mart for all Engliſh Commodities to be kept at Callice: but now, upon this invitation, and having found it had been a great hinderance to his own Merchant-Adventurers, and thereupon ſome Inſurrections had riſen, he willingly condeſcended to their requeſt, and ſo the Engliſh reſorted again to the Archdukes Dominions, and were received into Antwerp with general Proceſſion: ſo glad was that Town of the Engliſh mens returns.

In the eleventh year of this Kings Reign, died Cicely Dutcheſs of York, Mother to King Edward the Fourth, at her Caſtle of Berkamſtead, being of extream age; who had lived to ſee three Princes of her Body Crowned, and four Murthered: ſhe was buried at Foderingham by her Husband.

Perkin, thruſt out of Scotland, ſailed into Ireland, and from thence came into Cornwal, and there gets Forces.

Shortly after the Truce concluded between England and Scotland, Perkin Warbeck was commanded to depart out of the Scottiſh Dominions: who thereupon with his Wife and Family ſailed into Ireland: where underſtanding that the Corniſh men were ready to renew the War again, he thought beſt not to let paſs ſo fair an occaſion; and thereupon, having with him four ſmall Ships, and not above ſixſcore men, he ſailed into Cornwal, and there landed in the month of September, and came to a Town called Bodmin; where with fair words and large promiſes he ſo prevailed with the people, that he had gotten to him above three thouſand perſons to take his part; and then made Proclamations in the name of King Richard the fourth, as Son to King Edward the fourth: and, by the advice of his three Counſellors: John Heron a bankrupt Mercer, Richard Skelton a Taylor, and John Aſtley a Scrivener, determined to attempt firſt the winning of Exeter; which with great violence he aſſaulted, and the Townſmen with as great valiantneſs defended: whereof when the King heard, he ſent the Lord Dawbeny to their reſcue: but before he came, the Lord Edward Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, and the valiant Lord William his Son, accompanied with Sir Edmund Carew, Sir Thomas Trenchard, Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Halewel, Sir John Croker, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgecomb, William St. Maure, with others came to their aid: upon whoſe coming Perkin left the ſiege, and retired to Taunton; where he muſtered his men, as though he meant to prepare for Battel: but finding his number to be much diminiſhed (for of ſix thouſand which he had at Exeter, many were fled from him, when they ſaw no great ones to take his part) he began to diſtruſt his caſe; and hearing withal, that the King with a great Power was at hand, about midnight with threeſcore Horſemen in his company, he departed in poſt from Taunton, and took Sanctuary in a Town called Beauly near to Southampton. When King Henry heard that Perkin was fled, he ſent after him to the Sea ſide, to ſtop his paſſage and apprehend him: But the Meſſengers that were ſent, when they came to St. Michaels Mount, though they found not Perkin, yet there they found his wife the Lady Katherine Gourdon, whom they preſently brought to the King; a beautiful young Lady; to whom, in honour of her birth, and commiſeration of her beauty, the King allowed a competent maintenance, which ſhe enjoyed during the Kings life, and many years after. King Henry, being come to Exeter, ſtayed there a few dayes, about examination of the Rebellion and execution of the chief Offenders: of whom there being a great multitude, and all of them craving pardon, the King cauſed them all to be aſſembled in the Church-yard of St. Peter, where they all appeared bare-headed in their ſhirts, and halters about their necks: whom the King, viewing out of a Window made for the purpoſe, after he had pauſed a while, made a ſpeech unto them, exhorting them to obedience; and then in hope they would afterward be dutiful Subjects he pardoneth them all: whereat they made a great ſhout, crying all, God ſave King Henry! though ſome of them afterward, like ungrateful wretches, fell into new Rebellions.

Followed by the Kings Forces, he takes Sanctuary at Beauly.

King Henry pardons Perkins followers.

All this while Perkin was in Sanctuary: and the King, thinking himſelf in danger as long as he was in ſafety, ſet a Guard about the place, to keep him from eſcaping; whereby Perkin was ſo reſtrained, that at laſt he ſubmitted himſelf to the Kings mercy, and was thereupon ſent to the Tower, to be there in ſafe cuſtody. This done, King Henry appointed Thomas Lord Darcy, Sir Amyas Pawlet, and Robert Sherburn Dean of Pauls, to be Commiſſioners for for making enquiry of the Offenders, and for assessing their Fines, which they did with great severity to some, with great mildness to others, to all with equity, 1499. It was now the fourteenth year of the Kings Reign, when one Sebastian Gabato, a Genouese's Son, born at Bristow, perswaded the King to man and Victual a Ship at Bristow, to search for an Island, which (he said) he knew to be replenished with rich Commodities, who setting forth with three other small Ships of London Merchants, returned home two years after, when he had made a large discovery Westward, and would have gone to Cataia, if the Mariners had not forced him to return; as likewise six years before, one Christopher Columbus a Spaniard, made the first discovery of America.

Perkin makes escape out of the Tower.

Perkin being in the Tower and carefully guarded, yet found means to escape; and fled to the Priory of Sheen near Richmond; where discovering himself to the Prior of that Monastery, he begged of him for Gods sake, to get the Kings Pardon for his life; which the Prior effected: but then was Perkin brought to the Court at Westminster, and was one day set fettered in a pair of Stocks before Westminster-Hall, and there stood a whole day; the next day he was set upon a like Scaffold in Cheap-side, and there standing the whole day also, he then read openly his Confession, written with his own hand; wherein he declared his Parentage, and the place of his Birth, and all the passages of his Life, and by what means he was drawn to make this attempt. After this, he was committed again to the Tower, and care taken he should be better looked to than he was before. But all the care notwithstanding once again Perkin attempted to escape, and drawing into a Confederacy with him the young Earl of Warwick; by fair words and large promises so corrupted his Keepers, Strangwish, Blewet, Astwood, and long Roger, Servants to Sir John Digby Lieutenant of the Tower, that they intended to have slain their Master, and set Perkin and the Earl of Warwick at liberty: But this practice was soon discovered, so that Perkin and John a water, sometime Mayor of Cork in Ireland, one of Perkins chief Founders, were on the sixteenth day of November arraigned at Westminster and condemned, and both of them on the two and twentieth day were drawn to Tyburn and there hanged; where Perkin took it upon his death, that the Confession he had formerly made was true: soon after also Blewet and Astwood, two of the Lieutenants men, were in the same place executed. On the one and twentieth day of the same month, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick was arraigned at Westminster before the Earl of Oxford, then High Steward of England; not for consenting to break Prison, but for conspiring with Perkin to raise Sedition, and destroy the King; and, upon his confession, had Judgement, and on the eight and twentieth day of the same month, in the year 1499. was brought to to the Scaffold on the Tower-hill, and there beheaded. This Earl of Warwick was the eldest Son of the Duke of Clarence, and was the last Heir-male of the name of Plantagenet, and had been kept in the Tower from his very infancy out of all company of Men and sight of Beasts; so as he scarcely knew a Hen from a Goose, nor one Beast from another; and therefore could never know how to practise his escape of himself, but by Perkins subtlety: for which cause the King favoured him so far, that he was not buried in the Tower, but at Bissam by his Ancestors. And thus ended the designs of Perkin Warbeck, which had troubled both the Kingdom and the King, the space of seven or eight years, a great part of the Kings Reign.

Submits himself again, and is again sent to the Tower.

Perkin attempting again to escape, is hanged at Tyburn.

Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick for plotting with Perkin is beheaded.

But in the time of Perkin's being in the Tower, another like practice was set on foot; for an Augustine Frier called Patrick, in the County of Suffolk, having a Scholar named Ralph Wilford, a Cordwayners Son, he caused him to take upon him to be the Earl of Warwick, lately by great chance gotten out of the Tower; and they going together into Kent, when the Frier perceived some light credit to be given to him, he then stuck not to declare it openly in the Pulpit, desiring all men to assist him. But this practice was soon discovered, and both the Master and the Scholar were apprehended and attainted; the Scholar Wilford was hanged on Shrovetuesday at S. Thomas Waterings, and the Frier was condemned to perpetual Prison: for at that time so much reverence was attributed to Holy Orders, that a Priest, though he had committed Treason against the King, yet had his life spared: And this practice was some cause to exasperate the King against the Earl of Warwick, who though innocent in himself, yet was nocent in pretenders: and besides King Ferdinand of Spain, with whom at this time there was a Treaty for marriage of his Daughter to Prince Arthur, had written to the King in plain terms, that he saw no assurance of his Sons succession, as long as the Earl of Warwick lived; and thus all things unfortunately concurred to bring this innocent Prince to his end.

Another practice to set up one Ralph Wilford, to be the Earl of Warwick.

But the practice discovered, and Wilford hanged.

1500. In the fifteenth year of his Reign, partly to avoid the danger of the Plague, then reigning in England; but chiefly to confer with the Duke of Burgoigne about many important businesses: the King and Queen sailed over to Callice, where at an enterview between him and the Duke, at St. Peters Church without Callice, the Duke offered to hold the Kings Stirrup at his alighting, which the King by no means would permit; but descending from Horse-back, they embraced with great affection: and after Communication between them, the King and Queen in the end of June returned into England.

King Henry sails to Callice to confer with the Duke of Burgoigne.

1502. In his seventeenth year, two great Marriages were solemnized: the Lady Katharine of Spain was sent by her Father King Ferdinand, with a puissant Army of Ships into England; where she arrived at Plimouth, the second day of October; and, on the fourteenth of November after, was espoused openly to Prince Arthur, both being clad in white; he of the age of fifteen years, she of eighteen: at night they were laid together in one Bed, where they lay as Man and Wife all that night: when morning appeared, the Prince (as his Servants about him reported) called for drink, which before time he had not used to do; whereof one of his Chamberlains asking him the cause, he answered merrily, saying, I have been this night in the midst of Spain, which is a hot Countrey, and that Prince Arthur espouseth the Lady Katharine of Spain: and lie together all night.

that makes me ſo dry: though ſome write, that a grave Matron was laid in Bed between them, to hinder actual Conſummation. The Ladies portion was two hundred thouſand Duckets; her joynture the third part of the principality of Wales, Cornwal, and Cheſter. At this Marriage was great ſolemnity and Royal Juſtings: during which time there came into London an Earl, a Biſhop, and divers other Noble Perſonages ſent from the King of Scots for a concluſion of Marriage (before treated of) between the Lady Margaret the Kings eldeſt Daughter, and him; where the Earl, by Proxy in the name of King James his Maſter, affianced and contracted the ſaid Lady, which Contract was publiſhed at Pauls Croſs, the day of the Converſion of Saint Paul; for joy whereof, Te Deum was ſung, and great fires were made through the City of London; and if ſuch joy were made when the match was made, what joy ſhould be made now at the iſſue of the Match, when by the Union of thoſe perſons is made an Union of theſe Kingdoms; and England and Scotland are but one great Britain? The Ladies portion was ten thouſand pounds, her joynture two thouſand pounds a year, after King James his death; and in preſent one thouſand. When this Match was propounded at the Council Table, ſome Lords oppoſed it; objecting, that by this means the Crown of England might happen to come to the Scottiſh Nation. To which King Henry anſwered, What if it ſhould? It would not be an acceſſion of England to Scotland, but of Scotland to England: and this anſwer of the King paſſed for an Oracle: and ſo the Match proceeded, and in Auguſt following was conſummate at Edenburgh, and ſhe conducted thither in great ſtate by the Earl of Northumberland.

The King of Scots marries the Lady Margaret, King Henry's eldeſt daughter.

Prince Arthur after his marriage, was ſent again into Wales, to keep that Countrey in good order; to whom were appointed for Counſellers, Sir Richard Pool his Kinſman and chief Chamberlain, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir Richard Crofts, Sir David Philips, Sir William Vdal, Sir Thomas Engleſield, Sir Peter Newton, John Walleſton, Henry Marton, and Doctor William Smith Preſident of his Council; but within five months after his marriage, at his Caſtle at Ludlow, he deceaſed, and with great ſolemnity was buried at the Cathedral Church at Worceſter. His Brother Henry Duke of York was ſtayed from the Title of Prince of Wales, the ſpace of half a year, till to women it might appear, whether the Lady Katherine, the Relict of Prince Arthur, was with childe or no. The towardlineſs in learning of this Prince Arthur is very memorable; who dying before the age of ſixteen years, was ſaid to have read over all or moſt of the Latin Authors, beſides many other.

Prince Arthur within five months after his marriage dieth.

His towardlineſs in learning.

And now Prince Arthur being dead, and the Lady Katherine of Spain left a young Widow; King Henry loth to part with her Dowry, but chiefly being deſirous to continue the Alliance with Spain; prevailed with his other Son Prince Henry, though with ſome reluctation, ſuch as could be in thoſe years (for he was ſcarce twelve years of age) to be contracted with the Princeſs Katherine his Brothers Widow; for which marriage, a diſpenſation, by advice of the moſt learned men at that time in Chriſtendom, was by Pope Julius the ſecond granted, and on the five and twentieth day of June, in the Biſhop of Saliſbury's houſe in Fleet-ſtreet, the marriage was ſolemnized.

Prince Henry not above twelve years old is contracted to the Lady Katharine his Brothers Widow, by diſpenſation from the pope.

A little before this time Edmund de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Son to John Duke of Suffolk and Lady Elizabeth Siſter to King Edward the fourth, had in his fury killed a mean perſon, and was thereupon indicted of Murther; for which although he had the Kings Pardon, yet becauſe he was brought to the Kings Bench-Bar, and there arraigned, he took it for ſo great a blemiſh to his Honour, that in great rage he fled into Flanders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret; where having ſtayed a while, when his paſſion was over, he returned again. But after the marriage between Prince Arthur and the Lady Katherine, whether it were that in that ſolemnity he had run himſelf in debt, or whether he were drawn to do ſo by the Lady Margaret, he paſſed over the ſecond time, with his Brother Richard into Flanders. This put the King into ſome doubt of his intention; whereupon he hath recourſe to his uſual courſe in ſuch caſes, and ſent Sir Robert Curſon Captain of Hammes Caſtle, to feign himſelf one of that Conſpiracy, thereby to learn the depth of their intentions: And to take away all ſuſpicion of his employment, the firſt Sunday of November, he cauſed the ſaid Earl and Sir Robert Curſon, with five others, to be accurſed openly at Pauls Croſs, as enemies to him and his Realm. In concluſion, Sir Robert Curſon acquainted the King with divers of that faction; amongſt whom, William Lord Courtney, and William de la Pool, , Brother to the foreſaid Earl of Suffolk, who were taken but upon ſuſpicion, yet held long in Priſon: but Sir James Tyrrel (the ſame that had murdered the two young Princes in the Tower) and Sir John Windham, who were proved to be Traytors, were accordingly attainted, and on the ſixth day of May at the Tower-hill beheaded. Whereof when the Earl heard, deſpairing now of any good ſucceſs, he wandered about all Germany and France, where finding no ſuccour, he ſubmitted himſelf at laſt to Philip Duke of Auſtria, by whom afterward he was delivered to King Henry, by this occaſion: Ferdinand King of Aragon, by his Wife Iſabella Queen of Caſtile, had only two Daughters, the eldeſt whereof named Jone, was married to this Philip Duke of Auſtria; the younger named Katharine to Arthur Prince of England: and now Queen Iſabella being lately dead, by whoſe death the Kingdom of Caſtile deſcended in Right of his Wife, to this Duke Philip; they were ſailed out of Germany into Spain, to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom; but by tempeſt and contrary windes were driven upon the Coaſt of England, and landed at Weymouth in Dorſetſhire; where deſiring to refreſh themſelves a little on ſhore, they were invited by Sir Thomas Trenchard (a principal Knight in that Countrey) to his houſe, who preſently ſent word to the King of their arrival. King Henry glad to have his Court honoured by ſo great a Prince, and perhaps upon hope of a courteſie from him, which afterward he obtained; ſent preſently the Earl of Arundel to wait upon him, till himſelf might follow; follow ; and the Earl went to him in great magnificence, with a gallant Troop of three hundred Horſe, and for more ſtate came to him by Torch-light. Upon whoſe Meſſage, though King Philip had many reaſons of haſte on his Journey; yet not to give King Henry diſtaſte, and withal to give his Queen the comfort of ſeeing the Lady Katharine her Siſter; he went upon ſpeed to the Queen at Windſor, while his Queen followed by eaſie journeys. After great magnificence of entertainment, King Henry taking a fit opportunity, and drawing the King of Caſtile into a room, where they two only were private; and laying his hand civilly upon his arm, ſaid unto him, Sir, you have been ſaved upon my Coaſt; I hope you will not ſuffer me to wrack upon yours. The King of Caſtile asking him what he meant by that ſpeech? I mean it (ſaith the King) by that hare-brain'd fellow the Earl of Suffolk; who being my Subject, is protected in your Countrey, and begins to play the fool when all others are weary of it. The King of Caſtile anſwered; I had thought, Sir, your felicity had been above thoſe thoughts; but if it trouble you, I will baniſh him. King Henry replied, that his deſire was to have him delivered to him: with this the King of Caſtile a little confuſed, ſaid, That can I not do with my Honour: Well then (ſaid the King) the matter is at an end: at laſt the King of Caſtile, who held King Henry in great eſtimation, compoſing his countenance, ſaid, Sir, you ſhall have him; but upon your Honour, you ſhall not take his life. I promiſe it upon my Honour, ſaid King Henry; and he kept his promiſe, for he was not put to death during all his Reign; but yet he took ſuch order, that in the Reign of his Son King Henry the Eighth, he had his head cut off. During the King of Caſtiles being here, a Treaty was concluded and bears date at Windſor; which the Flemings term Intercurſus malus, for that the free Fiſhing of the Dutch upon the Coaſts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Undecimo, was not by his Treaty confirmed, as all other Articles were. And now when King Henry had received the King of Caſtile into the Fraternity of the Garter, and had his Son Prince Henry admitted to the Order of the Golden-fleece; and that the Earl of Suffolk was brought over and committed to the Tower, the King of Caſtile departed home.

Two Calls of Serjeants at Law.

In this Kings time were two Calls of Serjeants at Law; one in his eleventh year, in which were called nine Serjeants, Mordant, Higham, Kingeſmil, Conisby, Butler, Taxely, Fromick, Oxenbridge, and Conſtable; who kept their Feaſt at the Biſhop of Ely's Palace in Holborn, where the King, the Queen, and all the chief Lords dined. The other Call in his twentieth year, in which were called ſeven Serjeants, Robert Brudnel, William Grevil, Thomas Marow, George Edgore, Lewis Pollard, Guy Palmes, and William Fairfax; who kept their Feaſt at the Archbiſhops Houſe in Lambeth.

King Henry having gotten as much honour as the eſtimation of neighbouring Princes could give him, began now to be intentive to getting of wealth; wherein he quickly found Inſtruments fit for his purpoſe, but eſpecially two, Empſon and Dudley, both Lawyers, and both of them Barons of the Exchequer; Dudley of a goodly Family, but Empſon the Son of a Sieve-maker. Theſe two perſons being put in Authority, turned Law and Juſtice into Rapine. For firſt, their manner was, to cauſe divers Subjects to be indicted of Crimes, and then preſently to commit them; and not produce them to their anſwer, but ſuffer them to languiſh long in priſon; and by ſundry Artificial devices and terror, extort from them great Fines, which they termed Compoſitions and Mitigations. Neither did they (towards the end) obſerve ſo much as the half face of Juſtice, in proceeding by Indictment; but ſent forth their Precepts to attach men, and convent them before themſelves and ſome others at their private houſes, and there uſed to ſhuffle up a Summary proceeding by examination, without trial of Jury; aſſuming to themſelves, to deal both in Pleas of the Crown, and controverſies Civil. Then did they alſo uſe to inthral and charge the Subjects Land with Tenures in Capite, by finding falſe Offices; refuſing upon divers pretexts and delayes, to admit men to traverſe thoſe falſe Offices, as by Law they might. Nay the Kings Wards, after they had accompliſhed their full age, could not be ſuffered to have livery of their Lands, without paying exceſſive Fines, far exceeding all reaſonable rates. When men were out-lawed in perſonal actions. they would not permit them to purchaſe their Charters of Pardon, except they paid great and intolerable ſummes; ſtanding upon the ſtrict point of Law, which upon Outlawries gives forfeiture of goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of mens Lands and Rents during the ſpace of full two years, for a Pain in caſe of Outlawry. They would alſo ruffle with Jurors, and enforce them to finde as they would direct; and if they did not, then convent, impriſon, and fine them. Theſe and many other courſes they had of preying upon the people: but their principal working was upon Penal Statutes; wherein they conſidered not whether the Law was obſolete, or in uſe; and had ever a rabble of Promotors and leading Jurors at their command, ſo as they could have any thing found, either for fact or valuation. There remaineth to this day a report, that King Henry was on a time entertained very ſumptuouſly by the Earl of Oxford, at his Caſtle of Heningham: and at the Kings going away, the Earls Servants ſtood in their Livery-coats with Cogniſances, ranged on both ſides, to make the King a lane: Whereupon the King called the Earl to him, and ſaid, My Lord, I have heard much of your Hoſpitality, but I ſee it is greater than is ſpoken; theſe handſome Gentlemen and Yeomen whom I ſee on both ſides of me, are ſure your Menial Servants. At which the Earl ſmiled, and ſaid, It may pleaſe your Grace, That were not for mine eaſe; they are moſt of them my Retainers, and are come to do me ſervice at ſuch a time as this, and chiefly to ſee your Grace. Whereat the King ſtarted a little, and ſaid; By my faith (my Lord) I thank you for my good chear; but I may not endure to have my Laws broken in my ſight: my Attorney torney must speak with you about it. And it is part of the Report, that it cost the Earl for a composition, fifteen thousand Marks. And to shew further the Kings extream diligence: I remember (saith Sir Francis Bacon Lord of Verulam in his History) to have seen long since a Book of accompt of Empsons, that had the Kings hand almost to every leaf, by way of singing: and was in some places postilled in the Margent with the Kings own hand likewise, where was this remembrance:

Item, received of such a one five Marks for the Pardon to be procured, and if the Pardon do not pass, the money to be repaid, except the Party be some other way satisfied.

And over against this Memorandum (of the Kings own hand) Otherwise satisfied. This (saith he) I do the rather mention, because it shews in the King a nearness, but yet with a kinde of justness.

1508. In his three and twentieth year, there was a sharp prosecution against Sir William Capel, now the second time, for mis-government in his majoralty: The great matter was, that in some payments he had taken notice of false moneys, and did not his diligence to examine who were the Offenders: for which, and some other things laid to his charge, he was condemned to pay two thousand pounds, whereof, being a man of stomach, he refused to pay a farthing; and thereupon was sent to the Tower, where he remained until the Kings death. Knesworth likewise, that had been lately Mayor of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for abuses in their Offices questioned and imprisoned, and not delivered but upon payment of one thousand four hundred pounds, Sir Lawrence Ailmer, who had likewise been Mayor of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of one thousand pounds; and Sir Lawrence for refusing to pay it, was committed to prison, where he stayed till Empson himself was committed in his place. By these courses he accumulated so great store of Treasure, that he left at his death, most of it in secret places, under his own key, and keeping at Richmond (as is reported) the sum of near 18. hundred thousand pounds sterling. But though by this course he got great store of Treasure; yet by it he lost the best treasure (the peoples hearts) but that he something qualified it by his last Testament, commanding that Restitution should be made of all such monies as had unjustly been levied by his Officers.

King Henry at his death leaves eighteen hundred thousand pounds in ready money.

It seems King Henry, after the death of his Queen the Lady Elizabeth, had an inclination to marry again; and hearing of the great beauty and vertue of the young Queen of Naples, the Widow of Ferdinando the younger; he sent three confident persons, Francis Marsin, James Braybrook, and John Stile, to make two inquiries; one of her person and conditions, the other of her estate: Who returning their answer, that they found her Beauty and Vertues to be great, but her Estate to be only a certain Pension or Exhibition, and not the Kingdom of Naples, as he expected: he then gave over any further medling in that matter. After this, another Treaty of Marriage was propounded to the King, between him and the Lady Margaret Dutchess Dowager of Savoy, only daughter to Maximilian, and Sister to the King of Castile; a Lady wise and of great fame: In which business was imployed, for his first piece, the Kings then Chaplain, and after the great Prelate, Thomas Woolsey. It was in the end concluded, with ample conditions for the King, but with the promise de Futuro only. Which marriage was protracted from time to time, in respect of the infirmity of the King: which held him by fits till he died.

King Henry had concluded to marry the Lady Margaret Dutchess Dowager of Savoy: but protracted by reason of his Infirmity.

King Henry's Executors.

He left Executors, Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, Richard Fitz-James, Bishop of London, Thomas Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Rochester, Thomas Duke of Norfolk and Treasurer of England, Edward Earl of Worcester and Lord Chamberlain, John F. Knight, chief Justice of the Kings Bench, and Robert R. Knight, chief Justice of the Common Pleas. A little before his death, he had concluded a Marriage (in which negotiation Fox Bishop of Winchester was imployed) between his younger Daughter the Lady Mary, of the age of ten years, and Charles King of Castile, not much elder: but though concluded, yet not solemnized; and she was afterward married to Lewis the French King.

Of his Taxations.

IN his third year, there was by Parliament granted toward the maintaining an Army in Britain; that every man should pay the tenth peny of his Goods: which Tax though at first withstood in Yorkshire and Durham, yet was afterward levied to the uttermost. In his seventh year, towards his Wars in France, a Benevolence was by Parliament granted, by which great summes of money were collected of the richer sort only. In his eleventh year, a Subsidy of sixscore thousand pounds was granted him by Parliament, towards his Wars with Scotland, which caused afterward the insurrection in Cornwal. In his nineteenth year a Subsidy was granted him by Parliament. In his one and twentieth year, he raised great summes of money from Offenders against Penal Statutes: the greatest, but the unjustest way for raising of money, that ever any King of England used; and not content with this, he required, and had at the same a benevolence both from the Clergy and Laity. To the Clergy was imployed Richard Fox, then Bishop of Winchester; who assembling the Clergy before him, exhorted them to be liberal in their contribution; but the Clergy being of two sorts, rich and poor, made each of them several excuses: The rich and such as had great livings, said, they were at great charges in keeping Hospitality, and maintaining their Families; and therefore desired to be spared. The poor sort alledged, that their means were small, and scarce able to finde them necessaries, and therefore desired to be forborn. But the Bishop answered them both with a pretty Dilemma, saying to the rich, It is true, you live at great charges in Hospitality, in apparel, and other demonstrations of your wealth; and seeing you have store to spend in that order, there is no reason but for your Princes service you should do it much more, and therefore you must pay. To the poorer sort he said, though your livings be small, yet your frugality is great, and you spend not in house-keeping and apparel as others do; therefore be content, for you shall pay.

Bishop Fox's Dilemma to draw the Clergy to contribute to the King.

Of

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

Yeomen of the Guard when firſt ordained.

THis King was the firſt that ordained a company of tall ſtrong men,(naming them Yeomen of the Guard)to be attending about the perſon of the King; to whom he appointed a Livery by which to be known, and a Captain by whom to be choſen. In his time the authority of the Star-Chamber, which ſubſiſted before by the Common Laws of the Realm, was confirmed in certain caſes by Act of Parliament. In his time were made theſe excellent general Laws: One, that from thenceforth fines ſhould be final, and conclude all ſtrangers rights: Another for admiſſion of poor ſuitors, In formâ pauperis, without paying Fee to Counſellor, Atturney, or Clerk. Another, that no perſon that did aſſiſt by Arms or otherwiſe the King for the time being, ſhould after be Impeached therefore, or Attainted either by courſe of the Law, or by Act of Parliament; and that if any ſuch Act of Attainder did happen to be made, it ſhould be void, and of none effect. Another for the Benevolence, to make the ſummes which any had agreed to pay, and were not brought in, to be leviable by courſe of Law. Another, that Murtherers ſhould be burnt on the Brawn of the left hand, with the Letter M. and Thieves with the Letter T. ſo that if they offended the ſecond time, they ſhould have no mercy, but be put to death; and this to reach alſo to Clerks Convict. In his fifth year, it was ordained by Parliament, that the Mayors of London ſhould have Conſervation of the River of Thames, from the Bridge of Stanes to the waters of Yendale and Medway. In his ſeventeenth John Shaw Mayor of London cauſed his Brethren the Aldermen to ride from the Guild-hall to the water ſide when he went to Weſtminſter to be preſented in the Excheqner: he alſo cauſed the Kitchins and other houſes of Office to be builded at the Guild-hall; where ſince that time the Mayors Feaſt hath been kept, which before had been in the Grocers or Taylors Hall. In his eighteenth year King Henry being himſelf a Brother of the Taylors Company, as divers Kings before had been, namely, Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henry the ſixth, Henry the fifth, Henry the fourth, and Richard the ſecond; alſo of Dukes 1 1, Earls 28. Lords 48. he now gave to them the Name and Title of Merchant Taylors, as a name of worſhip to endure for ever:

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the tenth year of his Reign, Jone Boughton Widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certain opinions of John Wickliffe. In his ſeventh year, King Henry, finding great inconvenience by the priviledge of Sanctuaries, wrote to Pope Alexander, deſiring him by his authority, to adjudge all Engliſh men being fled to Sanctuary for the offence of Treaſon, to be enemies to the Chriſtian Faith; and to prohibit the priviledge of Sanctuary to all ſuch as once had enjoyed it before: which requeſt the Pope granted, to the great contentment of the King, and quiet of the Realm. In his ſixteenth year, being the year 1500. a Jubilee in Rome was celebrated; whereof Alexander the then Pope, by his Meſſenger Gaſpar Pons a Spaniard, gave notice to the King, offering withal, that thoſe who could not come to Rome, ſhould notwithſtanding at a certain price have Pardons, and as full a benefit of the Jubilee, as if they came; and to the end the King ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, both offered part of his gains to the King, and alſo promiſed to beſtow it upon a War againſt the Turk; by which courſe he gathered great ſummes, for which he had other uſe than to ſpend it ſo idely. In the two and twentieth year of this King, Pope Alexander the ſixth died of Poyſon, by this accident: He went to ſupper in a Vineyard near the Vatican, where his Son Valentinois meaning to poyſon Adrian Cardinal of Cornetta, ſent thither certain flaggons of Wine infected with Poyſon, and delivered them to a ſervant of his, who knew nothing of the matter; commanding him, that none ſhould touch them, but by his appointment: It happened, the Pope coming in ſomething before Supper, and being very dry through the immoderate heat of the ſeaſon, called for drink, his own proviſion being not yet come: The ſervant that had the poyſoned Wine in keeping, thinking it to be committed to him as a ſpecial Wine, brought of it to the Pope; and while he was drinking, his Son Valentinois came in, and drank alſo of the ſame; whereby they were both poyſoned; but the Pope only overcome of the Poyſon, died: his Son by the ſtrength of youth bare it out, though with long languiſhing.

Works of Piety and other Structures by him, and others

THis King Magnificently enlarged Greenwich, which Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter had formerly builded, calling it Placentia. In his ſixteenth year, he new builded his Mannor of Sheen, and named it Richmond: He alſo new builded Baynards Caſtle in London. In his two and twentieth year, he finiſhed the goodly Hoſpital of the Savoy near Charing-croſs, to which he gave Lands for the relieving of two hundred poor people. This was firſt called Savoy-place, built by Peter Earl of Savoy, Father to Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, about the nine and twentieth year of Henry the third, who made the ſaid Peter Earl of Richmond. The houſe belonged ſince to the Duke of Lancaſter; and at this time was converted to an Hoſpital, retaining ſtill the firſt name of the Savoy. In this Kings time, John Morton being Biſhop of Ely, beſtowed great coſt upon his houſe at Hatfield in Hartfordſhire, now the houſe of the Right Honourable the Earl of Salisbury; and at Wesbich Caſtle in Cambridgeſhire, a houſe belonging to that See; all the Brick building was of his charge: Being afterward Biſhop of Canterbury, he beſtowed great ſummes in repairing and augmenting his houſes at Maidſtone, Alington-Park, Charing, Ford, Lambeth, and ſpecially at Knoll in Kent, where he died. King Henry alſo builded three houſes of Franciſcan-Friers, which are alled Obſervants; one at Richmond, another at Greenwich, a third at Newark; and three other of Franciſcan-Friers, which are called Conventuals, one at Canterbury another at Newcaſtle, and a third at Southampton. And drawing near his end, he did theſe works of Charity: He granted a general Pardon to all men, for any offence committed againſt any of his Laws, Thieves, and Murtherers only excepted: He paid alſo all Fees of all Priſoners in all Goals in and about London, abiding there for that cauſe only: He paid alſo the Debts of all ſuch perſons as lay in the Counters or Ludgate for forty ſhillings or under, and ſome alſo for ten pounds. In his eighteenth year, the Chappel of our Lady, above the Eaſt-ſide of the High Altar at Weſtminſter Church, with a Tavern called the White-Roſe near adjoyning, was taken down, in which place a moſt beautiful Chappel was then preſently begun to be builded by King Henry; the charges whereof amounted to the ſumme of fourteen thouſand pounds (as Stow witneſſeth.) In his ſecond year, the great Conduit in Cheapſide at the charges of Thomas Ilam Alderman of London, was new made; and the Croſs alſo in Cheapſide was new builded; towards the charges whereof Thomas Fiſher Mercer gave five hundred Marks. In his ſeventh year, the Conduit in Grace-ſtreet was begun to be builded by the Executors of Sir Thomas Hill Grocer, late Mayor of London. Alſo this year, Hugh Clapton Mayor of London, builded the great Bridge of Stratford upon Avon; as likewiſe a fair Chappel toward the South-end of that Town; and near unto the ſame, a pretty houſe of Brick and Timber, where he lay and ended his life: He glazed alſo the Chancel of the Pariſh Church in that Town; and made a way of four miles long, three miles from Aliſbury towards London, and one mile beyond Aliſbury. In his tenth year, John Tate Mayor of London, builded the Church of St. Anthonies with a Free-School, and certain Alms-houſes for poor men. In his time his Mother the Lady Margaret Counteſs of Richmond builded two Colledges in Cambridge, one called Chriſts Colledge, the other St. Johns; and endowed them with large poſſeſſions, for the maintenance of learning. Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, founded Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Oxford, and William Smith Biſhop of Lincoln, Brazen-noſe Colledge: He alſo builded at Lichfield an Hoſpital, for a Maſter, two Prieſts, and ten poor men; as likewiſe a Free-School, with a School-Maſter, and an Uſher. Anne Aveling gave an hundred Marks towards the building of the Church in Ciceſter. In his time alſo John Alcock Biſhop of Ely, builded Jeſus Colledge in Cambridge: and in his two and twentieth year Tho. Kneſworth Mayor of London builded the Conduit at Biſhopſgate at his own charge; and gave to the Fiſhmongers certain Tenements; for which they are bound to allow to four Scholars, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, to each of them four pounds a year: alſo to poor people and Priſoners in Ludgate ſomething yearly. In his twentieth year, Sir William Capel Mayor of London, cauſed all Hounſditch to be paved over; which till that time, had lien very noyouſly to all travellers that way. In his fourteenth year, all the Gardens without Moor-gate (which had continued time out of minde) were deſtroyed; and of them was made a plain Field, for Archers to ſhoot in. In this Kings time alſo, Thomas Savage Archbiſhop of York, repaired the Caſtle of Cawood, and the Mannor of Scroby, and founded the Chappel at Maclesfield in Cheſhire, where he was born. Alſo in his time Stephen Gennings, Mayor of London, founded a Free Grammar School at Wolverhampton in Staffordſhire, where he was born; and gave Lands ſufficient for a Maſter and an Uſher, leaving the overſight to the Merchant Taylors in London. This Town of Wolverhampton, commonly ſo called, is originally and rightly called Wilfrune-hampton, upon this occaſion. The Town was anciently called Hampton, to which a noble Woman named Wilfrune, a Widow, ſometime Wife of Athelm Duke of Northampton, obtained of King Ethelred, to give Lands to the Church there which ſhe had founded; and thereupon the Town took the addition of the ſaid Wilfrune. In this Kings time alſo John Colet Dean of Pauls, founded Pauls School in the Church-yard there.

The Savoy made an Hoſpital.

The Croſs in Cheapſide new builded.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his firſt year, happened the Sickneſs called the Sweating Sickneſs; which though it continued not long, yet took away many thouſands: and in his two and twentieth year, the like Sweating Sickneſs happened again; but, by reaſon of Remedies found in the former, took away fewer.

Two Sweating Sickneſſes.

In his ſecond year Wheat was ſold for three ſhillings the Quarter; Bay-ſalt at the like price: In his ſeventh year Wheat was ſold at London for twenty pence the Buſhel, which was counted a great dearth. In his tenth year, Wheat was ſold at London for ſix pence the Buſhel, Bay ſalt for three pence half-peny, Nantwich Salt for ſix pence, white Herrings nine ſhillings the Barrel, red Herrings three ſhillings the Cade, red Sprats ſix pence the Cade, and Gaſcoigne Wines for ſix pounds the Tun. In his fifteenth year Gaſcoigne Wine was ſold at London for forty ſhillings the Tun, a Quarter of Wheat four ſhillings, and Bay-ſalt four pence the Buſhel.

The price of Corn and other things in his time.

The two and twentieth of Auguſt 1485. the very day that King Henry got the Victory of King Richard; a great fire was in Bread-ſtreet in London, in which was burnt the Parſon of St. Mildreds, and one other man in the Parſonage there.

In his tenth year, in digging a new Foundation in the Church of St. Mary Hill in London, the body of Alice Hackney, which had been buried in the Church a hundred ſeventy five years before, was found whole of ſkin, and the joynts of her Arms pliable, which Corps was kept above ground four dayes, without annoyance, and then again buried.

A dead body found whole of ſkin above a hundred years after it was buried.

In his twelfth year, on Bartholomew day, at the Town of St. Needs in Bedfordſhire there fell Hail-ſtones that were meaſured eighteen Inches about.

Hail-ſtones 18. inches about.

In his thirteenth year, on the one and twentieth of December, ſuddenly in the night brake out a fire in the Kings Lodgings, being then at his Mannor of Sheen; by violence whereof a great part of the old Building was burnt, with Hangings, Beds, Apparel, Plate, and many Jewels. In his fifteenth year, the Town of Brabam in Nor-

Norfolk was burnt: alſo this year, a great Plague happened, whereof many people died in many places, but ſpecially in London, where there died in that year thirty thouſand.

In his twentieth year, Alum which for many years had been ſold for ſix ſhillings a hundred, roſe to five Nobles a hundred, and after to four Marks.

In his two and twentieth year the City of Norwich was well-near conſumed with fire. Alſo in the ſame year, in July, a Gallery new builded at Richmond, wherein the King and the Prince his Son had walked not an hour before, fell ſuddenly down, yet no man hurt.

The great Tempeſt which drave King Philip into England, blew down the Golden Eagle from the Spire of Pauls; and in the fall, it fell upon a ſign of the black Eagle, which was in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where the School-houſe now ſtandeth; and battered it and brake it down. This the people interpreted to be an ominous Prognoſtick upon the Imperial Houſe; as indeed it proved: for this King Philip being the Emperours Son, arriving in Spain, ſickned ſoon after; and being but thirty years of age, deceaſed: upon whoſe deceaſe his Wife Queen Jone, out of her tender love to him, fell diſtracted of her Wits.

Of his Wife and Children,

HE married Elizabeth eldeſt Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, being of the age of nineteen years; whom two years after his Marriage he cauſed to be Crowned: She lived his Wife eighteen years, and died in Childbed in the Tower of London, the eleventh of February, the very day in which ſhe was born; and is buried at Weſtminſter, in the magnificent Chappel and rich Monument of Copper and Gilt, which her Husband had erected. He had Iſſue by her three Sons and four Daughters: his eldeſt Son Arthur was born at Wincheſter, the twentieth day of September, in the ſecond year of his Reign, and died at Ludlow, at fifteen years old and a half: and of this ſhort life ſome cauſe may be attributed to his Nativity, being born in the eighth month after conception: He was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Maries in Worceſter, where in the South-ſide of the Quire he lies entombed in Touch or Jet, without any remembrance of him by Picture. His ſecond Son Henry was born at Greenwich in Kent, on the two and twentieth day of June, in the ſeventh year of his Fathers Reign; and ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. His third Son Edmund was born in the tenth year of his Fathers Reign, and died at five years of age, at Biſhops Hatfield, and lies buried at St. Peters in Weſtminſter. His eldeſt Daughter Margaret was born the nine and twentieth day of November, the fifth year of her Fathers Reign; and at fourteen years of age was married to James the fourth King of Scotland; unto whom ſhe bare three Sons, James the fifth, Arthur, and Alexander, and one Daughter, which three laſt died all of them young; and after the death of her Husband King James, (ſlain at Flodden-field in fight againſt the Engliſh) ſhe was re-married to Archibald Dowglaſs Earl of Angus, in the year 1514. to whom ſhe bare Margaret, eſpouſed to Matthew Earl of Lenox Father of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine months, and lieth interred in the upper end of the Chancel in the Pariſh Church of Stepney near London: Her ſecond Son was Henry Lord Dernly, reputed for Perſonage the goodlieſt Gentleman of Europe; who married Mary Queen of Scotland, the Royal Parents of the moſt Royal Monarch James the firſt, King of Great Britain. Her third Son was Charles Earl of Lenox, Father to the Lady Arbella. King Henry's ſecond Daughter the Lady Elizabeth was born in the year 1492. at three years of age died, and was buried at Weſtminſter: His third Daughter the Lady Mary had been promiſed to Charles King of Caſtile; but was married to Lewis the twelfth, King of France; who dying three months after, ſhe was then married to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk: His fourth Daughter, the Lady Katherine was born in the year 1503. in the eighteenth year of her Fathers Reign, and died an Infant.

Queen Elizabeth died the very day in which ſhe was born.

Births in the eighth month not long lived.

Margaret Queen of Scots her Iſſue.

The Lady Arbella's Parentage.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions:

HE was of Body lean and ſpare, yet of great ſtrength; of ſtature ſomewhat higher than the common ſort, his eyes gray, his hair thin, of a fair complexion, and pleaſing countenance. Concerning his Conditions, he had in him the vertue of a Prince, and of a private man; affable, yet reſerved. We might ſay he was Politick, if not rather that he was Wiſe: for though he uſed tricks of Cunning ſometimes, yet ſolid Circumſpection more. He loved not War, but in caſe of neceſſity; alwayes Peace, but with conditions of Honour. Never any Prince was leſs addicted to bodily pleaſures of any kinde, than he. Three pleaſures he had, but in three caſes; one for Safety, another for Honour, and the third for Wealth: in all which he attained his end. His great reſpect of the Church was ſeen by his great employment of Church-men; for through the hands of Biſhop Morton, Biſhop Fox, and his Chaplain Urſewick, the greateſt part of all his Negotiations paſſed. He was frugal from his Youth, not covetous, till ancient and ſickly; and therefore what defect he had in that kinde, muſt be attributed to age and weakneſs. The City of London was his Paradiſe, for what good fortune ſoever befel him, he thought he enjoyed it not, till he acquainted them with it. His Parliament was his Oracle; for in all matters of importance he would ask their advice; and he put his very Prerogative ſometimes into their hands. He was no great lover of Women; yet all his great fortune both precedent and ſubſequent came by Women; his own Title to the Crown was by a Woman; his Confirmation in the Crown was by a Woman; his tranſmiſſion of the Crown to his Poſterity, was by a Wo- Woman: The firſt by the Lady Margaret, deſcended from John of Gaunt; the ſecond by the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter of King Edward the fourth; the third by the Lady Margaret, eldeſt Daughter of himſelf King of England, and married to James the Fourth, King of Scotland; by means whereof, as he was the Prince that joyned the two Roſes in one, ſo he was the Founder of joyning the two Kingdoms in one. And laſtly, it may be ſaid of him as was ſaid by one of Auguſtus Cæſar,—— Hic vir, hic eſt, tibi quem promitti ſæpius audis: For Cadwallader laſt King of the Britains ſeven hundred years before had propheſied of him; and of later time King Henry the ſixth plainly foreſhewed him.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the two and twentieth year of his Reign, he began to be troubled with the Gout; but a defluxion alſo taking into his Breaſt, waſted his Lungs, ſo that thrice in a year, and ſpecially in the Spring, he had great fits and labours of the Ptiſick, which brought him to his end; at his Palace of Richmond, on the two and twentieth day of April in the year 1508. when he had lived two and fifty years, reigned three and twenty and eight months, being dead, and all things neceſſary for his Funeral prepared; his Corps was brought out of his privy Chamber, into the great Chamber, where it reſted three dayes; and every day had there a Dirge and Maſs ſung by a Prelate, Mitred: and from thence it was conveyed into the Hall, wherein it remained alſo three dayes, and had a like ſervice there: and ſo three dayes in the Chappel: Upon Wedneſday the ninth of May, the Corps was put into a Chariot, and over the Corps was a picture of the late King, laid on Cuſhions of Gold: and the Picture was apparelled in the Kings rich Robes, with a Crown on the head, and a Ball and Scepter in the hands: when the Chariot was thus ordered, the Kings Chaplain and a great number of Prelates ſet forward, praying; then followed all the Kings Servants in Black; then followed the Chariot, and after the Chariot nine Mourners, and on every ſide were carried Torches, to the number of ſix hundred: and in this order they came from Richmond to St. George's field: where there met with it all the Prieſts and Religious men within the City and without: The Mayor and Aldermen, with many Commoners, all clothed in Black, met with the Corps at London Bridge: and ſo the Chariot was brought throughout the City to the Cathedral of St. Paul, where the Body was taken out, and carried into the Choire, and ſet under a goodly Hearſe of Wax; where, after a ſolemn Maſs, was made a Sermon by the Biſhop of Rocheſter: The next day the Corps in like manner was removed to Weſtminſter; Sir Edward Howard bearing the Kings Banner. In Weſtminſter was a curious Hearſe full of Lights, which were lighted at the coming of the Corps; and then was the Corps taken out of the Chariot by ſix Lords, and ſet under the Hearſe, which was double railed: when the Mourners were ſet, Garter, King at Arms, cried, For the ſoul of the Noble Prince Henry the ſeventh, late King of this Realm: The next day were three Maſſes ſolemnly ſung by Biſhops, and after the Maſſes was offered the Kings Banner and Courſer, his Coat of Arms, his Sword, his Target, and his Helm, and at the end of the Maſs, the Mourners offered up rich Palls of Cloth of Gold and Bodkin: and when the Choire ſang Libera me, the Body was put into the Earth; then the Lord Treaſurer, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, the Treaſurer and Comptroller of the Kings Houſhold brake their Staves, and caſt them into the Grave: Then Garter cried with a loud voice, Vive le Roy Henry le huiteſme, Roy d' Angliterre & de France, ſyre d' Irlande: And thus ended the Funeral.

Of Men of Note in his time.

OF Men of Valour and Arms, they are to be ſeen in the Hiſtory of this Kings Reign: For men of Letters in his time, of Forreigners were Sanctus Pagninus a great Hebrician; Leonicenus, Gattinaria, Cabellus and Optatus, Phyſicians; Auguſtinus Niphus, Jacobus Faber, Stapulenſis and Pighius, Philoſophers; Petrus Bembus, and the famous Clerk Reuchlin, who reſtored again the knowledge of the Hebrew Tongue. Of our own Countrey, there lived in his time, George Rippley a Carmelite Frier of Boſton, who wrote divers Treatiſes in the Mathematicks; and after his death was accounted a Necromancer; John Erghom born in York, a Black Frier, ſtudious in Prophecies, as by the Title of the works he wrote may appear. Thomas Mallorie a Welſhman, who wrote of King Arthur, and of the Round Table. John Ronſe born in Warwickſhire, a diligent ſearcher of Antiquities, and wrote divers Treatiſes of Hiſtorical Argument: Thomas Scroop ſurnamed Bradley, of the Noble Family of the Scroops, entred into divers Orders of Religion, and after withdrew himſelf to his houſe, where for twenty years he lived the life of an Anchorite; and after, coming abroad again was made a Biſhop in Ireland, and went to Rhodes in Ambaſſage; from whence being returned, he went barefooted up and down in Norfolk, teaching the Ten Commandments, and lived till near a hundred years old. John Tonneys, an Auguſtine Frier in Norwich, who wrote certain Rules of Grammar, and other things printed by Richard Pinſon. Robert Fabian a Sheriffe of London, and an Hiſtoriographer. Edmund Dudley, the ſame man whom King Henry uſed to take the forfeitures of Penal Statutes; who wrote a Book entituled Arbor Rei-publicæ. John Bockingham an excellent Schoolman: and William Blackney a Carmelite Frier, a Doctor of Divinity, and a Necromancer.

Robert Fabian lived at this time.

The REIGN of KING HENRY THE EIGHTH.

Anno Dom. 1509

KING Henry the Seventh being deceaſed, his only Son Prince Henry Heir by his Father of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and by his Mother of the Houſe of York; by unqueſtionable right ſucceeded in the Crown, at the age of eighteen years, on the two and twentieth of April, in the Year 1509. who having been trained up in the ſtudy of good Letters all his Fathers time; he governed at firſt as a man newly come from Contemplation to Action, as it were by the Book; in ſo regular and fair a manner, that as of Neroes Government, there was ſaid to be Quiquennium Neronis; ſo of this Kings, there might as juſt be ſaid, Decennium Henrici; and perhaps double ſo long a time, comparable with ſo much time of any Kings Reign, that had been before him. How he came to alter, and to alter to ſuch a degree of change as he did, we ſhall then have a fit place to ſhew, when we come to the time of his alteration. King Henry, having learned by Books, that the weight of a Kingdom is too heavy to lie upon one mans ſhoulders, if it be not ſupported by able Counſellors; made it his firſt care, to make choice of an able Council; to which he called William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Chancellour of England, Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, and Treaſurer of England, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Steward of his Houſhold, Charles Somerſet Lord Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyat, Doctor Thomas Ruthal, and Sir Edward Poynings; by advice of theſe Counſellors, his firſt Act after the care of his Fathers Funeral, was the care to perform his Fathers Will, in marrying the Lady Katherine of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which perhaps, but in reſpect of filial piety, he had not the greateſt devotion; and for relinquiſhing whereof, he might (no doubt) more eaſily have obtained a Diſpenſation from the Pope, than his Father had done, for getting it to be allowed: but obſequiouſneſs to his Fathers deſire, and reſpect to his Councils advice, ſo far prevailed with him, that he would not be Crowned, till that were performed, that one Coronation might ſerve them both: and ſo on the third day of June following, he married the ſaid Lady at the Biſhop of Saliſburies Houſe in Fleet-ſtreet; where of many great ſolemnities, I will remember but this one; that though the Bride were a Widow, yet to ſhew ſhe was a Virgin Widow, ſhe was attired all in white, and had the hair of her head hanging down behinde at the full length; and then (having made in the Tower four and twenty Knights of the Bath) two dayes after being Midſummer day, he was Crowned at Weſtminſter, together with his Queen, by the hands of William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with all circumſtances of State in ſuch caſes uſual; and then all the Nobility, Spiritual and Temporal, did him Homage; and the people being asked whether they would receive him for their King? they all with one voice, cried, Yea, Yea.

His choice of good Counſellors.

He marries the Lady Katherine the relict of his Brother Arthur.

He and his Queen Crowned.

This done, his next Act was another part of performing his Fathers Will, which was to proclaim Pardons for all Offences, (Treaſon, Murder, and Felony only excepted) and to have reſtitution made of all goods unjuſtly taken from any; and becauſe the Inſtruments of ſuch injuſtice are alwayes moſt odious, and nothing gives the people ſo much contentment, as to ſee their Perſecutors puniſhed; he therefore cauſed Empſon and Dudley, the two chief Actors of the late unjuſt proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of their inferiour Agents, called Promoters, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wight, Simpſon, and Stockton, to be ſet on the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their heads, and then to ride through the City, with their faces to the Horſe tails; with the ſhame whereof in ſeven dayes after, they all died in Newgate. Shortly after a Parliament was called, whereof Sir Thomas Ingleby was choſen Speaker; and therein Empſon and Dudley were attainted of High Treaſon, and after arraigned; Edmund Dudley in the Guildhall, on the ſeventeenth of July, and Sir Richard Empſon at Northampton in October following; and on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt the year following, they were both of them beheaded on the Tower-hill, and their bodies and heads buried, the one at White-Friers, the other at the Black.

Empſon and Dudley committed to the Tower.

1510. Both of them beheaded.

On Midſummer Eve at night, King Henry came privily into Cheapſide, cloathed in one of the Coats of his Guard, to behold the ſame: and this firſt year King Henry ſpent in Juſts and Masks, which were almoſt perpetual, performed with great Magnificence alwayes; and ſometimes with great acts of Valour on the Kings part ſpecially.

In February the ſame year, Ambaſſadors came from from the Kings Father in law, the King of Aragon, requiring aid againſt the Moors; in which ſervice, the Lord Thomas Darcy, a Knight of the Garter, making ſuit to be employed, he was ſent thither, and with him the Lord Anthony Gray, Brother to the Marqueſs Dorſet, Henry Guilford, Wolſtan Brown, and William Sidney, Eſquires of the Kings Houſe, Sir Robert Conſtable, Sir Roger Haſtings, Sir Ralph Elderton, and others, who, on the Munday in the Rogation Week, departed out of Plymouth Haven with four Ships Royal, and on the firſt of June arrived at the Port of Cadis in South Spain; of whoſe coming the King of Aragon hearing, ſent to bid them welcome; but adverti ſing them withal, that he had now by reaſon of new troubles with France, taken truce with the Moors, and therefore they might return again to their own Countrey, to whom yet he allowed wages for all his Souldiers. Whereupon the Lord Darcy and all his men went aboard their Ships; but Henry Guilford, Wolſtan Brown, and William Sydney, deſirous to ſee the Court of Spain, went thither, and were honourably entertained. Henry Guilford, and Wolſtan Brown were made Knights by the King; who gave to Sir Henry Guilford a Canton of Granado; and to Sir Wolſtan Brown an Eagle of Sicily on a Chief, to the augmentation of their Arms; William Sydney ſo excuſed himſelf, that he was not made Knight. After this they returned to their Ships, and their Ships into England.

Sir Henry Guilford, and Sir Wolſtan Brown the honours done them in Spain,

During the time that the Lord Darcy was in Spain, the Lady Masgaret Dutcheſs of Savoy, Daughter unto Maximilian the Emperour, and Governeſs of Flanders and other the Low-Countreys, pertaining to Charles the young Prince of Caſtile, ſent to King Henry for fifteen hundred Archers, to aid her againſt the Duke of Gelders, which the King granted; and thereupon Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, and Comptroler of the Kings Houſe appointed to go, accompanied with his Son in Law the Lord Clinton, Sir Matthew Brown, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Witherill, and others to the number of fifteen hundred, took Shipping at Sandwich, and paſſing over to the ſaid Lady Regent, did her there great ſervice; for which John Norton, John Fogge, John Scot, and Thomas Linde were Knighted; and then with many thanks and rewards returned, not having loſt in all the Journey, by War or Sickneſs, above an hundred men.

Sir Edward Poynings ſent aid to the Dutcheſs of Savoy.

In the third year of King Henries Reign, one Andrew Barton a Scottiſh Pyrate, was grown ſo bold, that he robbed Engliſh men no leſs than other Nations, till the King ſent his Admiral, Sir Edward Howard, to repreſs him, who in a fight ſo wounded the ſaid Barton, that he died; and then taking two of his Ships, brought the men Priſoners to London; and though their offence deſerved no leſs than death, yet the King was ſo merciful as to pardon them all; provided they departed the Realm within twenty dayes. The King of Scots hearing of the death of Barton, and taking of his Ships, ſent to King Henry, requiring reſtitution; but King Henry anſwered his Herauld, that he rather looked for thanks for ſparing their lives, who ſo juſtly had deſerved death.

Sir Edward Howard Admiral, repreſſeth Andrew Barton a Scottiſh Pirate.

In the third year alſo of King Henry's Reign, the French King made ſharp War againſt Pope Julius the ſecond; whereupon King Henry wrote to the French King, requiring him to deſiſt from his War againſt the Pope, being his Friend and Confederate; but when the King of France little regarded his requeſt, he then ſent him word to deliver him his Inheritance of the Dutchy of Normandy and Guyen, and the Countreys of Anjou and Mayne; as alſo his Crown of France, or elſe he would recover it by the Sword. But when the King of France was not moved with this threatning neither; King Henry then joyning in League with the Emperour Maximilian, with Ferdinand King of Spain, and with divers other Princes, reſolved by advice of his Council to make War on the King of France, and to that end made preparation both by Sea and Land.

Anno Reg. 1512.

King Henry makes preparation for War with France.

This year the King kept his Chriſtmas at Greenwich, in a moſt magnificent manner. On New-years day was preſented one of his Jovial Devices, which, only for a Pattern what his ſhows at other times were, I think fit to ſet down at large. In the Hall was made a Caſtle, garniſhed with Artillery and Weapons, in a moſt warlike faſhion, and on the Front of the Caſtle was written, la Fortreſſe Dangereuſe: within the Caſtle were ſix Ladies, cloathed in Ruſſet Satten, laid all over with leaves of Gold: on their heads Coyfs and Caps of Gold. After this Caſtle had been carried about the Hall, and the Queen had beheld it; in came the King with five other, apparelled in Coats, one half of Ruſſet Satten, with Spangles of fine Gold; the other half of rich cloth of Gold: on their heads Caps of Ruſſet Satten, embroidered with works of fine Gold. Theſe ſix aſſaulted the Caſtle, whom the Ladies ſeeing ſo luſty and courageous, they were contented to ſolace with them; and upon further communication, to yield the Caſtle; and ſo they came down and danced a long ſpace: after that the Ladies led the Knights into the Caſtle, and then the Caſtle ſuddenly vaniſhed out of their ſights. On the twelth day at night, the King with eleven more were diſguiſed, after the manner of Italy, called a Mask; a thing not ſeen before in England. They were apparelled in Garments long and broad, wrought all with Gold, with Viſors and Caps of Gold. And after the Banquet done, theſe Maskers came in, with ſix Gentlemen diſguiſed in Silk, bearing ſtaffe Torches, and deſired the Ladies to dance, and after they had danced and communed together, took their leave and departed.

One of King Henry's Jovial Devices.

The five and twentieth of January began the Parliament, of which was Speaker Sir Robert Sheffield Knight, where the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhewed the wrong which the King of France did to the King of England, in withholding his Inheritance from him; and thereupon the Parliament concluded, that War ſhould be made on the French King and his Dominions.

The War with France concluded by Parliament

At this time King Ferdinand of Spain, having War with the French King, wrote to his Son in Law King Henry, that if he would ſend over an Army into Biskey, and invade France on that ſide; he would aid them with Ordinance, Horſes,

and

Upon the King of Spains promiſe of aid, King Henry ſends a great Army to him, but is deluded.

and all other things neceſſary: whereupon Thomas Gray, Marqueſs Dorſet, was appointed to go, and with him the Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, the Lord Brook, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Ferrers, the Lords John, Anthony, and Leonard Gray, all Brothers to the Marqueſs; Sir Griffith ap Rice, Sir Maurice Barkeley, Sir William Sands, the Baron of Burford, and Sir Richard Cornwal his Brother, William Huſſey, John Melton, William Kingſtone Eſquires, and Sir Henry Willoughby, with divers others, to the number of ten thouſand; who taking Ship at Southampton on the ſixteenth of May, the third of June they landed on the Coaſt of Biskey, whither, within three dayes after their arrival, came from the King a Marqueſs and an Earl to welcome them; but of ſuch neceſſaries as were promiſed, there came none: ſo as the Engliſh being in ſome want of victuals, the King of Navarre offered to ſupply them, which they accepted; and promiſed thereupon not to moleſt his Territories. After the Army had lien thirty dayes, looking for aid and proviſion from the King of Spain, at laſt a Biſhop came from the King, deſiring them to have patience a while, and very ſhortly he would give them full contentment. In the mean time the Engliſh men forced to feed upon much Garlick, and to drink of hot Wines, fell into ſuch ſickneſs, that many of them died, at leaſt eighteen hundred perſons: which the Lord Marqueſs ſeeing, he ſent to the King to know his pleaſure, who ſent him anſwer, that very ſhortly the Duke of Alva ſhould come with a great power, and joyn with him: and indeed the Duke of Alva came forward with a great Army, as if he meant to joyn with him as was promiſed; but being come within a dayes journey, he ſuddenly turned towards the Realm of Navarre; and entring the ſame, chaſed out the King, and conquered the Kingdom to the King of Spains uſe. This Spaniſh policy pleaſed not the Engliſh, who finding nothing but words from the King of Spain, and being weary of lying ſo long idle, they fell upon ſome ſmall Towns in the borders of Guyen; but, for want of Horſes, as well for ſervice as draught, were unable to perform any great matter: at which time, being now October, the Lord Marqueſs fell ſick, and the Lord Howard ſupplyed his place of General. To whom the King of Spain once again ſent excuſing his preſent coming, and requiring him, ſeeing the time of year was now paſt, that he would be pleaſed to break up his Army, and diſperſe his Companies into Towns thereabouts till the next Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his promiſes: Hereupon the Lord Howard and his Company went to Rendre, the Lord Willoughby to Gorſchange, and Sir William Sands with many other Captains to Fontareby. King Henry in the mean time, hearing what the King of Spains intention was; ſent his Herald Windſor with Letters to the Army, willing them to tarry there; for that very ſhortly he meant to ſend them a new ſupply of Forces, under the conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain; but this meſſage ſo incenſed the Souldiers, that in a great fury they had ſlain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded preſently to return home; who thereupon was forced to hire Ships, and in the beginning of December they landed in England; being taught by this experience what truſt is to be given to Spaniſh promiſes.

Anno Reg. 5 1514.

About the ſame time that the Marqueſs went into Spain, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral of England, with twenty great Ships made forth towards Britain: where ſetting his men on land, he burned and waſted divers Towns and Villages, and being threatned by the Lords of Britain to be encountred, to encourage his Gentlemen, he made divers of them Knights; as Sir Edward Brook Brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffith Down, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir John Burdet, Sir William Pirton, Sir Henry Sherburn, and Sir William Bull. The Britains were ten thouſand, the Engliſh but five and twenty hundred; yet the Britains, not contented with this advantage of number, would needs uſe policy beſides; for, by the advice of an old experienced Captain, their General commanded his men, that as ſoon as the Battels were joyned, they ſhould retire a little, meaning thereby to draw the Engliſh into ſome diſadvantage; but the common Souldiers not knowing their Generals purpoſe, and ſuppoſing he had ſeen ſome preſent danger, inſtead of retiring took their heels and fled; ſo giving the Engliſh by their Britiſh policy, if not a Victory, at leaſt a ſafety to return to their Ships. After which the Britains ſued for Truce, and could not obtain it; for the Engliſh Admiral purſued his forraging the Countrey, till fearing there were many French Ships abroad at Sea, he came and lay before the Iſle of Wight. King Henry in the mean time followed his pleaſures, and in June kept a ſolemn Juſt at Greenwich, where he and Sir Charles Brandon took up all comers; and the King ſhewed himſelf no leſs a King at Arms than in Eſtate.

Policy to ſelf-hurt.

After this, King Henry having prepared men and Ships ready to go to Sea, under the Governance of Sir Anthony Outhread, Sir Edmund Ichingham, William Sidney, and divers other Gentlemen; appointed them to take the Sea, and to come before the Iſle of Wight, there to joyn with the Admiral; which all together made a Fleet of five and twenty fair Ships: and to Portſmouth he went himſelf to ſee them, where he appointed Captains, for one of his chiefeſt Ships called the Regent, Sir Thomas Knevet Maſter of his Horſe, and Sir John Carew of Devonſhire, and to another principal Ship called the Sovereign, he appointed for Captains, Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford; and then making them a Banquet, ſent them going. The French King likewiſe had prepared a Navy of nine and thirty Ships in the Haven of Breſt, whereof the chief was, a great Carrick, called the Cordelyer, pertaining to the Queen his Wife. Theſe two Fleets met at the Bay of Britain, and there entered a terrible fight; the Lord Admiral made with the great Ship of Deep, and chaſed her; Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guilford being in the Sovereign, made with the great Carrick of Breſt, and laid ſtemme to ſtemme to her: but, whether by negligence of the Maſter, or by reaſon of the ſmoke from the Ordinance, the Sovereign was caſt at the ſtern of the Carrick; whereat the French men ſhouted

The two Fleets of the French and Engliſh have a terrible Fight.

Sir Thomas Knevet in the Kings Ship called the Regent drowned.

ſhouted for joy; which Sir Thomas Knevet ſeeing, ſuddenly he cauſed the Regent in which he was, to make to the Carrick, and to grapple with her a long board; and when they of the Carrick perceived they could not get aſunder, they let ſlip an Anchor, and ſo with the ſtream the Ships turned, and the Carrick was on the Weather ſide, and the Regent on the Lee ſide; at which time a cruel fight paſſed between theſe two Ships: But in concluſion the Engliſh men entred the Carrick, which when a Gunner ſaw, he deſperately ſet fire on the Gun-powder (as ſome ſay) though others affirmed, that Sir Anthony Outhread following the Regent at the Stern, bowged her on divers places, and ſet her powder on fire; but howſoever it chanced the Carrick and the Regent both were conſumed by fire. In the Carrick was Sir Piers Morgan, and with him nine hundred men: In the Regent were Sir Thomas Knevet and Sir John Carew, and with them ſeven hundred men, all drowned and burnt. King Henry to repair the loſs of the Regent, cauſed a great Ship to be made, ſuch a one as had never been ſeen in England, and named it Henry Grace de Dieu.

King Henry makes the great Ship called Henry Grace de Dieu.

Though King Henry had hitherto followed his pleaſures, as well agreeing with his youth and conſtitution; yet he neglected not in the mean time ſeverer ſtudies; for he frequented daily his Council Table, and no matter of importance was reſolved on, till he had heard it firſt maturely diſcuſſed: as was now a War with France, which he would not enter into upon his own head, nor yet upon advice of his private Council, till he had it debated and concluded in Parliament; whereupon he called his High Court of Parliament, wherein it was reſolved, that himſelf in perſon with a Royal Army, ſhould invade France; and towards the charges thereof an extraordinary Subſidy was willingly granted.

Edmund de la Pool Earl of Suffolk put to death.

On May even this year, Edmund de la Pool Earl of Suffolk was beheaded on the Tower-hill: This was that Earl of Suffolk, whom King Philip Duke of Auſtria had delivered up into the hands of King Henry the Seventh, upon his promiſe that he would not put him to death; which indeed he performed; but his Son King Henry the Eighth was not bound by that promiſe, and by him he was; and ſhortly after, to bring another Lord in his place, Sir Charles Brandon was created Viſcount Liſle.

Sir Charles Brandon is created Viſcount Liſle.

For all the great preparation for France King Henry forbore not his courſe of Revelling, but kept his Chriſtmaſs at Greenwich, with divers curious devices, in moſt magnificent manner. In March following, the Kings Navy Royal, to the number of two and forty Ships was ſet forth, under the conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompanied with Sir Walter Devereux, Lord Ferrers, Sir Woolſtan Brown, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir Anthony Poynings, Sir John Walloppe, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Stephen Bull, William Fitzwilliams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney Eſquires, and divers other Gentlemen, who ſailing to Britain, came into Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in ſight of the French Navy, whereof one Prior John was Admiral, who keeping himſelf cloſe in the Haven of Breſt; the Engliſh Admiral intended to aſſail him in the Haven; but becauſe his Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he cauſed certain Boats to be manned forth, thinking thereby to toule out the French; but when this neither would draw them to come abroad, he then called a Council, where it was determined, that firſt they ſhould aſſail Prior John and his Gallies, lying in Blankeſable Bay, and after ſet upon the reſt of the French Fleet in the Haven of Breſt; and it was further appointed that the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others ſhould go on Land, with a convenient number, to aſſault the Bulwarks, which the French had there made; while the Admiral with Row Barges, and little Gallies entred into the Bay, that ſo the French men might at once be aſſailed both by Sea and Land. But though this were determined by a Council of War, yet the Lore Admiral had a trick by himſelf, for by the advice of a Spaniſh Knight called Sir Alphonſo Charunt, affirming that he might enter the Bay with little danger; he called to him William Fitzwilliams, William Cook, John Colley, and Sir Wolſtan Brown, as his moſt truſty friends, making them privy to his intent, which was to take on him the whole enterpriſe with their aſſiſtants only; and ſo confident he was of ſucceſs, that he wrote to the King to come thither in perſon, to have the honour of the enterpriſe himſelf; but it ſeems the King had better Fates, at leaſt went not; and thereupon on Saint Marks day the Admiral put himſelf in a ſmall Row Barge; and appointing three other ſmall Row Ships, and his own Ship-Boat to attend him, therewith on a ſudden rowed into the Bay, where Prior John had moored up his Gallies juſt to the ground; which Gallies, with the Bulwarks on the Land, ſhot moſt cruelly, yet the Admiral went on, and coming to the Gallies, drove out the French men: the Bay was ſhallow, and the other Ships, by reaſon of the Tide was ſpent, could not enter; which the French men perceiving, they entred the Gallies again with Morris Pikes, and began a new fight; whereupon the Admiral attempting to return back into his Row Barge, which by violence of the Tide, was driven down the ſtream, with a Pike was thrown over-board and drowned; the juſt iſſue of his head-ſtrong enterpriſe; the fore-named Alphonſo was alſo there ſlain: upon which ſorrowful accident, the Lord Ferrers with the reſt returned into England. After whoſe departure Prior John came forth with his Gallies; and coaſting over the Borders of Suſſex, burnt certain poor Cottages; but the King made ſuddenly a new Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, eldeſt Brother to him that was drowned, Son and Heir of the Earl of Surrey: who ſo ſcowred the Seas, that the French were no more to be ſeen on any Coaſt of England.

Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, following his own head ſtrong device, is drowned.

King Henry had hitherto performed Acts of Arms, though in Jeſt, yet with great magnificence; he will not perform them with leſs, being now in earneſt, and ſpecially to deal with ſo potent an Adverſary: and therefore when it was concluded by Parliament, that he ſhould make a War in France himſelf in perſon; he ſent before to prepare the way for him, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury high Steward of his Houſhold, accompanied with the Lord Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, the Lord Dowckeroy Prior of Saint Johns, Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Haſtings, the Lord Cobham, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Thomas Cornwal aad others, to the number of eight thouſand, who arrived at Callice about the middle of May; after him in the end of May, followed Sir Charles Somerſet, Lord Herbert, Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Piercy Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Gray Earl of Kent, the Lord Stafford Earl of Wiltſhire, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Sir Edward Huſſey, Sir Edward Dimmock, Sir David Owen, with others to the number of ſix thouſand: Theſe Generals joyning together, iſſued out of Callice, and on the two and twentieth day of June, ſate down before the ſtrong Town of Terwin, which City was ſtrongly fortified; and in it was Governour the Lord Poultreny, who had with him ſix hundred Horſemen, and five and twenty hundred Almains, beſides the Inhabitants. Here at the very firſt happened two diſaſters to the Engliſh, one, that the Baron Carew was ſlain with a ſhot from the Town; the other, that Sir Nicholas Vaux, and Sir Edward Belknappe coming from Gnyſnes with four and twenty Carts of Proviſion, were ſet upon by the Duke of Vendoſme, Lieutenant of Picardy, and many of the Engliſh ſlain, and the Proviſion taken. In this ſtate was the Engliſh Camp at Terwin, when King Henry the laſt day day of June came himſelf to Callice, and on the one and twentieth of July took the field, having in his Army of fighting men not above nine thouſand, but with Pioneers and others that attended the Carriages, eleven thouſand and three hundred men: His forward was led by Charles Brandon Viſcount Liſle, his main Battel by himſelf, and Sir Henry Guilford carried his Standard; and in this order he marched forward to the ſiege of Terwin, entring upon the French ground the five and twentieth of July. On the morrow after, by negligence of the Carters, that miſtook the way, a great Gun called the John Evangeliſt, was overthrown in a deep Pond of water, and could not at that time be recovered; but a few dayes after, the Maſter Carpenter taking with him a hundred labourers, went and weighed it up; but having carted it ready to bring away, was ſet upon by eight hundred French; and the moſt of his company ſlain: The Gun was taken by the French, and carried to Bulloign. In the French Army were to the number of eleven thouſand Footmen, and four thouſand Horſe; whereof were Captains, the Lord De la Palyce, the Lord De Priennes, the Duke De Longuevyle, the Earl of Saint Paul, the Lord of Floringes, the Lord of Clermont, and Richard de la Pool an Engliſh man, Son to John Duke of Suffolk. The Armies were come within two miles one of another, and ſome light skirmiſhes paſſed between them, ſpecially one; on a day called the dry Wedneſday, for the day was wonderful hot, and the King with his Army ſtood in order of Battel, from ſix a clock in the morning, till three in the afternoon: after this, the King removed towards Terwin; and as the Army marched, another of the Kings Bombards of Iron, called the Red Gun, was overthrown in a lane, and there left; which the French underſtanding, went with a great power to fetch it away, as they had done the other; but the Lord Berners, Captain of the Engliſh Pioneers, prevented them; and though ſet upon by the French to the number of nine or ten thouſand, yet by the valour of the Earl of Eſſex, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the bold adventures of Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharp, they recovered it, and brought it ſafe to the Camp. On the fourth of Auguſt King Henry came before the City of Terwin, where he ſtrongly fortified himſelf with Ordinance, and other warlike defences. In which mean time, the Captain of Bulloign knowing that many of the Garriſon of Callice were gone with the King, thought to take advantage of their abſence, and do ſome great exploit upon Callice; and thereupon with a thouſand men, came to Newnham Bridge, and killing the Watchmen, took it; but afterward ſome of his Company going to fetch Booties, and coming ſo near the Walls of Callice, that they were deſcried; about ſixſcore Coopers and other Artificers iſſued forth, and driving them back, recovered again Newnham Bridge, and took divers of them priſoners; eſpecially when the Gate of Callice, called Bulloigne Gate, was opened, and that Colepepper the under-Marſhal, with two hundred Archers iſſued forth, and joyned with them. The French priſoners were brought to Callice, and there ſold in open Market: amongſt others a Cooper of the Town of Callice bought a priſoner that dwelt in Bulloigne, and had of the Priſoner for his ranſome, a hundred Crowns; when the money was paid, the French man prayed the Cooper to ſee him ſafe delivered, and to conduct him out of danger; the Cooper was content, and went himſelf alone with the French man, till he came beyond the Cawſey, and there would have departed; but the French man perceiving that the Cooper was aged, and that no reſcue was nigh, by force took the Cooper priſoner, and carried him to Bulloigne, making him pay two hundred Crowns, before he was delivered.

Whilſt King Henry lay thus at the ſiege of Terwin, on the eleventh of Auguſt the Emperour Maximilian was come to Ayre; which King Henry underſtanding, went and met him between Ayre and the Camp, where with great complements they ſaluted each other; but their complements were broken off by the extream foul weather which happened that day: the morrow after, the Emperour Maximilian came from Ayre to the Kings Camp, wearing a Croſs of Saint George, as the Kings Souldier, and receiving wages of him for ſervice, an hundred Crowns a day: An honour never done to any King of England before; and yet was no diſparagement to the Emperour; for he was royally received, and lodged in a Tent of Cloth of Gold; that as no Emperour before had ever been Souldier to a King; ſo no Souldier before was ever lodged in ſuch a Tent. At this time the City of Terwin, being in ſome diſtreſs for want of Victuals; the French King appointed all his Horſemen to the number of eight thouſand ſand, to ſee victuals by any means convoyed into it; the charge of which Convoy was committed to Mounſier De Priennes : but King Henry by advice of the Emperour Maximilian had made Bridges to paſs his men over the River, to the other ſide of the Town, where was eaſieſt acceſs; in ſuch ſort, that when the French Convoy came with their Victuals, and thought to have entred the Town, they found the Engliſh Army there ready to reſiſt them; whereupon a fierce Battel was fought between them: but in concluſion the French were put to flight, and fled ſo faſt, that from thence it was called the Battel of Spurs, for that they uſed more their Spurs in running away, than their Launces in fighting. In this Battel, the Duke of Longuevyle, the Lord of Cleremont, Captain Bayard, and others to the number of twelve ſcore were taken priſoners, and all brought to the Kings preſence; with ſix Standards that were likewiſe taken. After the Battel, the King made Sir John Pechye Banneret, and John Carre Knight, who had both of them done great ſervice in this encounter. King Henry having obtained this Victory againſt the French Horſemen, and hindered the Town of Terwin from relief of Victuals, and withal plying his Battery more fiercely than before; made the Townſmen ſoon fall to deſire compoſition, and upon condition, that the Souldiers may depart with Horſe and Armour, they yielded up the Town into the Kings hands. This was done on the eighteenth of Auguſt, and the Earl of Shrewsbury entred the Town the ſame night, and ſet up the Banner of Saint George in the higheſt place of it, in ſign of Victory, and ſwore all the Townſmen to be true Subjects to the King of England. The four and twentieth of Auguſt, the King himſelf entred the Town, and dined in the Biſhops Palace, where it was reſolved, that the Walls and Fortifications of Terwin ſhould be raſed, and the Town burnt all but the Cathedral Church and the Palace; all the Ordinance was ſent to Ayre, to be kept there to the Kings uſe.

King Henry layes ſiege to Tourney.

After this it was concluded, that the King ſhould lay ſiege to the City of Tourney; whereupon he ſet forward in three Battels; the Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperour, the Battel; and the Lord Chamberlain the Rereward. In this order the Kings Army marched forwards towards Tourney; by the way, he went and viſited the young Prince of Caſtile, and the Lady Margaret, Governeſs of the Prince, in the Town of Liſle, where with all Magnificence, or rather indeed Reverence, he was entertained; and after he had ſtayed there three dayes, he took his leave, and being gone a mile and ſomewhat more out of the Town, he asked where his his Camp lay, and no man there could tell the way, and guide they had none; the night was ſo dark and miſty; by chance at laſt they met with a Victualler coming from the Camp, who was their guide, and conducted them to it. By which we may ſee, to what diſtreſs a great Prince might be brought by a little over-ſight.

On the one and twentieth day of September, the King removed his Camp towards Tourney, and being come within three miles of the Town, he ſent Garter King of Arms to ſummon the Town; but they, though they had but few men of War amongſt them, yet ſtood upon their Guard; whereupon the King begirt it on all ſides, and made ſuch fierce batteries upon it, that though it were written on the Gates of the Town, graven in ſtone, Jamais tu ne as perdu ton Pucellege; thou haſt never loſt thy Maidenhead; yet now they were glad to loſe it: and in concluſion they ſent a Trumpet to require a Parley, and then ſued for mercy and yielded it up, and paid ten thouſand pounds ſterling beſides for redemption of their liberties: and then Maſter Thomas Woolſey, the Kings Almoner, calling before him all the Citizens young and old, ſwore them to the King of England; the number of whom was fourſcore thouſand. This done, the King entred into Tourney, and calling into his preſence Edward Guilford, William Fitzwilliams, John Danſie, William Tyler, John Sharp, William Huſſey, John Savage, Chriſtopher Garniſh, and ſome other valiant Gentlemen; he gave to them the Order of Knighthood. And then remembring the great entertainment the Prince of Caſtile and the Lady Margaret had given him at Liſle, he would not be behinde them in ſuch Courteſie; and thereupon invited them ſolemnly to his City of Tourney, whom at their coming he brought into the Town in great triumph: during their abode in Tourney, amongſt other complements of entertainment, there was had a Juſts, where the King and the Lord Liſle anſwered all comers: after the Juſts, was a ſumptuous Banquet; after the Banquet, the Ladies danced, and then came in the King, and eleven other in a Mask, all richly apparelled with Bonnets of Gold: and when they had paſſed the time at their pleaſures, the Garments of the Maskers were caſt off amongſt the Ladies, take them that could. This was King Henry's diſpoſition, that he could not forbear Revelling in the midſt of his Arms; and Ladies muſt be entertained as well as Souldiers. And here Maximilian the Emperour finding the French Forces to be but weak, perſwades King Henry to proceed on and purſue his Victories: but he being young and of a quiet diſpoſition, and conſidering with himſelf that he had not entred the War for any cauſe of his own, but to revenge the injuries done to the Pope: and thinking by this already done the French ſufficiently leſſon'd to acknowledge their error, and the rather, for that Winter was now drawing on; he reſolved to put this end to the War: and ſo taking his leave of the Emperour; and leaving Sir Edward Poynings Governor of Tourney, he returned to Callice; and from thence into England, and then rode in Poſt to the Queen at Richmond.

Whileſt King Henry was thus buſied in his War with France, the King of Scots, though his Brother in law, yet inſtigated by the French King, and taking advantage of King Henry's abſence, aſſembled his people to invade England; but before his whole power could come together, the Lord Humes his Chamberlain with ſeven or eight thouſand men entred the Borders; but as he was returning with a great booty of Cattel, in a field over-grown with Broom, called Milfield, he was encountred by Sir Edward Bulmer, having with him not above a thousand men; who lying in that field in Ambush, broke out upon him, and put him to flight, with the slaughter of five or six hundred of his company, and four hundred taken Prisoners; the Lord Humes himself escaped by flight, but his Banner was taken: and this by the Scots was called, The ill Rode. In the mean time the whole power of Scotland was assembled, no fewer than one hundred thousand men; though Buchanan in favour of his Countrey, saith, not the fifth part of that number: and with these King James approaching the borders, and coming to Norham Castle, laid siege unto it, which for want of powder, was soon delivered up unto him. But by this time the Earl of Surrey, Lieutenant of the North parts, had assembled an Army of six and twenty thousand men; to whom also soon after his Son the Lord Admiral, with one thousand expert Souldiers came and joyned: and now having many great Lords and Knights in his Army, he appointed to every one their station; and then was informed, that King James being removed six miles from Norham, lay embattelling upon a great Mountain called Floddon, where it was impossible to come near him, but with great disadvantage; for at the foot of the hill, on the left hand, was a great marish ground full of reeds and water, on the right hand was a River called Till, so swift and deep that it was not passable; on the backside were such craggy Rocks and thick Woods, that there was no assailing him on that part; the forepart of his Camp he had fenced with his great Ordinance. Being in such a hold, the Earl of Surrey found there was no possibility of a Battel, unless he could draw him from the Hill: whereupon he called a Council, by which it was determined to send Rouge Cross Pursuivant at Arms with a Trumpet to the King of Scots, to let him know that he was ready on Friday following to give him Battel, if he would abide it; whereunto the King of Scots by his Pursuivant Ilay made answer, that at the day prefixed he should finde him ready for Battel as he desired, that he would willingly have come to such a match if he had been at Edenburgh; but though he made this answer, yet he would not leave the strong hold he was in, but kept himself still upon the Hill; at last, Thomas Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, having viewed the Countrey round about, declared to his Father, that if he would fetch but a small compass, and come with his Army on the back of his Enemies, he should enforce the Scottish King to come down out of his strength, or else stop him from receiving of Victuals or any other thing out of Scotland. This counsel of the Lord Howard his Father followed, and King James perceiving what their meaning was, thought it stood not with his honour to be fore-stalled out of his own Realm; and thereupon immediately raised his Camp, and got to another Hill, but not so steep as the other: which the Earl of Surrey perceiving, he determined to mount it, and to fight with the Scots, before they should have leasure to fortifie their Camp: and herewith making a short Speech, for encouragement of his Souldiers, he divided his Army into Battels; the Vantguard was led by the Lord Howard, to whom was joyned as a Wing, Sir Edward Howard; the middle-ward was led by the Earl himself, and the Rere-ward was by Sir Edward Stanley; the Lord Dacres with a number of Horsemen was set apart by himself, to succour where need should be; the Ordinance was placed in the Front, and in other places, as was thought most convenient: and in this order they march forward towards the Scots. On the other side King James reckoning upon the benefit of the Hill, thought the English half mad, to venture a Battel upon such disadvantage; and thereupon making a speech to encourage his Souldiers, who were of themselves so forward, that they needed no encouraging, he divided the Battels in this manner; the main Battel he led himself, to which he appointed two Wings; the right led by the Earls of Huntley, Crawford, and Montross; the left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle; together with the Lord Humes L. Chamberlain: and so confident they were of Victory, that the King first, and after all the Lords and meaner men, put away their Horses, as thinking they should not need them; which confidence was afterward their undoing; for when the Battel being joyned, Sir Edward Howard in getting up the Hill, was so assaulted by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, that he was left almost alone, and in manifest peril to be slain; in comes the Lord Dacres with his Horsemen and trod under foot the Scottish Battel of Speers on foot, which he could not have done, if they had kept their Horses. And this part of the Scottish Army being led by the Earls of Crawford and Montross, they were both of them slain, and the whole Battel put to flight. In another part also Sir Edward Stanley did the like upon the Battel led by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, putting it to flight, with the slaughter also of these two Earls. King James notwithstanding, maintained the fight still with great resolution, till Sir Adam Forman his Standard-bearer was beaten down; and then not fainting, though despairing of success, he rushed into the thickest of his Enemies, amongst whom he was beaten down and slain; and to make his death the more honourable, there died with him three Bishops (whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the Kings base Son) two Abbots, twelve Earls, and seventeen Lords, of Knights and Gentlemen very many, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners (as Paulus Jovius saith) amongst whom was Sir William Scot Chancellour to the said King, and Sir George Forman his Serjeant Porter; the Lord Humes and the Earl of Huntley got horses and escaped. Neither was the Battel without blood to the English; for there were slain at least a thousand, and (that which in a Defeat was strange) many also taken prisoners; for many in pursuing the Scots, went rashly so far, that they knew not which way to return, and by Bands of Scots, that had not fought that day, were set upon and taken. When the field was done, the Lord General called to him certain Lords Lords and Gentlemen, and made them Knights, as Sir Edward Howard his Son, the Lord Scroop, Sir William Percy, Sir Edward George, and others. This Battel was fought on Friday the ninth of Sept. in the year 1513. called by some Bramston, by some Floddon field. King James here slain was the same that had married the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of King Henry the Seventh, and Sister to the present King Henry; and might have enjoyed many happy dayes, if he had kept himself firm to his alliance; but being carried away with the inveterate spleen between the two Nations, and propension to France, he ended his life, though honourably, yet miserably under many wounds. It is a very memorable, but scarce credible thing, which (from the mouth of a very credible person who saw it) George Buchanan relates concerning this King; that intending to make a War with England, a certain old man of venerable aspect, and clad in a long blue Garment, came unto him, and leaning familiarly upon the Chair where the King sate, said, I am sent unto thee O King, to give thee warning, that thou proceed not in the War thou art about; for if thou do, it will be thy ruine: and having so said, he pressed through the company, and vanished out of sight; for by no inquiry it could be known what became of him. But the King was too resolute to be frighted with Phantasms, and no warning could divert his Destiny, which had not been Destiny if it could have been diverted. The day after the Battel, his Body, though disfigured with wounds, was known by the Lord Dacres and others to be his; and thereupon bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in lead, was brought to the Monastery of Sheen in Surrey, and there interred; but at the dissolution of that House was taken up and thrown into a waste room amongst timber and stone; which John Stow saith, he so saw, and farther relateth, that the servants of Lancelot Young, Glasier to Queen Elizabeth, being at Sheen, in new Glasing the Windows, either upon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest; but smelling the sweet perfumes of the Balms, gave it to their Master; who opening the lead, found therein the head of a man, retaining favour, though the moisture were clean dried up, whose hair both of head and beard was red: which afterward he caused to be buried at St. Michaels Church in Wood-street, where he dwelled. But notwithstanding this relation of Stow, John Lesley Bishop of Ross affirmeth, that it was held for certain, the Body thus found, was the Body of the Lord Bauchard slain in that Battel, Buchanan saith, of Alexander Elfinston, who in countenance and stature was like the King; and that King James was seen alive the same night at Kelso, whence he passed to Jerusalem, and there spent the rest of his dayes in holy contemplation: but howsoever it was, he was never seen any more in Scotland.

King Henry being now returned from Tourney into England, and finding the great services done in his absence against the Scots; on the day of the Purification of our Lady, at Lambeth he created the Earl of Surrey Duke of Norfolk, with an augmentation of the Arms of Scotland; Sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle, he created Duke of Suffolk; the Lord Howard high Admiral, he made Earl of Surrey, Sir Charles Somerset Lord Herbert his chief Chamberlain Earl of Worcester, and shortly after Sir Edward Stanley he made Lord Monteagle; and in March following, Master Thomas Woolsey his Almoner, was made Bishop of Lincoln. Here before we go further, it will be fit to say something of this man, that he be not a rub afterward in the way of the Story: He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher, sent to Oxford by reason of his pregnancy of wit, so soon, that taking there the first degree of Art, he was called the Boy-Batchelour; proceeding in learning, he was made Fellow of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, and afterward Schoolmaster of the School there, at which time the Marques Dorset committed three of his Sons to be instructed by him; and having a Benefice fallen in his gift, sent for him one Christmas, and bestowed it upon him; whereof Woolsey going to take possession, at his being there, for what misdemeanour is not delivered, he was by Sir Amyas Paulet set by the heels, which afterward he remembred to Sir James his no small trouble, for he made him attend his pleasure five or six years; all which time he lay in the Middle-Temple, where he re-edified the Gate-house next the street very sumptuously, setting the Cardinals Arms upon it, to appease him. After this disgrace he went over-Sea, where he fell in acquaintance with Sir John Naphant Treasurer of Callice, and by him was preferred to be King Henry the Seventhes Chaplain: and now being by this means in the Kings eye, he so diligently carried himself, that he soon got into the Kings heart. One time it happened, the King had occasion to send a Messenger to the Emperour Maximilian, about a business that required haste; for which employment no man was thought more fit than Woolsey; whereupon, when the King called him, gave him his Errand, and bade him make all speed he could: Woolsey departed from the King at Richmond about noon, and by the next morning was got to Dover, and from thence by noon that day was come to Callice, and by night was with the Emperour; to whom declaring his Message; and having a present dispatch, he rode that night back to Callice, and the night following came to the Court at Richmond. The next morning he presented himself before the King, who blamed him for not being yet gone, the matter requiring haste; to whom Woolsey answered, that he had been with the Emperour, and had dispatched the business, and for proof shewed the Emperours lines: the King wondered much at his speed, but then asked him if he met not with his Pursuivant, whom he sent after to advertise him of a special matter he had forgotten: whereto Woolsey answered, May it please your Grace, I met him yesterday upon the way, but that business I had dispatched before, taking the boldness so to do without commission, as knowing it to be of special consequence; for which boldness I humbly intreat your Graces Pardon. The King not only pardoned him, but bestowed presently upon him the Deanery of Lincoln, and soon after made his Almoner. In this ſtate King Henry the Eight found him, with whom alſo he grew into ſuch favour, that he made him of his Council; and having won Tourney, made him Biſhop of that City; and returning into England, the Biſhoprick of Lincoln falling void by the death of Doctor Smith, made him Biſhop of that Dioceſs. And thus far the Story hath now brought him; but ſoon after he was raiſed higher; for Doctor Bambridge Archbiſhop of York dying, he was tranſlated from Lincoln to that See: and that he might not be inferiour to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he procured of the Pope to be made Cardinal, and Legat à Latere; and after by the King was made Lord Chancellour of England: and being come to his height of Dignity, he ſo carried himſelf in Expenſes of Houſhold, in number of Retinue, and in all circumſtances of State, that no Subject before or ſince hath in any degree come near him: and if we may ſay it, he was the firſt debaucher of King Henry; for to the end he might have the managing of all matters himſelf, he perſwaded the King that he ſhould not need trouble himſelf with frequenting the Council Table as he did, but take his pleaſure, and leave thoſe things to his Council, whereof himſelf would alwayes give him true Information. This was plauſible Counſel, and no marvail if it were embraced of a young King, coming from the mouth of ſo great a Prelate.

The fields about Iſlington, Hogſdon, and Shorditch laid open.

In this fifth year of the King, the Citizens of London finding themſelves grieved with the Incloſures of the common fields about Iſlington, Hogſdon, and Shorditch, and other places adjoyning, went one morning, and threw down all the Hedges, and filled up all the Ditches; whereat though the Kings Council were at firſt offended, yet the Mayor and City ſhewed them ſuch reaſons, that they reſted ſatisfied, and the Fields were never ſince hedged.

The Pope gives King Henry the Title of Chriſtianiſſimo.

On the nineteenth of May this year, Pope Julius the Second ſent to King Henry a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being angry with the King of France, transferred, by Authority of the Lateran Council, the title of Chriſtianiſſimo from him upon King Henry, which with great ſolemnity was publiſhed the Sunday following, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul; but this ſolemnity muſt not paſs without Revelling, Maſques, and Juſts; wherein the King and the Duke of Suffolk were defendants againſt all comers; who having the Duke of Longueville, and the Lord of Clermont to be ſpectators, ſpread the fame of their Chivalry into Foreign Nations.

And now the great love, that had been long between King Henry and the Flemings, began to abate upon this occaſion; King Henry the Seventh had concluded a match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain: but, by reaſon of her young years, and for want of aſſurance of Joynture, the match was deferred during his time; but now King Henry the Eight ſeeing his Siſter of convenient years, began to call upon it, and ſignified ſo much to the Council of Flanders; but they, whether having other ends, or out of Spaniſh delayes, put him off with excuſes, and at laſt ſent him word plainly, they could do nothing in it that year. The King of France had ſoon Intelligence how much King Henry diſtaſted theſe Spaniſh dealings, and meant to make ſome good uſe of it, for the ends he began to propoſe to himſelf; which were to get the Lady Mary for himſelf, and thereby procure Peace with England, being now old, and weary of the War. And for this purpoſe he got the new Pope Leo the tenth to be his Mediator, and both of them ſent Ambaſſadors to King Henry, the Pope to perſwade him to have Peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Lady Mary: upon whoſe Ambaſſages, King Henry partly to ſatisfie the Pope, and partly to advance his Siſter, did not unwillingly hearken to the motions; but while this was in working, Prior John (who knew nothing of theſe intentions) began again to play his pranks; and coming with his Gallies on the Coaſt of Suſſex, burnt Brighthemſteed, and took away the Goods he found in the Village: whereupon the Lord Admiral ſent Sir John Walloppe to Sea, with divers Ships, and eight hundred men, who for one Village that Prior John burnt in England, burnt one and twenty Villages and Towns in France, to the great honour of himſelf, and his Countrey.

A Peace is concluded with France; and the King of France marries the Lady Mary King Henry's younger Siſter.

And now King Henry by advice of his Council, and ſpecially of Woolſey Biſhop of Lincoln, concluded both the Peace with France, and the Marriage of his Siſter the Lady Mary, with the French King; but yet it ſtuck a while upon ſome differences, King Henry demanding Bulloign, and the King of France Tourney: in concluſion theſe demands were waved, and the principal conditions were; firſt concerning the Ladies Joynture; that ſhe ſhould have two and thirty thouſand Crowns of yearly revenues if ſhe ſurvived the King; and then concerning this Peace, that the French King ſhould pay yearly to King Henry, for five years, one hundred thouſand Crowns, and the Peace to continue between them during their lives, and a year after, and bound reciprocally to aſſiſt each other with ten thouſand foot, if the War were by Land, with ſix thouſand, if by Sea. All things thus concluded, the Lady Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen: and on the ſecond of October taking ſhipping, was conducted by the Duke of Norfolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, the Biſhop of Durham, the Earl of Surrey, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Monteagle, Sir Maurice Berkely, Sir John Pechye, Sir William Sands, Sir Thomas Bulleyne, Sir John Carre, and many other Knights and Ladies; but being not paſt half way over the Sea, their Ships by tempeſt were diſperſed, and the Lady with ſome jeopardy landed at Bullen, where Sir Chriſtopher Garniſh was fain to ſtand in the water, and take her in his arms, and ſo ſet her on ſhore; and there the Duke of Vendoſme, with a Cardinal, and many other great States received her. From Bullen the eighth of October ſhe came to Abbevyle, where the Dauphin received her: on the morrow being Saint Dennis day, ſhe came to Saint Dennis, where the marriage between the King of France and her, was ſolemnized (though ſome write it had been ſolemnized before at Abbevyle.) The fifth of November ſhe was Crowned Queen of France, at which time the Dauphin held the Crown over her head as being too maſſie for her to wear; and the day following ſhe was received into Paris in moſt magnificent manner. In honour of whoſe marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin had cauſed a ſolemn Juſts to be proclaimed, which ſhould be kept in Paris the ſeventh of November. Upon report of this Proclamation in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and his four Brothers, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Nevil, Sir Giles Capel, Thomas Cheiney, and others obtained leave of the King to be at the Challenge, where they all behaved themſelves with great valour, but ſpecially the Duke of Suffolk, whoſe glory the Dahupin ſo much envied, that he got a Dutch man, the talleſt and ſtrongeſt man in all the Court of France ſecretly as another perſon to encounter him, with a purpoſe to have the Duke foiled; but indeed it turned to his greater honour: for he foiled the Dutch man in ſuch ſort, that when they came to the Barriers, the Duke by main ſtrength took him about the neck, and ſo pommeled him about the head, that he made the Blood iſſue out at his noſe: many other Princes and Lords did bravely; and after three dayes the Juſts ended.

A Juſts proclaimed in Paris by the Dauphin.

Where Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk won great honour.

King Henry was not long behinde to ſolemnize it in England alſo; for at Greenwich the Chriſtmaſs following, on New-years night, and Twelfth night, he preſented ſuch ſtrange and magnificent devices, as had ſeldom been ſeen; and the third of February following, he held a ſolemn Juſts, where he and the Marqneſs Dorſet anſwered all comers, at which time the King brake three and twenty Spears, and threw to the ground one that encountred him both man and horſe.

The King of France 82. dayes after his marriage dies.

At this time preparation was making for King Henry in perſon to go to Callice, there to meet with the French King and Queen, but death hindered the deſign; for before the next Spring, the firſt of January the French King died at the City of Paris, fourſcore and two dayes after his marriage; teaching others by his example, what it is for an old man to marry a young Lady. King Henry hearing of the French Kings death, ſent the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Richard Winkefield, and Doctor Weſt, to bring over the Queen Dowager, according to the Covenants of the Marriage. Whereupon the Queen was delivered to the Duke by Indenture, who obtaining her good will to be her Husband, (which was no hard matter, that had been her firſt love:) wrote to the King her Brother for his conſent; whereat the King ſeemed to ſtick a while, but at laſt conſented; ſo as he brought her into England unmarried, and then married at his return; but the Duke for more ſurety married her ſecretly in Paris, and after having received her Dower, Apparel, and Jewels, came with her to Callice, and there openly married her with great ſolemnity. At their coming into England, King Henry to ſhew his contentment with the marriage, in the company of the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and the Earl of Eſſex, all richly apparelled, held a new kinde of Juſts, and running courſes on Horſeback in manner Volant, as faſt as one could follow another, to the great delight of the beholders.

The Duke of Suffolk ſent to fetch over the Queen Dowager of France, marries her.

A new kinde of Juſts uſed by King Henry.

This year the King being at his Manour of Oking; Woolſey Archbiſhop of York came and ſhewed him Letters that he was elected Cardinal; for which Dignity he diſabled himſelf, till the King willed him to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him Lord Cardinal, but his Hat and Bull were not yet come: after which Doctor Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellour of England, finding Woolſey, being now Cardinal, to meddle more in his office of Chancellourſhip, than he could well ſuffer, reſigned up the Seal, which the King preſently gave to Woolſey. About this time, Cardinal Campejus was ſent by Pope Leo to King Henry, to ſolicite him to a War againſt the Turk, with whom Cardinal Woolſey was joyned in Commiſſion; who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinal, ſent ſtore of red Cloth to Callice to make them fit followers of ſo great a Lord: and when Campejus was landed at Dover, Cardinal Woolſey cauſed the Gentry of Kent to wait upon him to Blackheath; where he was met and received by the Duke of Norfolk and many Prelates, and there in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, ſhifted himſelf into his Cardinals Robes. Eight Mules he had laden with neceſſaries; but Woolſey not thinking them enough far his honour, ſent him twelve more. But now ſee the ſhame of pride; for in Cheapſide his Mules by ſome miſchance overthrew their Carriages and Coffers on the ground, whoſe lids flying open, ſhewed the world what treaſure it was they carried, old Breeches, Boots, and broken Shooes, broken meat, Marrow-bones, and Cruſts of Bread; expoſing him to the laughter of all the people: yet the Cardinal went jogging on afore with his Croſſes, guilt Axe and Mace, unto Pauls Church; and by the way had an Oration made him by Sir Thomas More, in the name of the City; and then waited on with many Biſhops, was conducted to Bath place, where he was lodged for his own particular: he got well by the Journey, for the King gave him the Biſhoprick of Saliſbury: but the errand he came about, which was to have aid by money for a War againſt the Turk, he could not obtain, for it was well known to be but a device to get money, without any intention of what was pretended.

Woolſey is made a Cardinal, and Lord Chancellour.

In his ſeventh year King Henry kept his Chriſtmaſs at his Manour of Eltham, where on Twelfth night according to his cuſtom, was a ſtately mask of Knights and Ladies, with ſolemn Dancing, and a moſt magnificent Banquet.

An. Reg. 7.

It was now the eighth year of King Henry's Reign, when the new League between him and the French King was proclaimed in the City of London: and this year Margaret Queen of Scots eldeſt Siſter to King Henry, having before married Archibald Douglaſs Earl of Angus; by reaſon of diſſenſion amongſt the Lords of Scotland, was glad with her Husband to flie into England, and to ſeek ſuccour at her Brothers hands; who aſſigned to her the Caſtle of Harbottle in Northumberland to reſide in; where ſhe was delivered of a Daughter named Margaret. From thence the King ſent for her and her Husband to come to his Court, and thereupon upon the third of May, Queen Margaret riding on a white Palfrey (which the Queen of England had ſent her) behinde Sir Thomas Parre, came through London to Baynards Caſtle, and from thence went to Greenwich: but her Huſband the Earl of Angus, was ſecretly before departed into Scotland; which when King Henry heard, he only ſaid it was done like a Scot. And now in honour of his Siſters coming, King Henry the nine and twentieth of May, appointed two ſolemn dayes of Juſts; where the King, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Eſſex, and Nicholas Carew Eſquire, took upon them to anſwer all comers; amongſt others, the King and Sir William Kinſton ran together, which Sir William, though a ſtrong and valorous Knight, yet the King overthrew him to the ground: all the reſt was performed with no leſs valour than magnificence. This year died the King of Aragon, Father to the Queen of England; for whom was kept a ſolemn Obſequy in the Cathedral Church of Pauls; and Queen Margaret, after ſhe had been a year in England, returned into Scotland.

Twelve hundred Carpenters and Maſons ſent to build a Caſtle at Tourney.

In this year were ſent twelve hundred Carpenters and Maſons, with three hundred Labourers, to the City of Tourney in France, to build a Caſtle there, to keep the City in awe. And now the Cardinal being weary of hearing ſo many cauſes himſelf, as were daily brought before him; ordained by the Kings Commiſſion (after the pattern of Moſes) divers under Courts to hear complaints of Suitors: whereof one was kept in Whitehall, another before the Kings Almoner, Doctor Stokſley, a third in the Lord Treaſurers lodging near the Star-Chamber, and the fourth at the Rolls in the afternoon: theſe Courts for a time were much frequented; but at laſt the people perceiving that much delay was uſed in them, and that ſentence given by them bound no man by Law, they thereupon grew weary of them, and reſorted to the common Law. By occaſion of this Government of the Cardinal, who under colour of Juſtice, did what he pleaſed: many great men withdrew themſelves from the Court, as firſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who went and lived in their Dioceſſes; then the Duke of Norfolk, and at length the Duke of Suffolk, being run deep into the Kings debt, by reaſon of his many employments into France, and his great Houſe-keeping ſince his marriage with the Kings Siſter, hoping the King would have forgiven it, and would no doubt have done it, but that the Cardinal oppoſed it, to the end the Duke ſhould be the more at his command.

Cardinal Woolſey erects divers new Courts.

In October this year, Matthew Biſhop of Sion commonly called the Cardinal of the Swizzers came into England from the Emperour Maximilian; by whoſe ſoliciting, and Cardinal Woolſey's perſwaſion, the King lent the Emperour a great ſumme of money; for Woolſey being angry with the King of France for detaining the Revenues of his Biſhoprick of Tourney, perſwaded King Henry, that the beſt way to abate the French Kings power, was to furniſh the Emperour with money, the better to maintain War againſt him: and what Woolſey ſaid, was in thoſe dayes to King Henry an Oracle.

King Henry in great danger by a fall in Hawking.

This year the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at his Manour of Greenwich; where on Twelfth night according to his cuſtom, rare devices with great magnificence were preſented; after which time the King exerciſed himſelf much in Hawking, which was like to have proved no good ſport to him; for one time following his Hawk. and leaping over a Ditch with a Pole, the Pole brake, ſo that if one Edmund Mody a foot-man had not leapt into the water, and lift up his head which was faſt in the clay, he had been drowned.

An Inſurrection in London againſt ſtrangers; eſpecially Artificers.

In this year alſo there happened in the City of London an Inſurrection againſt ſtrangers, ſpecially of Artificers, complaining that ſtrangers were permitted to reſort hither with their Wares, and to exerciſe handy-crafts, to the great hinderance and impoveriſhing the Kings own Subjects; and not only ſo, but that they were borne out in many great Inſolencies, and wrongs they offered to the Engliſh, as one time it happened, a Carpenter in London, called Williamſon, had bought two Pigeons in Cheapſide, and was about to pay for them, when a French man took them out of his hand, ſaying, They were no meat for a Carpenter: Well (ſaid Williamſon) I have bought them, and I will have them; Nay (ſaid the French man) I will have them for my Lord Ambaſſadour; hereupon they grew to words, and complaint was made to the French Ambaſſadour, who ſo aggravated the matter to the Mayor, that the Carpenter was ſent to priſon, and when Sir John Baker ſued to the Ambaſſadour for him, he anſwered, By the Body of God, the Engliſh Knave was worthy to loſe his life for denying any thing to a French man; and other anſwer he could have none. Many like and worſe inſolencies were offered by ſtrangers. which one John Lincoln a Broker drew into a Bill, and prevailed with Doctor Beale, Preacher on Eaſter Tueſday at the Spittle, to read it openly in the Pulpit, which ſo ſtirred up many, that ſtrangers could hardly paſs the ſtreets, but were ſtrucken, and ſometimes beaten down. At laſt, one evening many Prentices, and others aſſembling, rifled ſome ſtrangers houſes, and much miſchief was like to be done: but by the care of the Mayor and Aldermen, and by the induſtry of Robert Brook Recorder, and Sir Thomas More that had been under-Sheriffe of London, they were gotten to be quiet, and many of the diſturbers were ſent to priſon, whereof Lincoln and twelve other were hanged, four hundred more in their ſhirts, bound in ropes and halters about their necks (and thereupon called the black Wagon) were brought to Weſtminſter, where the King himſelf ſate that day; and when the Cardinal had charged them with the greatneſs of their offence; they all cryed, Mercy, Mercy: and then the King by the mouth of the Cardinal, pardoned them all; which clemency purchaſed the King no ſmall love amongſt the people.

How pacified.

An. Reg. 9. 1518.

In his ninth year, in June, King Henry had many Ambaſſadours at his Court; for whoſe entertainment he prepared a coſtly Juſts; himſelf and twelve more againſt the Duke of Suffolk and other twelve. The King had on his head a Ladies ſleeve full of Diamonds, and perhaps perhaps ſomething elſe of the Ladies in his heart, which made him perform his courſes with the applauſe of all beholders. This year, by reaſon of a ſweating ſickneſs Michaelmas Term was adjourned; and the year following, Trinity Term was held one day at Oxford, and then adjourned again to Weſtminſter.

About this time Cardinal Woolſey obtained of Pope Leo authority to diſpenſe with all offences againſt the Spiritual Laws; by virtue whereof he ſet up a Court, and called it, The Court of the Legat, in the which he proved Teſtaments, and heard Cauſes: to the great hindrance of all the Biſhops of the Realm; and to the debauching of Prieſts and Religious perſons, who relying upon his greatneſs, took ſuch a liberty of licentiouſneſs to themſelves, that none was more diſorderly than thoſe that were in Orders: and ſuppoſing perhaps, they might lawfully commit ſuch ſins themſelves, as they forgave to others. And indeed the Cardinals carriage exceeded all bounds of moderation; for when he ſaid Maſs, he made Dukes and Earls to ſerve him of Wine, with a ſay taken, and to hold the Baſon at the Lavatory: and when the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, writing a Letter to him, ſubſcribed, Your Brother William of Canterbury, he took it in great dudgeon to be termed his Brother.

Cardinal Woolſey makes Dukes and Earls to ſerve him of Wine, and to hold the Baſon at the Lavatory.

An. Reg. 10 1519.

It was now the tenth year of King Henry's Reign, when the King of France, longing much to have Tourney reſtored to him, by great gifts and greater promiſes won the Cardinal Woolſey, to move the King in it; who upon his perſwaſions, was contented to be treated withall about it: to which the King of France ſent the Lord Bonquet high Admiral of France, and the Biſhop of Paris, who in their attendance, having above fourſcore Gentlemen, and with their ſervants and all, above twelve hundred, arrived in England; and on Munday the ſeven and twentieth of September, were met at Blackheath by the Earl of Surrey, High Admiral of England, attended likewiſe with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodged at Merchant-Taylors Hall: The laſt of September, the Ambaſſadours went to the King at Greenwich, where after long communication, an Agreement was at laſt concluded under pretence of a marriage to be had between the Dauphin of France and the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England; that in name of her marriage money, Tourney ſhould be delivered to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Caſtle he had made in that City, ſix hundred thouſand Crowns in twelve years, but fifty thouſand Crowns yearly: and if the Marriage ſhould chance not to take effect, then that Tourney ſhould be again reſtored to the King of England; for performance of which Articles, Hoſtages ſhould be delivered: namely, Mounſieur de Memorancie, Mounſieur de Monpeſac, Mounſieur de Moy, and Mounſieur Morret; and moreover, the French King ſhould pay to the Cardinal of England a thouſand Marks yearly, in recompence of his Revenues, received before of his Biſhoprick of Tourney: All things thus concluded, the Cardinal made to the Ambaſſadours a ſolemn Banquet, and after preſented them with a ſtately Mummery. The eighth of October, the King feaſted them at Greenwich, and at night preſented a ſtately Mask of Knights and Ladies, with rare devices and great magnificence: The next day, Sir Thomas Exmew Mayor of London feaſted them at Goldſmiths-Hall, and then delivering their four Hoſtages, they took their leave. At whoſe departure the King gave to the Admiral of France, a garniſh of gilt Veſſel, a pair of covered Baſons gilt, twelve great gilt Bouls, four pair of great gilt Pots, a ſtanding Cup of Gold, garniſhed with great Pearls; and to ſome other he gave Plate, to ſome other Chains of Gold, to ſome rich Apparel: to the great commendation of his liberality. Shortly after their departure, the Earl of Worceſter, Lord Chamberlain, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lord of St. Johns, Sir Nicholas Vaux, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Thomas Bullen, as Ambaſſadours from the King of England, accompanied with Knights, Gentlemen, and others to the number of above four hundred, paſſed over to Callice, and from thence went to Paris; where, after Royal entertainment by the King, with divers Masks and ſtately ſhews, they took their leaves and rode to Tourney to ſee the City delivered to the French men, on the eighth of February, to the great grief of the Engliſh Garriſon. After the Engliſh Ambaſſadours were returned, King Henry to chear up the four French Hoſtages lett here for performance of Covenants, on the ſeventh of May, preſented a ſolemn and ſtately Mask, wherein himſelf, the Duke of Suffolk, and French Queen were Actors: and on the eighth of March following was a ſolemn Juſts holden, and with great magnificence performed.

A Treaty between the Kings of France and England, to have Tourney delivered back, and upon what conditions.

An. Reg. 11. 1520.

In the eleventh year of King Henry's Reign died the Emperour Maximilian, for whom, the King cauſed a ſolemn Obſequie to be kept in Pauls Church. After whoſe death the French King and the King of Spain endeavoured by ſundry plots each of them to get the Empire; but in concluſion, Charles King of Caſtile (afterwards called Charles the fifth) was elected Emperour; for joy whereof a ſolemn Maſs was ſung at Pauls, the ſeventh of July, at which were preſent the Cardinal Campejus, the Cardinal of York, the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk, and Suffolk, with the Ambaſſadours of Spain, France, Venice, and Scotland: And this year the King kept Saint Georges Feaſt at Windſor, with great ſolemnity.

The Emperour Maximilian dieth

Charles King of Caſtile is elected in his place, called Charles the fifth.

At this time divers young Gentlemen that had been in France, after the manner of that Countrey, carried themſelves ſo familiarly with the King, that the Lords of his Council thought it a diſparagement to him; and thereupon, with his leave firſt obtained, they baniſhed them the Court: and in their places brought in more ſtayed and graver men: namely Sir Richard Winkefield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Sir Richard Weſton, and Sir William Kingſton.

Young Gentlemen affect the French fashion, being overfamiliar with the King are baniſhed the Court.

In the Summer of this year, the Queen, lying at her Manour of Havering in Eſſex, deſired the King to bring thither the four Hoſtages of France, to whom ſhe made a Royal Banquet, and in September following, the King lying at his Manour of New-hall in Eſſex, otherwiſe called Beaulieu, where he had newly built a ſtately Manſion, invited the Queen and the French Hoſtages thither, where after a ſumptuous Banquet, he preſented them with an extraordinary Mask; for the Maskers were the Duke of Suffolk, and the Earl of Eſſex, the Marqueſs Dorſet, the Lord Aburgaveny, Sir Richard Winkefield, Sir Richard Weſton, and Sir William Kingſton, the youngeſt of whom was fifty years old at leaſt, that the Ladies might ſee what force they had to make age young again.

A Mask of all Lords.

At this time the French King was very deſirous to ſee the King of England, with whom he had entred into ſuch a League of alliance, and to that end made means to the Cardinal, that there might be an enterview between them at ſome convenient place: to which the Cardinal, not ſo much to ſatisfie the French King, as to ſhew his own greatneſs in France eaſily condeſcended; and thereupon perſwaded King Henry, how neceſſary it was, that ſuch an enterview ſhould be: and then were ſent to Guyſnes, under the rule of Sir Edward Belknappe, ſome ſay three thouſand, but Godwin ſaith eleven hundred; whereof three hundred Maſons, ſix hundred Carpenters, two hundred Painters, Glaſiers, and other Artificers, who ſpent two months erecting the Building builded on the Plain before the Caſtle of Guyſnes, a moſt ſtately Palace of Timber, curiouſly garniſhed without and within: whither both the Kings in June next following, agreeing to come, and to anſwer all comers at the Tilt, Tournies, and Barriers; whereof Proclamation was made in the Court of England by Orleance King of Arms of France, and in the Court of France by Clarentius King of Arms of England: whilſt theſe things were preparing on Candlemas Even, as the King and Queen were come from Even-ſong at their Manour of Greenwich; ſuddenly there blew a Trumpet, and then entred into the Queens Chamber four Gentlemen, who brought with them a Wagon, in which ſate a Lady richly apparelled; which Lady acquainted the King, that the four Gentlemen, there preſent, were come for the Love of their Ladies, to anſwer all comers at the Tilts on a day by the King to be appointed; which day was thereupon appointed on Shrovetueſday next enſuing, where they all behaved themſelves with great valour, to the great delight of the King and Queen.

An enterview agreed upon between the two Kings of France and England

By this time King Henry was ready for his journey into France, and ſo removing from his Manour of Greenwich, on Friday the five and twentieth of May, he with his Queen arrived at Canterbury, where he meant to keep his Whitſuntide. At which time the Emperour Charles, returning out of Spain, arrived on the Coaſt of Kent, where by the Vice-Admiral of England, Sir William Fitz-williams he was conducted to land, and there met and received by the Lord Cardinal in great ſtate. After which the King himſelf rode to Dover, to welcome him; and on Whitſunday early in the morning conducted him to Canterbury, where they ſpent all the Whitſuntide in great joy and ſolace. The chief cauſe that moved the Emperour at this time to come on land, was to have diſſwaded the King from any enterview with the French King. but when he ſaw him ſo forward in that journey, he then only endeavoured to perſwade him, that he ſhould put no truſt in the French Kings words, and with great gifts and promiſes, prevailed with the Cardinal to joyn with him in this perſwaſion. The laſt of May the Emperour took his leave, and the ſame day the King made ſail from Dover and landed at Callice, together with the Queen and many Lords and Ladies. The fourth of June the King and Queen removed from Callice, to his Princely Lodging beſide the Town of Guyſnes, the moſt Royal Building that ever was ſeen; likewiſe Francis the French King had his lodging prepared cloſe to the Town of Ard, in a ſtrange but moſt magnificent faſhion. Both Kings had given power and authority to the Cardinal to affirm and confirm, bind or unbind, whatſoever ſhould be in difference between them; no leſs an honour to the Cardinal than a confidence in the Kings. On Thurſday the ſeventh of June, the Kings met in the vale of Andren ſo magnificently attired, both themſelves and all their followers, that from thence it was called the Camp of cloth of Gold. Here they ſpent that day in loving complements, and at night departed, the one to Guyſnes, the other to Ard. On Saturday the ninth of June, were ſet up in a place within the Engliſh pale two Trees of honour, with ſtately rooms and ſtages for the Queens, and thither the two Kings came, moſt Royally accompanied; where in moſt magnificent manner they performed acts of valour, both on foot and horſeback; and after them all the great Lords both of France and England did the like: this ſolemnity of Juſts and Masks was continued to the four and twentieth day of June; at which time the Kings and Queens took leave of each other: the French King and Queen removed to Ard, the King and Queen of England to Callice, where he remained till the tenth of July, and then riding toward Graveling, was by the way met by the Emperour, and by him conducted thither, and there in moſt Royal manner entertained; whereof when the French King heard, he began from that day forward, to have King Henry in a kinde of jealouſie, as though to love him and the Emperour both were inconſiſtent, and could not ſtand together. On Wedneſday the eleventh of July, the Emperour and his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheſs of Savoy, came with the King of England to the Town of Callice, and there continued with Feaſting, Dancing, and Masking, till the fourteenth of July. In which time, all the Articles of the League of Tripartito, between the Emperour and the Kings of England and France were reviewed; to which the King of France had ſo fully condeſcended, that he had ſent Mounſieur de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of credence; that in the word of a Prince he would inviolably obſerve and keep them all: all which notwithſtanding, he diſpenſed with his conſcience afterward, in breaking them all. On Saturday July 14. the Emperour took his leave and went to Graveling; the King with his Queen returned into England.

The two Kings meet in ſo magnicent manner, that the place was called the Camp of cloth of Gold.

The King of France is jealous of King Henry's kindneſs to the Emperour.

Articles of League between the Emperour and the two Kings of England and France broken by the King of France.

The Emperour Charles comes into England.

It was now the twelfth year of King Henry's Reign, when being returned from Callice, he kept his Chriſtmas at Greenwich with great magnificence; nificence; and on Twelfth-day he and the Earl of Devonshire maintained a solemn Justs against all comers.

The Cardinal had long born a spleen against the Duke of Buckingham, and now finds means to work his will.

The Cardinal had long born a grudge against the Duke of Buckingham, for speaking certain words in his disgrace, and now hath made his way for revenge. It is said that the Duke once holding the Bason to the King; the Cardinal when the King had done, presently dipped his hands in the same water; which the Duke disdaining, shed the water in his Shooes; with which the Cardinal incensed, threatned him that he would sit upon his skirts. The Duke, to shew that the King might take notice of the Cardinals malice, came the next day to Court richly apparelled, but without skirts to his Doublet. The King demanding, what he meant by that strange fashion? he answered readily, that it was done by way of prevention; for now the Cardinal should not sit upon his skirts. But this Jest did the Duke no good, for the Earl of Surrey Lord Admiral, who had married the Dukes Daughter, the Cardinal had caused to be sent Deputy into Ireland, and the Earl of Northumberland, the Dukes special friend, he had caused upon certain suggested crimes to be imprisoned; so as the Duke having his friends sequestred from him, he lay now open to accusations, and accusations shall not be wanting; for the Duke having some time before put from him in displeasure one Charles Knevet, that had been his Surveyor, and inward with him; him the Cardinal gets to him, to see what he could get out of him against the Duke. And whether it was out of desire of revenge, or out of hope of reward, or that the matter was so indeed, this Knevet confessed to the Cardinal, that this Duke had once fully determined to make away the King; being brought into a hope to be King himself by a vain Prephesie, which one Nicholas Hopkins (a Monk of an House of the Charter Order, besides Bristow, called Henton) sometimes his Confessor, had opened to him; and as for the Cardinal, that he had often heard the Duke swear, he would punish him soundly for his manifold misdoings. And now had the Cardinal matter enough for Accusation, which he so aggravated to the King, that the King bade him do with him according to Law. Hereupon the Duke is apprehended, and brought to the Tower by Sir Henry Morney Captain of the Guard, the fifteenth of April, and shortly after in Guildhall before Sir John Brugge, then Lord Mayor, was indicted of divers points of high Treason; the substance whereof was, that in the second year of the Kings Reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the Kings death at London and at Thornbery in Glocestershire; and that in the sixth year of the Kings Reign, he went in person to the Priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him he should be King; and that he had often said to the Lord Aburgaveny, who had married his Daughter, that if King Henry died without issue, he would look to have the Crown himself. Upon these points he was arraigned in Westminster-Hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting then as High Steward of England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marques Dorset, the Earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford and Darby; the Lord of St. Johns de la Ware, Fitz-water, Willoughby, Brook, Cobham, Herbert, and Morley. The Duke pleaded for himself till he sweat again, but all booted not; for by these Peers he was found guilty and condemned, and so on Friday the seventeenth of May, was led by John Keyme, and John Skevinton Sheriffs of London to the Scaffold on Tower-hill, and there beheaded. The Augustine Friers took his body and head, and buried them. This Edward Bohun Duke of Buckingham was the last High-Constable of England the greatest place, next the High Steward, in the Kingdom) whose power extended to restrain some actions of the King. He was also Earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton: He married Eleanor the Daughter of Henry Earl of Northumberland, and had Issue Henry Lord Stafford (Father to Henry Lord Stafford late living) and three Daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, Katharine married to Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmorland, and Mary married to George Nevil Lord of Aburgaveny.

The Duke of Buckingham is beheaded. His Honours and Issue.

The Cardinal is sent to make a Peace between the Emperour and the King of France, but deals not fair in it.

In this mean while, a new War was begun between the Emperour and the King of France; for composing whereof, the Cardinal of York was sent attended with the Earl of Worcester, Lord Chamberlain, the Lord of Saint Johns, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Herbert, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, the Primate of Armagh, Sir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Pechy, Sir John Hussey, Sir Richard Winkefield, Sir Henry Guilford, and many other Knights, Gentlemen, and Doctors. On the twelfth of July he arrived at Callice, whither came to him the Chancellour of France, and the Count de Palice attended with four hundred Horse, as Ambassadours from the French King; and from the Emperour the like, with Commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Ambassadours from the Pope, whom the Cardinal moved to have the Pope to be a party also in their League, but they wanting Commission, Letters were presently sent to Rome about it, and in the time till answer might be had, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to speak with the Emperour, with whom having stayed thirteen dayes, after most Royal Entertainment, he returned back to Callice; and then fell presently to the Treaty of Peace with the French Commissioners, but was colder in the matter than he was before, as having had his edge taken off by some dealings with the Emperour, so as nothing was concluded; but that the Fishermen of both the Princes might freely Fish on the Seas without disturbance, till the end of February following; whereof he sent advertisement to both the Princes; to the Emperour by the Lord of Saint Johns, and Sir Thomas Bullen; to the French King by the Earl of Worcester, and the Bishop of Ely. During all which time of the Cardinals stay in Callice, all Writs and Patents were there by him sealed, and no Sheriffe could be chosen for lack of his presence, having the Great Seal there with him, and full power in things, as if the King had been there in person. Before he returned, he made a new League with the Emperour, and intimated to the French King, that he doubted the King of England would not hereafter be ſo much his friend, as heretofore he had been; whereat, though the King of France were much offended, yet he ſignified by his Letters (perhaps diſſemblingly) that he would continue the King of Englands friend as much as ever: only he inveighed againſt the Cardinal, as a man of no truth, and withdrew many Penſions which he had before given to ſome Engliſh. Preſently upon this, was Tourney beſieged by the Lord Hugh de Moncada a Spaniard; and though the French King ſent great Forces to ſuccour it; yet it was rendred up to the Emperour the laſt of November, in the thirteenth year of King Henry's Reign.

The Cardinal ſeeks to be Pope, but too late.

This year Pope Leo died the firſt of December, ſuſpected to be poyſoned by Barnaby Maleſpina his Chamberlain, whoſe Office was alwayes to give him drink. After whoſe death, Doctor Pace was ſent to Rome, to make friends in the behalf of the Cardinal of York; who was brought into a hope through the Kings favour to be elected Pope: but that hope was ſoon quailed; for before Doctor Pace could get to Rome, Adrian the ſixth was choſen Pope. This Doctor Pace was a very Learned and Religious man, yet through croſſes in his employment fell mad and died; in whoſe place of employment ſucceeded Doctor Stephen Gardiner.

An. Reg. 13. 1522.

On the ſecond of February, King Henry being then at Greenwich, received a Bull from the Pope, whereby he had the Title given him to be Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, for him and his Succeſſors for ever; which Title was aſcribed to him for writing a Book againſt Luther, as it was given out; but thought to be written by Sir Thomas Moor, or by Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter: of which Book (ſaith Holingſhead) I will only ſay thus much, that King Henry in his Book, is reported to rage againſt the Devil and Antichriſt, to caſt out his foam againg Luther, to raſe out the Name of the Pope, and yet to allow his Law. Which Book Luther anſwered with as little reſpect to the King, as the King had done to him.

King Henry for writing a Book againſt Luther, hath the Title given him to be Defender of the Faith.

In this mean time, many diſpleaſures grew between the two Kings of England and France, ſpecially two: one, that French men ſeized upon Engliſh Ships as they paſſed: for remedy whereof, one Chriſtopher Cee an expert Sea-man, was ſent with ſix Ships to ſafeguard the Merchants. Another, that the Duke of Albany was returned into Scotland, contrary to that which was covenanted by the League; which though the King of France denied to be done with his privity, yet King Henry knew the Duke of Albany had Commiſſion from the French King to return, which did the more exaſperate him; and hereupon were Muſters made in England, and a note taken of what ſubſtance all men were.

This year died the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Edward Pelknappe, all valiant Captains, ſuſpected to have been poyſoned at a Banquet made at Ard, when the two Kings met laſt.

At this time Owen Dowglaſs Biſhop of Dunkell fled out of Scotland into England, becauſe the Duke of Albany, being come thither, had taken upon him the whole government of the King and Kingdom; whereupon Clarenteaux the Herauld was ſent into Scotland, to command the Duke of Albany to avoid that Realm; which he refuſing, the Herauld was commanded to defie him. Thereupon the French King ſeized all Engliſh mens goods in Bourdeaux, and impriſoned their perſons; and retained not only the money to be paid for the reſtitution of Tourney, but alſo withheld the French Queens Dower: whereof, when King Henry underſtood, he called the French Ambaſſadour reſiding in England, to give account thereof; who though he gave the beſt reaſons he could to excuſe it, yet was commanded to keep his houſe; and the French Hoſtages remaining here, for the money to be paid for the delivery of Tourney, were reſtrained of their liberty, and committed to the cuſtody of the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Andrew Windſor, and Sir Thomas Nevyle; each of them to keep one; and withall, all French men in London were committed to priſon, and put to their Fines; and all Scotch men much more. There were then alſo ſent to Sea under the conduct of Sir William Fitz-Williams Vice-Admiral, eight and twenty great Ships, and ſeven more towards Scotland; who ſet fire on many Scottiſh Ships in the Haven, and at length took many priſoners and returned.

Upon differences between the Kings of England and France, the French Ambaſſadour is commanded to keep his houſe.

King Henry hearing, that the Emperour would come to Callice, ſo to paſs into England, as he went into Spain; appointed the Lord Marqueſs Dorſet, to go to Callice, there to receive him, and the Cardinal to receive him at Dover. The Cardinal taking his journey thither on the tenth of May, rode through London, accompanyed with two Earls, ſix and thirty Knights, and a hundred Gentlemen, eight Biſhops, ten Abbots, thirty Chaplains, all in Velvet and Sattin; and Yeomen ſeven hundred. The five and twentieth of May being Sunday, the Marqueſs Dorſet with the Biſhop of Chicheſter, the Lord de la Ware, and divers others, at the water of Graveling, received the Emperour, and with all honour brought him to Callice, where he was received with Proceſſion, by the Lord Berners Lieutenant of the Town. On Munday he took Shipping at Callice, and landed at Dover; where the Cardinal with three hundred Lords, Knights and Gentlemen received him, and in great ſtate brought him to the Caſtle, where he was lodged. On Wedneſday being Aſcenſion Even, the King came to Dover, and there with great joy and gladneſs the Emperour and he met. On Friday in the afternoon they departed from Dover, and came that night to Canterbury, and from thence next day to Greenwich; where the Queen received her Nephew with all the joy that might be. Here to honour the Emperours preſence, Royal Juſts and Turneys were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonſhire, and ten Aids, kept the place againſt the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and other ten Aids, on their part. On Friday the ſixth of June, the Emperour and the King with all their Companies went to London, where the City

The Emperour comes into England, and with what ſtate he is received.

City received them with Pageants, and other as rare devices, as at a Coronation, and the Emperour was lodged at the Black-fryers, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whitſunday the King and the Emperour rode to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where the Cardinal ſung Maſs, and had his Traverſe and his Cup-board. Before Maſs, two Barons gave him water, and after the Goſpel, two Earls, and at the laſt Lavotary two Dukes, which pride the Spaniards much diſdained. After many Feaſtings in other places, at laſt they rode to Windſor, where they ſtayed a whole week; and there, on Corpus Chriſti day, the Emperour wore the Mantle of the Garter, and ſate in his own Stall. On the ſame day both the Princes received the Sacrament, and took their Oaths to obſerve the League concluded between them. On the morrow after, they came to Wincheſter; before whoſe coming thither there was come to Hampton, the Earl of Surrey Admiral of England, with all the Kings Navy, and with him the Lord Fitz-water, the Baron Curſon, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Richard Winkefield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, Sir William Barentine, Sir Adrian Foskew, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Anthony Poyns, Sir Henry Sherbourn, and the Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-williams, Sir Edmund Bray, Sir Giles Capel, Sir William Pirton, John Cornwallis, Sir John Wallop, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir William Sidney, Anthony Brown, Giles Huſſey, Thomas Moor, John Ruſſel, Edward Bray, Henry Owen, George Cobham, Thomas Oldhall, Thomas Lovel, Robert Ichingham, Anthony Knevet, Sir John Tremaile, Sir William Skevington Maſter of the Ordinance, and John Fabian Serjeant at Arms, by whom chiefly a deſign was moved, though now noiſed only that it was but to ſcour the Seas for the ſafe conducting of the Emperour. For the Earl of Surrey, having wafted the Emperour over to the Coaſt of Biskay, upon his return, made to the Coaſt of Britain; and there landing ſeven thouſand of his men, marched to the Town of Morleys, and by aſſault took it: having won this Town the Earl called to him certain Gentlemen and made them Knights; as Sir Francis Brian, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas Moor, Sir Giles Huſſey, Sir John Ruſſel, Sir John Rainsford, Sir George Cobham, Sir John Cornwallis, Sir Edward Ridgley, and ſome others; and after the Earl had lien a while on the Coaſt of Britain, he was commanded home by the Kings Letters: who thereupon brought back his whole Fleet to a place called the Cow under the Iſle of Wight, and then went on land, leaving divers of his Ships under the Governance of the Vice Admiral Sir William Fitz-williams.

The Earl of Surrey Admiral, ſurprizeth Morleys in France.

In this mean time divers exploits were atchieved between them of the Garriſon in the Marches of Callice, and the French men of Bulloign; where the French commonly had the worſt: but being of no great moment, may well be paſſed over without relating. Likewiſe at the ſame time the Lord Roſs, and the Lord Dacres of the North, appointed to keep the Borders againſt Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelſie, and fourſcore Villages, and overthrew eighteen Towers of ſtone, with all their Bulwarks.

The Earl of Surrey wins many Towns in France.

King Henry intending now to go ſeriouſly on with his Wars in France, levied an Army, which under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey, he ſent over to Callice; whither the Earl being come, he divided his Army into three Battels; the firſt was led by Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water, the middleward by himſelf and his Brother the Lord Edmund Howard, the Rereward by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Winkefield, both of them Knights of the Garter: and Sir Edmund Guilford was Captain of the Horſemen. In this Order the Earl entred the French ground the ſecond of September, and took his Journey towards Hedring. By the way there came to him a great power of Burgognians, ſent by the Lady Margaret, according to the Articles of the League. All the Towns, Villages, and Caſtles in the Countrey, through which they paſſed, they burnt and ſacked; as the Town and Caſtle of Selloys, the Town of Brunbrigge, Senkerk, Botington, and Manſtier, with divers others. On the 16. of September, they came before the Caſtle of Hedring, and laid ſiege unto it; but the Caſtle being well fortified, and the Earl having not battering Ordinance, which by reaſon of the foul weather, he could not bring with him, after eleven dayes he raiſed his ſiege; and paſſing foom thence to Dorlens, burnt the Town and raſed the Caſtle, as alſo the Town of Dortier, and then the year being far ſpent, came back to Callice the ſixteenth of October.

At this time the Duke of Albany, being eſtabliſhed Governour of Scotland, raiſed an Army of fourſcore thouſand men, with which he approached the Borders, but made no Invaſion, as thinking perhaps that the only report of his great Army would fright the Engliſh; but yet this ſtayed not the Lord Marquels Dorſet, Warden of the Eaſt and middle Marches, to enter into Tividale, and ſo forward ten Miles into Galloway, burning all Towns and Villages on every ſide as he paſſed. All that night he tarried within the Scottiſh ground, and the next day being Good-Friday, withdrew back into England, with a head of four thouſand Cattel; having burned Grimſeley, Mowhouſe, Donford, Myles, Ackforth, Crowling, and many other Towns and Villages.

An. Reg. 14 1523.

A Parliament holden at Black-Fryers.

In King Henry's fourteenth year, on the fifteenth of April began a Parliament, which was holden at the Black-fryers, whither the King came, and there ſate down in his Royal Seat; at his feet on the right ſide ſate the Cardinal of York, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and at the Rail behind ſtood Doctor Tunſtal Biſhop of London, who making an Oration, told there the cauſes of calling this Parliament; which were (as he ſaid) for remedying of miſchiefs by the Common Law, as Recoveries, Foreign Vouchers, and corrupt Trials; and for making new Laws for the good of the Commonwealth; whereof notwithſtanding, no one word was ſpoken all the time of the Parliament, nor any other thing done, but a Subſidy granted; but howſoever, being commanded to chuſe their Speaker, they choſe Sir Thomas More, who at firſt diſabling himſelf, at laſt made two Petitions ons to the King; one for himſelf, that if he ſhould be ſent by the Commons to the King on a Meſſage, and miſtake their intent, he might then with the Kings pleaſure reſort again to the Commons, to know their meaning. The other, for the Houſe of Commons, that if in communication and reaſoning, any man ſhould ſpeak more largely than of duty he ought to do, yet all ſuch offences ſhould be pardoned, and that to be entred of Record. Which Petitions were granted, and then the Parliament began; where at firſt a Subſidy was demanded, but as there was much ado in the Houſe of Commons about it, ſo there was no leſs amongſt the Clergy in the Convocation Houſe; for Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter and John Biſhop of Rocheſter were much againſt it, but moſt of all, one Rowland Philips, Vicar of Croydon, and a Canon of Pauls; but the Cardinal, taking him aſide, dealt ſo with him, that he took him off, ſo as he came no more to the Houſe; and then the Bell-weather (as one ſaith) giving over his hold, the reſt ſoon yielded; and ſo was granted the half of all their ſpiritual yearly Revenues, to be paid in five years following. The Clergy being thus brought on, on the nine and twentieth of April, the Cardinal came into the Houſe of Commons, to work them alſo; and there, ſhewing the great charges the King was neceſſarily to be at in his preſent Wars, demanded the ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed of the fifth part of every mans Goods and Lands, which was four ſhillings of every pound. This demand was enforced the day after by the Speaker Sir Thomas More; but the Burgeſſes were all againſt it, ſhewing that it was not poſſible to have it gathered in money; for that men of Lands had not the fifth part thereof in Coyn. And further alledged, that there be not many Pariſhes in England, one with another, able to ſpare a hundred Marks, except Cities and Towns; and ſeeing there were not above thirteen thouſand Pariſhes in the Kingdom, (at this day there are but 9285.) how could ſuch a ſumme be raiſed? Hereupon certain of the Houſe were ſent to move the Cardinal, to be a means to the King to accept of a leſſer ſum; but the Cardinal anſwered, he would rather have his tongue plucked out of his mouth with a pair of Pincers, then make to the King any ſuch motion. Whereupon the Cardinal came again into the Houſe, and deſired that he might reaſon with them that were againſt the demand; to which it was anſwered, that the order of that Houſe was to hear, and not to reaſon, except amongſt themſelves. When the Cardinal was gone, the Commons, after long debating the matter, at laſt agreed of two ſhillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upward, and from forty ſhillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty ſhillings twelve pence, and under forty ſhillings of every head of ſixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in two years: when this was told to the Cardinal, he was much offended; ſo that to pleaſe him, the Gentlemen of fifty pound Land and upward, by the motion of Sir John Huſſey, a Knight of Lincolnſhire, were charged with twelve pence more in the pound, to be paid in three years.

A Subſidy with much ado granted.

How many Pariſhes in the Kingdom.

The Cardinal to move them to it, bore them in hand, that the Lords had agreed to four ſhillings of the pound; which was untrue, for the Lords had granted nothing, but ſtayed to ſee what the Commons would do; whereof when the King heard, he reproved the Cardinal for it; ſaying withal, that ere it were long he would look to things himſelf, without any Subſtitute. Which ſpeech of the Kings, though it danted the Cardinal for a while, yet he ſoon recovered his ſpirits, and was as peremptory afterward as he had been before. After this the Parliament was Prorogued till the tenth of June; during which Prorogation, the Common people ſaid to the Burgeſſes. We hear ſay, you will grant four ſhillings of the pound, we adviſe you not to do ſo, that you may go home, with many like threatnings. At this time, the Cardinal, by his power Legantine, diſſolved his Convocation at Pauls, convoked by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, calling him and all the Clergy to the Convocation at Weſtminſter: which was never ſeen before in England (ſaith Hall. The one and thirtieth of July, the Parliament was adjourned to Weſtminſter; and there continuing till the thirteenth of Auguſt, was that day at nine of the clock at night diſſolved.

The Cardinal makes a falſe report to the Houſe of Commons.

About this time the Biſhop of Durham died, and the King gave that Biſhoprick to the Cardinal; who reſigned the Biſhoprick of Bath to Doctor John Clerk, Maſter of the Rolls; and Sir Henry Marney, that was Vice-Chamberlain, was made Lord Privy Seal, and ſhortly after was created Lord Marney: Alſo during this Parliament, Sir Arthur Plantagenet, Baſtard Son to King Edward the fourth, at Bridewel, was created Vicount Liſle, in the right of his Wife, who was Wife before to Edmund Dudley, beheaded.

Sir Henry Marney created Lord Marney.

The fifteenth of June, in the fifteenth year of the Kings Reign, Chriſtian King of Denmark with his Queen, driven out of his own Countrey, came into England, and was lodged at Bath place; who, after he had been feaſted by the King, and by the City of London, and received great gifts of both, returned again into Flanders, where he remained as a baniſhed man: ſome years after, King Henry ſent Doctor Henry Standiſh, Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and Sir John Baker Knight, into Denmark, to perſwade the people to receive him again into his Kingdom; but they could not prevail, he was ſo much hated for his cruelty.

An. Reg. 15 1524.

About this time the Earl of Kildare, having recovered again the favour of the Cardinal, was ſent Deputy into Ireland, as he had been before, where he reduced the wild Iriſh to indifferent conformity. All this while had England Wars both with the French and with the Scots. In Scotland the Marqueſs of Dorſet threw down the Caſtles of Wederborne, of Neſgate, of Blackater, of Mackwalls, and burnt to the number of ſeven and thirty Villages, yet never came to skirmiſh. In France the Lord Sands, Treaſurer of Callice, with twelve hundred men went before Bulloigne, where he skirmiſhed with the Enemy; and after taking divers Churches and Caſtles in the Enemies Countrey, returned back to Callice, with the loſs loſs only of a dozen men. King Henry being advertiſed that the Duke of Albany was providing of Forces in France, with which to return into Scotland, ſent forth his Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-williams, with divers great Ships to intercept him; but when he could not meet with him, he then landed in the Haven of Treport; where with ſeven hundred men, he beat ſix thouſand French that ſought to impeach his landing, took their Bulwarks and much Ordinance in them, burned the Suburbs of the Town of Treport, and all in five hours, and then returned.

Sir William Fitz-williams with 700 beat ſix thouſand French.

All this while King Henry had plaid with the French, but now he means to be in earneſt, and therefore ſends over the Duke of Suffolk with an Army, the four and twentieth of Auguſt; attended with the Lord Montacute and his Brother Sir Arthur Pool, the Lord Herbert, Son to the Earl of Worceſter, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Marney, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkley, the Lord Powis, and the Baron Curſon, Sir Richard Winkefield, Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, Sir John Vere, Sir Edward Nevil, Sir William Kingſtone, Sir Richard Weſton, Sir Andrew Winſore, Sir Robert Winkefield, Sir Anthony Winkefield, Sir Edward Guilford, Sir Edward Grevile, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir Everard Digby, Sir Adrian Foskew, Sir Richard Cornwal, Sir William Courtney, Sir William Sidney, Sir Henry Owin, and many other Knights and Gentlemen. In the whole Army were ſix hundred Demi-launces, two hundred Archers on Horſeback, three thouſand Archers on foot, and five thouſand Bill-men. Alſo ſeventeen hundred taken out of the Garriſons of Hammes, Guiſnes, and Callice, in all ten thouſand and five hundred, beſides two thouſand ſix hundred Labourers and Pioneers. With this Army the Duke of Suffolk took the field, his Vantguard was led by the Lord Sands; the Captain of the right Wing was Sir William Kingſton, and of the left Sir Everard Digby: the Captain of all the Horſemen was Sir Edward Guilford, Marſhal of Callice; the Duke himſelf led the Battel, and Sir Richard Winkefield the Rereward. The Dukes enterpriſe was the winning of Bell Caſtle, which the Lord Sands and the Lord Ferrers aſſaulted, and had it yielded to them. and then Sir William Skevington was placed Captain in it. At this time the Duke of Bourbon, high Conſtable of France, began to have his minde alienated from the King of France, and to draw him the more on, the Duke of Suffolk ſent Sir John Ruſſel (afterward created Duke of Bedford) to him, who paſſing in diſguiſed Apparel, ſo prevailed with him, that he profeſſed to take part with the Emperour, and the King of England; who having ten thouſand Almains in his pay, it was thought fit (for encouragement of the Engliſh) to proclaim in the Army the acceſs of ſo powerful an aſſiſtant: and thereupon the Duke of Suffolk removed to Ard, and ſo forward into Picardy. At Cordes between Terwin and St. Omers, there came to him the Lord of Iſilſtein, and with him of Spaniards, Almans, and others, three thouſand footmen, and five hundred Horſe. With theſe Forces, the Duke marching on, took firſt the rich Town of Anchor, then the Caſtle of Bounguard, and then by aſſault the Town of Bray, though two thouſand good men of War were in it: After this, the Towns of Cappe, and Roy, Lihome and Davenker. And then came before the Town of Mount-Dedier, in which were a thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; yet upon Sir William Skeuingtons Batteries, was yielded to him. From hence he removed to Roy, where he reſted a while with his whole Army: and there on Alholland day, in the chief Church of Roy, made Knights, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Powis, Oliver Manners, Arthur Pool, Richard Sands, Robert Jerningham, Robert Salisbury, Edward Beningfield, Richard Corbert, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantel, George Warram, and Edward Seymor (that was after Duke of Somerſet.) The day after, the Army removed to a place called Neele, from thence to Veane, and then to Beauford, where the Duke made John Dudley, and Robert Utreight Knights, and from thence on the eighth of November, to a place called Mount Saint Martin; here the Welſhmen began to murmure, that they might not return home, the Winter being ſo far ſpent; but there was to the number of a thouſand perſons, under the leading of Sir John Walloppe, who having no wages but what they could get by booties, and were therefore called Adventurers, and by ſome Kreekers, and theſe had more deſire to ſtay, than the Welſhmen had to be gone; for the great gains they made by the ſpoils of ſo many Towns that were taken. The thirteenth of November the Duke removed to a place within two miles of Boghan Caſtle, defended by great Mariſhes, that lay before it, but the Froſt being at that time ſo great that many loſt their Fingers and Toes with cold, and ſome died; Sir Edward Guilford acquainted the Duke, that he thought the Mariſhes were hard enough frozen to bear great Ordinance; whereupon the Duke bid him venture it then and go on, which he reſolutely did, and had the Caſtle preſently delivered up to him. In this mean time, the King hearing in what ſtate the Army ſtood, had prepared ſix thouſand men to be ſent to the Duke for a relief, under the leading of the Lord Montjoy; but before they could be put in order to paſs the Sea, the Duke, partly by extremity of the weather, and partly by the murmuring of the Souldiers, was conſtrained to break up his Army, and return to Callice.

How marſhalled.

He wins many Towns.

A great Froſt.

In this mean time, the Scots knowing that the ſtrength of England was gone into France, took boldneſs to invade the Marches; but then the Earl of Surrey, Treaſurer and High Admiral of England, with ſix thouſand men, being ſent againſt them, took divers of their Caſtles and Holds; and at Tedworth, skirmiſhing with a great Garriſon of Scots, overthrew them, and took and burned both the Town and Caſtle. And now the French King finding that the Scots did not work any great trouble to the Engliſh, whereby to keep them from moleſting of France, and thinking it to be for want of the Duke of Albanies preſence, whom they accounted their Governour, he therefore prepared a Navy of Ships to tranſport him into Scotland; but when the Duke of Albany heard heard that Sir William Fitz-williams was ſent with a great Fleet to ſtop his paſſage, he brought his Ships into the Haven of Breſt, and gave it out that he would not go into Scotland that year; which being told to the King of England, he commanded that his Ships alſo ſhould be laid up in Havens till the next Spring. And now ſee the cunning of the Scot; for when he ſaw the Kings Ships diſcharged, he then boldly took Shipping himſelf, and ſailed into Scotland; whither being come he preſently levyed a great Army, and approached the Engliſh Borders; but when he heard the Earl of Surrey was coming againſt him with a mighty power, he then ſent a Herauld to him, promiſing of his Honour, to give him Battel; and if he took him priſoner, to give him good quarter. To whom the Earl anſwered, that he would not fail to abide his Battel; but if he took him priſoner, the quarter, he would give him, ſhould be to cut off his head, and ſend it for a Preſent to his Maſter the King of England. At this time, the Earl of Surrey being at Alnewick, came the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland, the Lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Ogle, and Darcie, with many Knights, Gentlemen, and other Souldiers, to the number of forty thouſand: and from the Court came the Maſter of the Horſe, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Edward Baynton, and others. The laſt of October, the Duke of Albany ſent two or three thouſand men over the water to beſiege the Caſtle of Warke; who by battery of their Ordinance won the outermoſt Ward, called the Barnekins; and continuing their battery, won the ſecond Ward; but then Sir William Liſle, that was Captain of the Caſtle, iſſuing forth with thoſe few he had left, drove the French men from the place, and ſlew of them to the number of three hundred: a memorable ſervice, and for which the Earl of Surrey afterwards gave him great thanks. The Earl would gladly have followed his Enemies into their own Borders, but that his Commiſſion was only to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after the Queen of Scots, Mother to the King, ſent to her Brother the King of England, for an abſtinence from War, till a further communication might be had; which being granted, the Engliſh Army brake up, and the Earl of Surrey returned to the Court.

And now for a while we muſt be content to hear of petty occurrences, becauſe greater did not happen; which if it make us like the ſtory the worſe, it may make us like the times the better; ſeeing they are ever the beſt times that afford leaſt matter to be talked of: but this time will laſt but a while; for ſhortly we ſhall come to hear Occurrences, that have been matter of talk to this day, whereof the like have never ſcarce been ſeen, and will hardly be believed, when they are heard; a Marriage diſſolved after twenty years conſummation; Houſes built in Piety, under pretence of Piety demoliſhed; a King made a Captive; a Pope held a Priſoner; Queens taken out of love, put to death out of loathing; and the Church it ſelf ſhaken, that it hath ſtood in diſtraction ever ſince.

At this time the Emperour Charles ſent to the King of England two Mules trapped in Crimſon Velvet, richly embroydered; alſo eleven goodly Jennets trapped with Ruſſet Velvet, richly wrought; four Spears, and two Javelins of ſtrange Timber, and work richly garniſhed; and five Brace of Grey-hounds. To the Queen he ſent two Mules richly trapped, and high Chairs after the Spaniſh faſhion: which Preſents were thankfully received both of the King and Queen.

At this time in the month of October the Cardinal ſent out Commiſſions, that every man, being worth forty pounds, ſhould pay the whole Subſidy before granted, out of hand; which he called an Anticipation: which fine new word, he thought, would make them pay their money the more willingly; but they loved their money better than any words he could deviſe.

The Cardinal requires the ſubſidy to be paid by Anticipation.

In this year the King ſent the Lord Morley, Sir William Huſſey Knight, and Doctor Lee his Almoner, to Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, with the Order of the Garter; which he received in the Town of Norenberg, to his great contentment.

In this year, through Books of Prognoſtications, foreſhewing much hurt to come by waters and floods, many perſons withdrew themſelves to high grounds, for fear of drowning; ſpecially one Bolton, Prior of Saint Bartholomews in Smithfield, builded him an Houſe upon Harrow on the Hill, and thither went and made proviſion for two months. Theſe great waters ſhould have fallen in February, but no ſuch thing happening, the Aſtronomers excuſed themſelves, by ſaying, that in the computation they had miſcounted in their number an hundred years.

A great Inundation threatned by Prognoſtication, but miſtaken.

In this mean time, many enterpriſes were attempted, between the Engliſh men of Callice and Guyſnes, and the French men of Bulloign and the Frontiers of Picardie; and ſtill Sir William Fitz-williams Captain of Guyſnes, Sir Robert Jerningham, Captain of Newnham Bridge, Sir John Walloppe, and Sir John Gage, were the men that did the French moſt hurt.

This year, the firſt of September, was Doctor Thomas Hannibal Maſter of the Rolls received into London, by Earls, Biſhops, and divers Lords and Gentlemen, as Ambaſſadour from Pope Clement; who brought with him a Roſe of Gold for a preſent to the King: and on the day of the Nativity of our Lady, after a ſolemn Maſs ſung by the Cardinal of York, the ſaid Preſent was delivered to the King, which was a Tree forged of fine Gold, and with Branches, Leaves, and Flowers reſembling Roſes.

A Preſent ſent to the King from the Pope.

About the beginning of Winter, the Adventurers called Kreekers being not above two hundred, and of them five and twenty Horſemen, made an attempt to fetch ſome booty from a Village not far from Muttrell; whereof the Earl of Dammartin having notice, he ſet upon them with a far greater number, and ſlew moſt of them; and this was the end of the Kreekers, as brave men as ever ſerved any Prince.

The Adventurers called Kreekers, all deſtroyed.

In December this year, there came to London divers Ambaſſadours out of Scotland, about a Peace to be had; and a marriage to be concluded, between the King of Scots, and the the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England.

At this time the Lord Leonard Gray, and the Lord John Gray, Brothers to the Lord Marqueſs Dorſet, Sir George Colham Son to the Lord Cobham, William Cary, Sir John Dudley, Thomas Wyat, Francis Points, Francis Sidney, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Edward Seymour, Oliver Manners, Percival Hart, Sebaſtian Newdigate, and Thomas Calen, Eſquires of the Kings Houſhold, made a challenge of Arms againſt the Feaſt of Chriſtmaſs, which was proclaimed by Windſor the Herauld, and performed at the time appointed very nobly, as Tilts, Turneys, Barriers, and the aſſault of a Caſtle erected for that purpoſe, in the Tilt-yard at Greenwich, where the King held his Chriſtmaſs that year with great ſtate and magnificence.

1525. About this time, John Jokin Steward of the Houſhold to the French Kings Mother, came into England, and was received in ſecret manner, into the houſe of one Doctor Larke, a Prebendary of Saint Stephens; who oftentimes talked with the Cardinal, about a Peace to be concluded between the two Kings of England and France: of whoſe often Meetings Mounſieur de Prate the Emperours Ambaſſadour grew very jealous. The four and twentieth of January, Mounſieur Brynion, Preſident of Roan, came to London as Ambaſſadour from the French King, and was lodged with the ſaid John Jokin; which ſmall things ſhould not be related, but that they were preparatives to great matters afterward.

On Sunday the fifth of March, were received into London Mounſieur de Bever Lord of Campher, Admiral of Flanders, Mounſieur John de la Cooſe Preſident of Malines, and Maſter John de la Gache, as Ambaſſadours from the Lady Margaret in the name of the Emperour, who required three things. Firſt they demanded the Lady Mary the Kings only Daughter to be preſently delivered, and ſhe to be named Empreſs, and as Governeſs take poſſeſſion of all the Low-Countreys. Secondly, that all ſuch ſummes of money as the King ſhould give with her in Marriage ſhould be paid incontinently. Thirdly, that the King of England ſhould paſs the Sea in perſon, and make War in France the next Summer. The firſt two demands were not agreed to for certain cauſes; and as to the third, the King ſaid he would take time to adviſe. On Thurſday the ninth of March a Gentleman came in Poſt from the Lady Margaret, with Letters ſignifying, that whereas the King of France had lien long at the ſiege of Pavia, he had now been forced to raiſe his ſiege, and was himſelf taken priſoner by the Imperialiſts; for joy whereof, Bonfires and great Triumph was made in London, and on the twentieth of March being Sunday, the King himſelf came to Pauls, and there heard a ſolemn Maſs. But for all this ſhew of joy, it was thought, if the King of France had not now been taken priſoner, that the King of England would have joyned in amity with him, as being angry with the Flemings, for Inhanſing his Coyn in Flanders, which cauſed much money to be conveyed out of England thither. The King of France being taken priſoner, was after ſome time conveyed into Spain, and at laſt brought to Madrill, where he fell ſo ſick, that the Phyſicians had little hope of his life, unleſs the Emperour would be pleaſed ſpeedily to viſit him; upon whoſe viſitation he recovered his health, though not preſently his ſtrength: In which time many propoſitions were made for his delivery, but the Emperour would accept of none, without reſtitution of the Dutchy of Burgoigne. At laſt, the French King weary of impriſonment, and longing for liberty, was content to agree to any conditions: the chief whereof were, that the French King by a certain day ſhould be ſet at liberty, and within ſix weeks after ſhould reſign to the Emperour the Dutchy of Burgoigne; with all Members pertaining to it; and at the ſame inſtant, ſhould put into the Emperours hands the Dauphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleance his ſecond Son, or elſe twelve principal Lords of France, whom the Emperour ſhould name; and that there ſhould be between them a League, and perpetual confederation for defence of their eſtates. Of whoſe attonement when King Henry heard, as before he had expreſſed gladneſs that he was taken priſoner, ſo now he ſent Sir Thomas Cheiney to him, to expreſs his joy for being ſet at liberty; ſo ſudden is the interchange of love and hate amongſt great Princes. The French King being thus delivered, the Emperour married the Lady Iſabel, Daughter to Emanuel King of Portugal, and had with her in Dower eleven hundred thouſand Duckets; though three years before, being at Windſor, he had covenanted to take to Wife the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter.

The King of France is taken priſoner

Upon delivery of the Dutchy of Burgoigne to the Emperour he is ſet at liberty.

At this time Cardinal Woolſey obtained Licenſe of the King to erect a Colledge at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich; and towards the charge of them got leave alſo to ſuppreſs certain ſmall Monaſteries, to the number of forty; and after got a Confirmation of the Pope, that he might employ the Goods and Lands belonging to thoſe Houſes, to the maintenance of thoſe two Colledges: a pernicious Precedent, and that which made the King a way afterward, to make a general ſuppreſſion of all Religious Houſes; though indeed there be great difference between converting of Monaſteries into Colledges, and utter ſubverting them.

The Cardinal ſuppreſſeth forty Monaſteries, towards the erecting of two Colledges.

In March King Henry ſent Cutbert Tunſtal Biſhop of London, and Sir Richard Winkefield Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, into Spain, to confer with the Emperour about matters of great importance, and particularly about War to be made in France; and yet were theſe two Princes at this time in League: but he that ſhall obſerve the carriage of theſe two Princes towards one another, and how convertible their Leagues were into War, and their War into Peace, ſhall finde it a ſtrange Riddle of Ragion di ſtato, and their Leagues to have been but meer complements, where the ſcale was turned with the leaſt grain of a circumſtance; and though they were bound by Oath, yet that Oath made the Leagues but little the firmer, ſeeing the League might be broken, and yet the Oath kept; for while one gave the occaſion, and the other took it, though they were both acceſſaries, yet neither was principal; and where there is not a principal, the Oath remains inviolate. And upon thoſe hinges did the friendſhip of theſe Princes turn, as at this time the Emperour, though not long before he had parted with the King of England in the greateſt kindneſs that could be, yet gave not the Engliſh Ambaſſadours ſo kind entertainment now, as he had formerly done; but for what cauſe was not apparent, unleſs upon ſome ſiniſter report made to him, by Mounſieur de Prate; who having been his Leigier with the King of England, was without taking leave of the King departed, and come to the Emperour before the Engliſh Ambaſſadours came.

The Cardinal ſeeks to raiſe money by a Commiſſion: which the people oppoſe, and the King diſclaims.

But howſoever King Henry being determined to make War in France himſelf in perſon, his Council fell into conſideration how the charge of the War ſhould be maintained; which care the Cardinal takes upon him; and thereupon appoints Commiſſioners in all Shires, to ſit and draw the people to pay the ſixth part of every mans ſubſtance, in Plate or Money: but the people oppoſed it, alledging, that it was againſt the Law of the Realm, for any man to be charged with ſuch payments, unleſs by Parliament: and as the Cardinal continued to preſs it, ſo the people continued to deny it; and when ſome for denying it were committed to priſon, the Commons in many Countreys made great Aſſemblies for their defence: the report whereof at laſt came to the King, who thereupon came to Weſtminſter and proteſted openly that it was done without his knowledge, and that it was never his meaning, to ask any thing of his Subjects but according to Law; and therefore deſired to know by whoſe Authority it was done. Here the Cardinal excuſed himſelf and ſaid, that it was the opinion of all the Judges, and of all his Council, that he might lawfully demand any ſum, ſo it were done by Commiſſion, and thereupon it was done. But the King liked not to take advantage of a diſtinction to draw money from his Subjects; and thereupon gave warning for doing any ſuch thing hereafter: and ſignified ſo much by his Letters into all the Shires of England: giving alſo a general Pardon to all that had offered to riſe upon it; which though he did of his own free grace, yet the Cardinal to win a good opinion in the Commons gave out, that it was by his means the King granted the Pardon.

An. Reg. 17. 1526.

King Henry's ſeventeenth year, was honoured with advancing of many in honour; for on the eighteenth of June at his Palace of Bridewell, the Kings Son (which he had by Elizabeth Blunt Daughter to Sir John Blunt Knight) called Henry Fitz-Roy, was created firſt Earl of Nottingham, and after on the ſame day Duke of Richmond and Somerſet, Henry Courtney Earl of Devonſhire was created Marqueſs of Exeter, the Lord Brandon Son to the Duke of Suffolk and the French Queen (a childe of two years old) was created Earl of Lincoln, Sir Thomas Manners, Lord Roſs was created Earl of Rutland, Sir Henry Clifford was created Earl of Cumberland, Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water was created Vicount Fitz-water, and Sir Thomas Bullen Treaſurer of the Kings Houſhold was created Vicount Rochford.

Dukes and Earls created.

A Peace between England and France, for which a great ſumme of money paid to King Henry.

At this time the French Kings Mother, as then Regent of France, procured by her Ambaſſadours, at firſt a Truce, and afterward a Peace with England, which was proclaimed in London, the eighth of September. By the Covenants of which Peace, the King of England ſhould receive at certain dayes twenty hundred thouſand Crowns, which in ſterling money amounted to the ſumme of four hundred thouſand pound; whereof fifty was to be paid in hand. Sir William Fitz-williams, and Doctor Taylour, was ſent to the Lady Regent, to take her corporal Oath, and likewiſe King Henry the four and twentieth of April, at Greenwich, in preſence of the Ambaſſadours of France, Rome, and Venice, took his corporal Oath, to obſerve the Peace between him, and his loving Brother the French King, during his life, and one year after.

The ſtill Chriſtmaſs by reaſon of the ſickneſs.

In this Winter was a great mortality in London, ſo as the Term was adjourned, and the King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Eltham, with a ſmall number, and was therefore called the ſtill Chriſtmaſs. At which time, the Cardinal coming to the Court, took order for altering the ſtate of the Kings Houſe: many Officers and other ſervants were diſcharged, and put to their penſions, in which number were fourſcore and four Yeomen of the Guard: who before having had twelve pence the day with check, were now allowed but ſix pence the day without check, and commanded to go into their Countreys.

On Shrovetueſday this year, a ſolemn Juſts was held at Greenwich, the King and eleven other on the one part, the Marqueſs of Exeter, and eleven other of the other part.

An. Reg. 19. 1528.

In his nineteenth year King Henry kept a ſolemn Chriſtmaſs at Greenwich, with Revels, Masks, Diſguiſings, and Banquets, and the thirtieth of December and third of January were ſolemn Juſts holden, when at night the King and fifteen other with him, came to Bridewel, and there putting on masking Apparel, took his Barge, and rowed to the Cardinals place, where were at ſupper many Lords and Ladies, who danced with the Maskers, and after the Dancing was made a great Banquet. This Chriſtmaſs was a Play at Grayes-Inne, made by one Maſter Roe a Serjeant at Law; the effect whereof was, that Lord Governance was ruled by Diſſipation and Negligence, by whoſe evil order Lady Publick Weal was put from Governance. This the Cardinal took to be meant by him, and thereupon ſent the ſaid Maſter Roe to the Fleet, though the Play were made long before the Cardinal had any authority: by which we may ſee how inſeparable a companion ſuſpicion is to a guilty conſcience.

The King viſits the Cardinal in a Mask.

King Henry made arbitrator between the Emperour and the King of France.

The fourteenth of January came to the Court Don Hugo de Mendoza, a Grandee of Spain, as Ambaſſadour from the Emperour to the King, with a large Commiſſion, to make King Henry Judge; how juſt the conditions were, which the Emperour required of the King of France: and about this negotiation tarried two years in England: ſo deſirous the Emperour was to continue good correſpondence with the King of England.

On Shrovetueſday the King and the Marqueſs of Exeter with others, in moſt ſumptuous attire attire came to the Tilt, and ran so many courses, till two hundred fourscore and six Spears were broken; and then disarming themselves went into the Queens Chamber, where a sumptuous Banquet was provided. But this Banquet was one of the last of the Queens preparing; for hitherto there had been no exception taken to the lawfulness of her marriage, but now came over Ambassadours from the King of France, requiring to have the Kings Daughter the Lady Mary, to be given in marriage to the Duke of Orleance, second Son to their Master the French King, wherein they that were the suitors for it, were the hinderers of it; for amongst them was the President of Paris, who made a doubt whether the marriage between King Henry and the Lady Katharine of Spain, having been his Brothers Wife, were lawful or no: But howsoever the French Ambassadours at Greenwich on Sunday the fifth of May, in the Name of their Master the French King, took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them during their lives. And shortly after were sent Sir Thomas Bullen, Vicount Rochford, and Sir Anthony Brown Knight, as Ambassadours to the King of France, to take his Oath in person for performance of the League.

The first exception taken to the lawfulness of the Kings marriage.

But enough of small Occurrence; and indeed there will be Occurences now more worthy to be related, but more lamentable to be heard; for now the Duke of Bourbon General of the Emperours Army in Italy, was slain by a shot from the Walls of Rome, as he was passing by; upon whose death the Army entred and sacked the City, made the Pope flie to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and there cooped him up; abused the Cardinals, and put them to grievous ransomes, spared neither Sacred Places, nor Religious Persons, but committed all manner of barbarous and inhumane cruelty. These insolencies of the Emperours Army committed against the Pope; together with the hard conditions the Emperour had imposed upon the King of France for setting him at liberty: and the Emperours breach of promise in not marrying the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter, were the apparent causes of King Henry's breaking League with the Emperour Charles: but a more enforcing though concealed cause, perhaps was the growing greatness of the Emperour, by his acquests in Italy and other places; enough to breed a jealousie in all neighbouring Princes; and indeed King Henry had some cause to think the Emperours spirits were grown higher with his Victories, seeing where before he was wont alwayes to write Letters to King Henry with his own hand, and subscribe them, Your Son and faithful Friend; now after his Victories in Italy, he caused his Secretaries to write them, subscribing only Charles. And yet a more pressing cause, though not avowed, might be the Cardinals spleen against the Emperour, for denying him the Bishoprick of Toledo in Spain. But whichsoever of these was the predominant cause, all of them together made a cause sufficient for King Henry to fall off from amity with the Emperour; and his falling off from the Emperour, cause sufficient to fall in with the King of France: and thereupon the two Kings send their several Heraulds to the Emperour: King Henry Clarentius, the French King his Herauld Guyen, to expostulate their grievances with the Emperour, and he refusing to return a satisfactory Answer, to defie him as their Enemy. The Emperour heard the Heraulds with great temper, and answered Clarentius very mildly; that he knew his Masters grievance was grounded upon misinformation, wherein he would shortly rectifie him by his Letters, as desiring nothing more than to continue his friend; but Guyen he answered roughly, bidding him tell his Master that he had broken his faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his liberty; and with these answers dismissed them; only Guyen not thinking it fit to deliver his answer, being in such terms, by word of mouth, obtained to have it sent in writing. The Heraulds being returned home, and delivering the answers; the King of France was so incensed, to be charged with breach of faith, that soon after he sent another defiance to the Emperour, telling him in plain terms, that he lyed in his throat; and thereupon challenged him to the Combat, requiring him to appoint the field, and himself would the Weapons. The Emperour accepted the challenge, but other occurrences intervening hindered the performance.

Rome sacked by the Imperialists, and the Pope and Cardinals coopt up as prisoners.

The King of France gives the Emperor the lye, and challengeth him to a Combat.

In this mean time, the Cardinal was appointed to go Ambassadour to the King of France; carrying with him twelve score thousand pounds, to be employed by the French King, and other the Confederates, in a War against the Emperour, who the eleventh of July took shipping at Dover, and landed that day at Calice; with whom was Cuthert Tunstal Bishop of London, the Lord Sands Chamberlain to the King, the Earl of Derby, Sir Henry Guilford, Sir Thomas More, with other Knights and Gentlemen, in all to the number of twelve hundred Horse. At Amyens he was received by the French King himself, and by his Mother, and by all the chief Peers of France; By whom it was agreed, that Articles of Accord should be offered to the Emperour; which if refused, then the French King should marry the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter, and they both to be Enemies to the Emperour. These things concluded, the Cardinal returned, and on the last of September came to the King at Richmond. In October following, there came Ambassadours from the French King, to take King Henry's Oath, for observing the League with the King of France: and on Sunday the tenth of November, King Henry at Greenwich received the Order of Saint Michael by the hands of the Lord Annas de Memorancie, great Master of the Kings Houshold, and Mounsieur Humeries: as likewise the same day at Paris the French King received the Order of the Garter by the hands of the Lord Lisle, Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls, Sir Nicholas Carew Master of the Kings Horse, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Thomas Wriothsly Knight otherwise called Garter King of Arms, who were sent thither with the whole Habit, Collar, and other Habiliments of the Order.

The Cardinal goeth into France with a train of 1200. Horse.

Upon King Henry's defiance of the Emperour in the French Kings quarrel Engliſh Merchants their Ships and Goods were attached in Spain, and in the Low-Countreys, as likewiſe all Spaniſh and Flemiſh Merchants were attached here; which being very detrimental to both Nations; at laſt, by mediation of Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperours Ambaſſadour Legier, a reconcilement was made, and free traffick between the Nations was revived.

1529. King Henry begins to be troubled in mind about his marriage.

In his twentieth year, on the two and twentieth of February, Sir Piers Butler of Ireland, was created Earl of Oſory. And now King Henry began to be troubled in minde about his marriage with Queen Katharine; but whether his trouble of minde grew for ſcruple of Conſcience, or from deſire of change, was by many men doubted; ſome thought he had ſet his affection upon the Lady Anne Bullen, whom afterward he married; and to make way for that marriage, moved this ſcruple, that he might be divorced; but this is not likely, for he married not the ſaid Lady, till above three years after this doubt had been moved; and three years was a long time to have affection be delayed, which commonly is impatient of delay: if King Henry's own proteſtation may be taken, it was very ſcruple of Conſcience that troubled his minde; but then by what means this ſcruple came firſt into his head, is another doubt; ſome thought it was firſt moved by his Confeſſor Doctor Longland, telling him, that the Marriage with the Relict of his Brother could not be lawful; but neither is this likely; for Doctor Longland was not like to tell him ſo, who knew the marriage had been made by diſpenſation from the Pope, an Authority in that time beyond exception: ſome thought it was a plot of Woolſeys, thereby to make variance between King Henry and the Emperour, with whom he was at variance himſelf, and for ſpleen to the Nephew, be revenged upon the Aunt; but neither is this likely: or elſe the Cardinal was much deceived in his plot; for though the Emperour laboured Milan and ſome other Univerſities, to forbear giving Sentence againſt the marriage, yet he continued amity with King Henry as much afterward as before: If we will believe the King himſelf, it was the Preſident of Paris, coming Ambaſſadour from the King of France, that firſt moved it, upon a propoſition of marriage between the Lady Mary, King Henry's Daughter, and the Duke of Orleance, ſecond Son to the French King: but by what means ſoever this ſcruple had beginning, King Henry's deſire was now it ſhould have an ending; and that the matter might be debated with indifferency, he allowed the Queen to make choice of what Council ſhe thought beſt; who thereupon choſe William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Weſt, Biſhop of Ely, Doctors of the Law; John Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Henry Standiſh Biſhop of St. Aſaph, Doctors of Divinity, with many other; in the mean time he ſent to all the Univerſities in Italy, and France, to have their opinions, but ſpecially to the Court of Rome, deſiring the Pope to ſend his Legate to hear the cauſe; who thereupon ſent Cardinal Campejus, and joyned Cardinal Woolſey in Commiſſion with him. The place appointed for the Cardinals to ſit and to hear the cauſe, was at the Black-fryers; where in the great Hall preparation was made of Seats, and all things neceſſary for ſuch a ſeſſion. Amongſt other Officers of the Court, Stephen Gardiner (afterward Biſhop of Wincheſter) ſate as chief Scribe. The Court being ſet, the Judges commanded ſilence, whileſt their Commiſſion was read; which done, the Scribes commanded the Crier to call the King by the name of K. Henry of England, come into the Court; who anſwered, Here: then called he the Queen, by the name of Katharine Q. of England, come into the Court. The Queen, though preſent, yet anſwered not, but riſing from her ſeat, went to the place where the King ſate, and kneeling down, ſaid in effect; Sir, I humbly deſire you to take pity upon me, for I am a poor woman and a ſtranger, and I have here no indifferent Council, where all are your Subjects, and leſs aſſurance of friendſhip, when they all depend upon your favour; I have been your Wife theſe twenty years, and have born you divers Children; if you can charge me with diſhoneſty or undutifulneſs, I am content to depart from you to my ſhame; but if you cannot, I then deſire you to do me Juſtice, and to ſpare me until I may know what counſel my friends in Spain will give me; but if you will not, then your pleaſure be fulfilled: and having ſo ſaid, ſhe roſe up, and making a low courteſie, departed. The King being adverti-ſed that ſhe was going out of the Houſe, commanded the Crier to call her again; who thereupon called her, ſaying, Katharine Queen of England, come into the Court; which her Gentleman-Uſher Maſter Griffith hearing, told her, Madam, you are called: Well (ſaid ſhe) it makes no matter, I will not tarry, go your way: and thus ſhe departed, and never after would appear in any Court, but appealed from the Cardinals to the Pope himſelf. The Queen being gone, the King ſaid, I confeſs ſhe hath been to me the moſt dutiful and loving Wife that ever Prince had; and if it were not for this ſcruple of my Conſcience, I would not leave her for any woman living: and having now referred the Judgment of the cauſe to theſe Commiſſioners, I ſhould be moſt glad they could find the marriage between us to be in ſuch ſort lawful, that with obedience to the law of God, we might continue together; for I take God to witneſs, there is nothing I more deſire. This ſaid, the King roſe, and the Court was adjourned to another day; for notwithſtanding the Queens Appeal (from which ſhe would by no means be drawn) the Cardinals continued their Seſſion weekly, and heard all of both ſides: the point that was chiefly ſtood on, was, whether Prince Arthur had ever had carnal knowledge of her, or no; the Kings Council alledged, he had, and proved it; firſt, by Prince Arthur's ſpeech, the next morning after his marriage, that he had been that night in the midſt of Spain; and then by the words of the laſt Diſpenſation, Vel forſan cognitam: the Queens Advocates alledged the contrary; appealing to the Kings own Conſcience; whom the Queen charged that he knew her to be a Virgin when he married her; (though to ſay the the truth; it were ſtrange, Prince Arthur and ſhe having lien five months together, and he no leſs then almoſt 16 years old.) But whilſt arguments were thus urged on both ſides, and no certainty could appear, the King ſent the two Cardinals to the Queen, lying then in Bridewel, to perſwade her, ſhe ſhould ſubmit her ſelf to the Kings pleaſure, and not to ſtand ſo peremptorily to her Appeal. The Cardinals coming to her, found her at work amongſt her Maids, with a skain of white thread about her neck: who having heard their meſſage, anſwered, That in all other things ſhe would willingly ſubmit her ſelf to the Kings will, but in this, which concerned her honeſty, and the legitimateneſs of her Children, ſhe durſt not, but would relie upon the wiſdom and piety of both their Fathers, who (ſhe knew) would never have aſſented to the marriage, if there had been the leaſt ſcruple of unlawfulneſs in it; and other anſwer ſhe would not give. Upon their return to the King, when he perceived ſhe could not be removed from her opinion; he commanded the Court to go on; ſo that at laſt it came to judgement; which every man expected ſhould be the next day. At which day the King came thither (but in ſo ſecret a manner that he might hear and not be ſeen) where the Kings Council at the Bar calling for Judgement; Cardinal Campejus, as being chief Commiſſioner, ſtood up and ſaid; I find the caſe very doubtful, and the party defendant ſtanding to her Appeal, I will therefore give no Judgement, till I have conferred with the Pope; and therefore I adjourn the Court for this time, according to the Order of the Court of Rome, which hears no cauſes judicially from the laſt of July till the fourth of October; at which protraction of time, King Henry was not a little angry, and the Duke of Suffolk being preſent in a great rage ſaid; It was never merry in England, ſince we had Cardinals amongſt us. Soon after this the Cardinal took his leave of the King, and returned to Rome: He was indeed commanded ſo to do by the Pope, who would elſe moſt willingly have gratified King Henry, that had beſtowed upon him the Biſhoprick of Salisbury. Whileſt theſe things were in acting, Cardinal Woolſey had an inkling of the Kings affection to Anne Bullen, Daughter of the Vicount Rochford; and that the Divorce once paſſed, he meant to marry her; which match, becauſe for many reaſons, he miſliked, one perhaps, becauſe ſhe was a Lutheran, he ſent privily to the Pope, that by no means he ſhould give ſentence for the Divorce, till he had framed the Kings mind another way; for his deſire was, that the King ſhould marry the Dutcheſs of Alanſon the French Kings Siſter. This packing of Woolſey was not ſo cloſely carried, but that it ſoon came to the Kings knowledge; and the King, finding him a rub in his way, whom he expected to have expedited his proceeding, began to think it neceſſary to remove him, and to take him off from that greatneſs which had made him ſo preſuming; and indeed he made ſhort work with him; for ſoon after he ſent the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to him for the Seal, which yet he would not deliver to them, till they brought him a Warrant under the Kings own hand. When the Seal was brought to the King, he delivered it to Sir Thomas More, Speaker then of the Parliament (the firſt Layman that bore that Office in any memory;) and in his room was choſen Speaker Thomas Audeley Attorney of the Dutchy. Woolſey now removed from his Chancellourſhip, was in the Parliament then holden charged with points of Treaſon; but that charge was ſo clearly taken off by his ſervant Thomas Cromwel, who was then of the Houſe, that the Cardinal was acquitted, to the great commendation of Cromwel, both for abilities in himſelf, and faithfulneſs to his Maſter.

The chief point of difference was, whether Prince Arthur had ever carnal knowledge of her.

Cardinal Campejus adjourns the Court.

Woolſey ſeeks to Croſs the King about his marrying the Lady Anne Bullen, and why.

Woolſey hath the Great Seal taken from him: and is charged with Treaſon, but acquitted.

After this, the King being informed, that all thoſe things, which the Cardinal had done by his power Legantine, were within the caſe of Præmunire; he cauſed his Attorney Chriſtopher Hales to ſue out a Præmunire againſt him; and thereupon the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were ſent unto him, to let him know, the Kings pleaſure was, he ſhould go to Aſher, a Houſe near to Hampton-Court, belonging to his Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, and there to reſide: whereupon the Cardinal, having firſt delivered up all his Moveables to the Kings uſe (the greateſt ſtore and richeſt that was ever known of any Subject) went preſently to Putney by water, and from thence rode to Aſher, where he and his family continued three or four weeks, without either Bed, Sheets, Table-cloaths, or Diſhes to eat their meat in, or money wherewith to buy any, but what he was forced to borrow of the Biſhop of Carlile. After this, his matter for the Præmunire being called upon in the Kings Bench, his two Attornies confeſſed the Action, and thereupon had Judgment to forfeit all his Lands and Goods, and to be out of the Kings Protection; but the King of his clemency ſent him a ſufficient Protection, and left him the Biſhopricks of York and Wincheſter, with Plate and Stuffe convenient for his Dignity. His Biſhoprick of Dureſme was given to Doctor Tunſtal, Biſhop of London; his Abbey of Saint Albans to the Prior of Norwich; and the Biſhoprick of London to Doctor Stokeſley, Ambaſſadour then beyond the Seas.

Woolſey is in a Præmunire: and is confined to Aſher.

In this mean while, Margaret Dutcheſs of Savoy, Aunt to the Emperour, and the Lady Loyſe Dutcheſs of Angouleſme, Mother to the French King, met at Cambray to treat of a Peace between the Emperour, the Pope, and the Kings of England and France, where were preſent Doctor Tunſtal Biſhop of London, and Sir Thomas More then Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, Commiſſioners for the King of England; after long debating, through the diligence of the ſaid Ladies, a Peace was concluded; and was thereof called, The Womans Peace, and was indeed as fickle as women, for it was ſoon broken, and neither of the Princes truſted the other e're the more for it.

The Commons in Parliament complain againſt the Clergy, and wherein.

King Henry before this time had been wholly ruled by the Cardinal and by the Clergy, but now, growing ſenſible of that errour, he called his High Court of Parliament; in which the Commons complained ſharply of their grievances againſt the Clergy, ſpecially in ſix things.

The firſt, for that they exacted unreaſonable ſums of money, as due Fees, for the probate of mens laſt Wills and Teſtaments: inſomuch, that Sir Henry Guilford Guilford, Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings Houſe, declared openly, that he and others being Executors to Sir William Compton payed for the Probate of his Will to the Cardinal and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury a thouſand mark.

The ſecond, the extream exaction, which ſpiritual men uſed in taking of Corps or Mortuaries.

The third, that Spiritual men became Farmers of great Granges and Farms to the prejudice of Husbandmen and Graziers.

The fourth, becauſe many Abbots, Priors, and other ſpiritual men, kept Tan-houſes, and bought and ſold Wool, Cloth, and other Wares, as temporal Merchants.

The fifth, becauſe ſuch Clergy-men as had the beſt livings would take the uttermoſt of their right, and yet live in the Court, or in Noblemens or in Biſhops houſes, where they ſpent nothing.

The ſixth, becauſe divers ignorant men amongſt them held ten or twelve Benefices to themſelves ſeverally, and yet lived not upon any one of them, but kept great Scholars at ſmall penſion.

Theſe things before this time might not be touched, becauſe the Biſhops were Chancellours, and had all the rule about the King; but now the King looking better into the matter, gave way to theſe complaints: whereupon the Burgeſſes drew up three Bills; one of the probate of Teſtaments; another for Mortuaries: and the third for Non-reſidence, Pluralities, and taking of Farms by ſpiritual men. The Bill of Mortuaries paſſed firſt the Houſe of Commons, and was ſent up to the Lords: when two dayes after, was ſent up the Bill of probate of Teſtaments, at which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and all the Biſhops much frowned, but ſpecially John Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, who roſe up and ſaid: My Lords, you ſee what Bills come daily from the Commons houſe, and all is to the deſtruction of the Church; for Gods ſake, conſider what a Realm Bohemia was, and when the Church went down, then fell the Glory of that Kingdom: Now with our Commons is nothing but down with the Church; and all this meſeemeth, is for lack of Faith only. When theſe words were reported to the Houſe of Commons, they took the matter very hainouſly; and thereupon ſent their Speaker Thomas Audeley, with thirty of the Houſe to the King, complaining what a diſhonour to the King and the whole Realm it was to ſay, that they which were elected for the wiſeſt men of all Shires, ſhould be charged to lack faith, which was all one as to ſay, they were Infidels and no Chriſtians; ſo as what Acts or Laws ſoever they made ſhould be taken as Laws made by Paynims and Heathens, and not worthy to be kept by Chriſtian men. And therefore humbly beſought his Majeſty to call the ſaid Biſhop of Rocheſter before him, to give an accompt of the words he had ſpoken. Whereupon within few dayes after, the King ſent for the Biſhop, and acquainted him with the Commons complaint againſt him, who excuſed himſelf, by ſaying he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lack of Faith, and not the doings of the Houſe of Commons; of which excuſe, the King ſent word to the Houſe by Sir William Fitz-williams Treaſurer of his Houſhold; but it pleaſed the Commons nothing at all. After divers meetings between the Lords and Commons, about the Bills of probate of Teſtaments and Mortuaries, the Temporality laid to the Spirituality their own laws, and conſtitutions, and the Spirituality defended them, by preſcription, and uſage; to whom a Gentleman of Grayes-Inne made this anſwer. The uſage hath ever been of Thieves to rob on Shooters-hill; is it therefore lawful? Whileſt theſe Bills were in debate, an Act was paſſed, which releaſed to the King all ſuch ſums of money as he had borrowed at the Loan, in the fifteenth year of his Reign; which Bill at firſt was much oppoſed, but the moſt part of the Houſe being the Kings Servants, it was at laſt aſſented to: which once known in the Countrey abroad, made much murmuring, and the Parliament to be ill ſpoken of; for every man counted it a ſure debt, ſo as ſome made their Wills of the money, and ſome turned it over in ſatisfaction to their creditors. To qualifie which grievance, the King granted a general pardon for all offences (certain excepted) and was a means alſo to have the three Bills paſſed; one for a probate of Teſtaments, another for Mortuaries, and the third againſt plurality of Benefices, Non-reſidence, buying and taking of Farms by ſpiritual perſons, though this laſt with ſome qualifying.

An Inconſiderate ſpeech of Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter.

And how he excuſed it.

Preſcription not enough to make a thing lawful.

During this Parliament, the King created Vicount Rochford, Earl of Wiltſhire, the Vicount Fitz-water Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Haſtings Earl of Huntington.

Earls created.

By this time, the Lords of the upper Houſe had drawn certain Articles againſt the Cardinal, and ſent them down to the Houſe of Commons, the chief whereof were theſe:

Firſt, that without the Kings aſſent, he hath procured himſelf to be made a Legate, by reaſon whereof he took away the right of all Biſhops and ſpiritual perſons.

Secondly, That in all his Writings which he wrote to Rome, or to any Foraign Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my King; ſo preferring himſelf before the King.

Thirdly, That without the Kings aſſent, he carried the great Seal of England with him into Flanders.

Fourthly, That having the French Pox, he preſumed to come and breath upon the King.

Fifthly, That he cauſed the Cardinals Hat to be put upon the Kings Coin.

Sixthly, That he would not ſuffer the Kings Clerk of the Market to ſit at Saint Albans.

Seventhly, That he had ſent infinite ſtore of treaſure to Rome for purchaſing of his Dignity.

Articles drawn by the Parliament againſt the Cardinal.

Theſe Articles were read in the Houſe, and if not otherwiſe proved, yet confeſſed afterward under the Cardinals own hand, which added to the former præmunire; all his Lands and Goods were ſeized on to the Kings uſe.

This Parliament being ended, the King removed to Greenwich, and there kept his Chriſtmaſs with his Queen Katharine in great ſtate; for though this matter, of making void the marriage between them, was hotly purſued by the King; yet abſtaining only from her bed, he conconverſed with her ſtill, and they kept Court together, in as loving manner as they had done before. And now King Henry underſtanding that the Pope and the Emperour were to meet at Bologna, he ſent Ambaſſadours thither, the Earl of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokely Elect of London, and Doctor Lee, to declare both to the Pope and to the Emperour, the opinions of divers learned men in the matter of his marriage; who all agree that it was againſt the Law of God; and thereupon requiring the Pope to do him Juſtice, and ſhewing to the Emperour, that the King moved this matter for diſcharge of his Conſcience only, and to no other end. To which the Pope anſwered, that when he came to Rome, he would hear the matter diſputed, and do the King right. The Emperour anſwered, that he would in no caſe be againſt the Law of God, and if this marriage were judged ſuch by the Court of Rome, he would reſt contented: with theſe Anſwers the Ambaſſadours returned.

An. Reg. 22. 1531.

The Iſland of Malta given by the Emperour to the Maſter of Saint Johns of Jeruſalem.

It was now the two and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign, when the Emperour gave to the Maſter of St. Johns of Jeruſalem the Iſland of Malta, in ſupplying of the Iſland of Rhodes, which the Turk ſometime before had won from that Order.

In this year the New Teſtament having been Tranſlated into Engliſh, by Tindal, Joy, and others, was forbidden to be read; and many for reading it, were ſharply puniſhed by command of the Biſhops and Sir Thomas More then Lord Chancellour; but none was more violent in the matter than the Biſhop of London, who cauſed all the Books to be brought into Pauls Church-yard, and there burned.

King Henry having heard by good information, that when Campejus was ſent Legate into England, he had brought with him a Bull of Divorce; but was afterward upon change of the Popes mind, commanded to burn it; ſaw plainly by this, that the Pope had no meaning of proceeding really in the matter, but to keep it afoot for his own ends; neither to diſpleaſe the Emperour by granting it, nor King Henry by not granting it, but promiſing expedition to keep him in expectance; yet uſing delayes to keep him in dependence: and therefore reſolved now to take ſuch a courſe, that he ſhould not need to care whether the Pope granted it or no; and thereupon cauſed a Proclamation to be publiſhed, that no perſon of what eſtate or condition ſoever, ſhould purchaſe, or attempt to purchaſe from the Court of Rome, any thing prejudicial to the Juriſdiction, or Prerogative of this his Realm, upon pain of impriſonment, and other puniſhments at his Graces pleaſure; and ſhortly after an Act was made, that Biſhops ſhould pay no more Annats, or money for Bulls to the Pope; for as much as it was proved, there had been paid for Bulls of Biſhops, ſince the fourth year of King Henry the ſeventh, an hundred and threeſcore thouſand pounds, beſides what had been paid for Pardons and other Diſpenſations. Another Act was alſo then made, that no perſon ſhould appeal for any cauſe out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commiſſary to the Biſhop, and from the Biſhop to the Archbiſhop, and from the Archbiſhop to the King: and all cauſes of the King to be tried in the upper Houſe of the Convocation.

An Act made that no more Annats ſhould be paid to Rome.

Nor no Appeals to the Pope.

At this time the Cardinal lying ſtill at Aſher, and his Adverſaries doubting leſt lying ſo near the King, he might one time or other get acceſs to the Kings preſence, and come again into favour; they uſed means to have him ſent further off, and thereupon the King appointed him to go to his Dioceſs of York, and not to come Southward without ſpecial Licenſe; whereupon in Lent he made great preparation for his Journey, aud having in his train to the number of an hundred and threeſcore perſons, by eaſie journeys came to Peterborow, and there kept his Eaſter; the week after he went to Stamford, then to Newark, and ſo to Southwel, where he continued moſt part of all that Summer: and then rode to Scroby, where he ſtayed till Michaelmas, and then came to Cawood Caſtle, within ſeven miles of York, where he kept a plentiful houſe for all comers: and repaired the Caſtle, being greatly in decay, having above three hundred Artificers in daily wages. At laſt, he determined to be inſtalled at York, the next Monday after Allhollan-day; againſt which time great preparation was made, and the Cardinal ſent to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, which he uſed to wear at any great Solemnity. At which preſumption the King marvelled not a little; ſaying to thoſe that were about him, what a thing is this that pride ſhould thus reign in a man that is quite underfoot? but before the day of Inſtalment came, he was arreſted in this manner; Sir Walter Walſh one of the Kings Privy-Chamber was ſent down to the Earl of Northumberland, with whom he was joyned in Commiſſion to arreſt the Cardinal; whereupon they go together to Cawood, where the Cardinal lay: and being entred into the houſe, it was told the Cardinal, that the Earl of Northumberland was come, and in the Hall; then (quoth the Cardinal) I am ſorry we have dined, for I doubt our Officers are not provided of any good cheer. With that he went and brought the Earl up, welcoming him in a complemental manner, as if he had come but only to viſit him; but being come into the Chamber, the Earl with a ſoft voice, laying his hand upon the Cardinals arm, ſaid, My Lord, I arreſt you of high Treaſon: the Cardinal ſomewhat aſtonied; asked to ſee his Commiſſion, which the Earl denying to ſhew; then (ſaith the Cardinal) I will not obey your arreſt; at that inſtant Maſter Walſh came in, and kneeled down to the Cardinal; who asked him if he were joyned in Commiſſion with the Earl; who anſwered, he was: well then, ſaid the Cardinal, I trow you are one of the Kings Privy-Chamber, your name is Walſh: I am content to yield to you, but not to my Lord of Northumberland, unleſs I ſee his Commiſſion: the meaneſt of the Kings Privy-Chamber is ſufficient to arreſt the greateſt Peer of the Realm, by the Kings Commandement, without any Commiſſion. Then the Earl took the Cardinals Keyes from him, and put him in cuſtody of his Gentlemen: ſome few dayes after he was conveyed from Cawood to Pomfret, and after to Sheffield Park, where he had kinde entertainment, and ſtaid with the Earl of of Shrewsbury and his Lady eighteen dayes, till

He falls sick. at last sitting one day at dinner, his colour was observed to change, and being asked how he did? not well (saith he) I have something suddenly at my stomach as cold as a whetstone, which I know is wind; I desire to have something from the Apothecary, to break wind; which was brought, and the Earl seeing the same taken, he took it, and thereupon broke wind indeed: but whether it were he took it in too great a quantity, or that there was some foul play used, he fell soon after into such a looseness, that the night following he had above fifty stools; yet the next day he rode to Nottingham, and the day after to Leicester Abbey; being so sick by the way that he was ready to fall off his Mule: coming to the Abbey Gates, the Abbot with all the Covent met him; to whom he said, Father Abbot, I am come hither to lay my bones among you; and then was led up into his Chamber, and went to bed; where growing sicker and sicker, the next morning Master Kingston Lieutenant of the Tower, who had been sent to bring him up, coming to him, and asking him how he did? I do but tarry (saith he) the pleasure of God, to render up my poor soul into his hands; for this is my case, I have a Flux with a continual Fever; the nature whereof is, that if there be no amendment within eight dayes, either excoriation of the entrails will ensue, or frenzy, or else present death; and the best of them is death; and (as I suppose) this is the eighth day. Sir (said Master Kingston) you are afraid of that you have no cause; for I assure you, the King commanded me to say unto you, that you should be of good cheer, for that he beareth you as much good will as ever he did: No, no (Master Kingston) said the Cardinal, I see how it is framed; but if I had served God as diligently as I have done the King, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs: But it is a just reward for my study to do him service, not regarding the service of God to do him pleasure: and having so said, his speech failed, and incontinent the clock struck eight, and then he gave up the

His many Honours and great Retinue. This man held at once the Bishoprick of York, Winchester, and Durham, the Dignities of Lord Cardinal Legat and Chancellour of England, the Abbey of Saint Albans, divers Priories, and sundry great Benefices in Commendam: he had also in his hands, as it were in Farm, the Bishoprick of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, which having been given by Henry the Seventh to strangers, that lived out of the Realm, they suffered Woolsey to enjoy them, receiving of him a Pension only. The retinue of this Prelate is scarce credible, a thousand persons daily in his household, of whom many Knights and some Lords; all which greatness as it came by the Kings favour, so by the withdrawing of his favour it was overthrown: so true is that saying of Solomon. The Kings favour is as dew upon the grass; but his wrath is as the roaring of a Lion, and as a messenger of death. After this the King removed from Hampton-Court to Greenwich, where with his Queen Katharine he kept a solemn Christmass, and on the twelfth night he sate in state in the Hall, where were divers interludes, costly Masks, and a sumptuous Banquet. After Christmas he came to his Manour of Westminster, which before was called York-Place; for the Cardinal had made a Feoffment of it to the King, which the Chapter of York confirmed, and then it was no more called York-Place, but the Kings Manour of Westminster, new Whitehall, White-hall given by the Cardinal to the King.

About this time was a Call of eleven Serjeants at Law: namely Thomas Audeley, Walter Luke, John Bawdewine, John Hynde, Christopher Jenny, John Densel, Edward Mervyne, Edmund Knightlye Roger Chomley, Edward Mountague, and Robert York; who kept their Feast at Ely-house five dayes together; where on the last day the King and Queen dined: which John Densel of Densel in the County of Cornwal, was of Lincolns-Inne, and died the third day of January, Anno Christi 1535. and lieth buried within the Church of St, Giles in the Fields, in Middlesex: leaving by Mary his Widow the Daughter of Sir—— Lucas in Warwickshire Knight, two Daughters and Co-heirs, Anne the eldest married unto Sir William Hollis of Haughton, in the County of Nottingham Knight, Grand-father unto John Hollis Knight Earl of Clare, &c. deceased, and Alice the other Daughter married unto Master ——Reskimer.

At this time the whole Clergy of England was charged by the Kings learned Council, to be in a præmunire, for supporting and maintaining the Cardinals Legantine power: and were thereupon called by Process into the Kings Bench to answer; but before their day of Appearance came, they in their Convocation concluded an humble submission in writing, and offered the King an hundred thousand pound to have their Pardon by Parliament; which offer, after some labour, was accepted, and their Pardon promised. In which submission the Clergy called the King Supreme Head of the Church. This Pardon was signed with the Kings hand, and sent to the Lords, who assented to it; and then sent it to the Lower House: but here, divers of the House excepted against the Pardon, unless themselves also might be included in it; who (they said) having had something to do with the Cardinal, might be brought into the same case as the Clergy were. Hereupon their Speaker Thomas Audeley, with a convenient number of the House, was sent to the King about it; to whom the King made answer, that he was their Sovereign Lord, and would not be compelled to shew his mercy; and seeing they went about to restrain him of his liberty, he would grant a Pardon to the Clergy, which he might do by his great Seal without them; and for their Pardon, he would be advised before he granted it: with this answer the Speaker and Commons returned, much grieved and discontented; and some said that Thomas Cromwel, who was newly come into the Kings favour, had disclosed the secrets of the House, which made the King give this unpleasing answer. But soon after the King, of his own accord, caused their Pardon also to be drawn, and signed it; which easily passed both Houses, with great commendation of the Kings judgment, to deny it at first when it was demanded as a right, and to grant it afterward, when it was received as of grace.

In this Parliament time, on the 30 of March, Sir Tho. More Lord Chancellor with twelve of the Lords, came into the Lower House, acquainting them, that though in the matter of the Kings Divorce, he might sufficiently rest upon the judgment of learned men in his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, yet to avoid all suspicion of partiality, he had sent into France, Italy, the Popes Dominions, and the Venetians, to have their opinions; and then causing them to be read, Sir Bryan Tuke took out of a box certain writings sealed, which were the determinations of the Universities of Orleance, of Paris, of Anjou, of Burges, of Bolonia, of Padua, and of Tholouse: all which were peremptory in these two Points; That the Brother, by the Law of God, might not marry the Relict of his Brother; and then being against the Law of God, that it is not in the power of the Pope to dispence with it: and now (said they) you may know, that the King hath not sought this Divorce for his pleasure, but for discharge of his Conscience: and this said, they departed. The King himself, when he heard of these determinations, was so far from rejoycing at it, that he rather mourned, as for the loss of so good a Wife; yet conversed with her as he had done before, in nothing altered but abstaining from her bed. But being willing the Queen should know these determinations; in Whitsunweek after, he sent divers Lords to acquaint her with them, requiring her thereupon to recal her Appeal, and to refer the matter to eight indifferent Lords; which she utterly refused, using her usual Answer, that she was his lawful Wife, and would abide the Determination of the Court of Rome, but of no other. After Whitsuntide the King and Queen removed to Windsor, and there continued till the 14 of July, on which day the King removed to Woodstock and left the Queen at Windsor, where she remained a while, and after removed to Easthamstead, whither the King sent to her divers Lords, first to perswade her to be conformable to the law of God; which if they could not do, then to let her know, that his pleasure was, she should be at either of these three places, his Manor of Oking, or of Easthamstead, or the Monastery of Bisham, and there to continue without further molesting him with her suits.

The Pope cannot dispence against the Law of God.

Notwithstanding the determinations of Universities; yet the Queen stands still to her Appeal.

The Queen is confined.

Cranmer is sent to Rome to prove the Kings marriage unlawful.

And now Cranmer is to play his part. It chanced that Dr. Stephens, Dr. Fox, and he met at Waltham one day at dinner; where falling into discourse about the case then in agitation of the Kings Marriage with Queen Katharine; the other Doctors thought the Marriage might be proved unlawful by the Civil Law: but (said Cranmer) it may better be proved by the Law of God, and it is no hard matter to do it: which words of his being made known to the King, Cranmer is sent for, and commanded to set his reasons down in writing: which having done, and shewed them to the King; he was asked whether he would stand to that which he had written? who answered, he would, even before the Pope himself, if his Majesty pleased: marry (said the King) and to the Pope you shall go: and thereupon sent him to the Court of Rome, and with him Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire, Doctor Stokesley Elect of London, Dr. Lee the Kings Almoner, and others: who coming to Bolonia where the Pope was, had a day of Audience appointed, but was hindred by a ridiculous accident; for the Pope holding out his foot for them to kiss his Toe, as the manner is, a Dog of the Earls by chance in the room, ran and caught the Popes foot in his mouth, and made it for that time unfit to kiss. After this, when Cranmer had made his Proposition, he was told it should be answered when the Pope came to Rome: so the Ambassadors were dismissed, and Cranmer went to the Emperours Court, where in private Conference he satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most learned at that time about the Emperour, and brought him to be of his opinion. Cranmer returning home, and giving the King this satisfaction, the Kings Marriage with Queen Katharine was soon after dissolved by Parliament; and the Bishop of Canterbury accompanied with Dr. Stokesley Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Bath and Lincoln, and other learned men, rode to Dunstable where Queen Katharine then lay; where being cited to appear, and making default fifteen days together, for lack of appearance, she was divorced from the King, and the Marriage declared to be void and of none effect; and from thenceforth it was decreed, she should no more be called Queen, but Princes Dowager: after which time, the King never saw her more.

The Queen is by Parliament divorced.

At this time, being the four and twentieth year of King Henries reign, Sir Thomas More, after long suit, delivered up the great Seal, which was then delivered to Tho. Audeley Speaker of the Parliament, which Parliament begun at the Black-fryers, was adjourned to Westminster, and there at nine a clock at night dissolved, and was therefore called the Black Parliament. This Tho. Audely was first made Lord Keeper, and shortly after Chancellour; in whose room of Speaker, Humfrey Wingfield of Grayes-Inne was chosen. On the first of September this year, the King being at Windsor, created Anne Bullen Marchioness of Pembroke, giving her a 1000 pounds land a year: and then being desirous to talk with the King of France in person on the 10 of Octob. taking the said Lady with him, and divers Lords, as the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the Marques of Dorset and Exeter, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Surrey, Essex, Derby, Rutland, Suffex and Huntington, with divers Vicounts, Barons, and Knights, he sailed over to Callice; and on the 20 of October met with the King of France at Bulloigne, with whom he staid four days; in which time to do him honour, the King of France honoured the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk with the Order of Saint Michael; and then both Kings went to Callice, where the French King stayed certain days; in which time to do the King of France honor, King Henry honored two of his great Lords with the Order of the Garter; and then after great magnificence in revelling and feasting, on the 20 of October the French King departed from Callice, and King Henry returned into England; where on the 14 of November following, he married secretly the Lady Anne Bullen, which marriage was not openly known till Easter after, when it was perceived ſhe was with child; at which time William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury died: Thomas Cranmer was elected Archbiſhop in his room.

After that the King perceived his new Wife to be with child, he cauſed all Officers neceſſary to be appointed to her; and ſo on Eaſter eve ſhe went to her Cloſet openly as Queen, and then the King appointed her Coronation to be kept on Whitſunday following, and Writings were ſent to all Sheriffs, to certifie the names of men of forty pounds to receive the Order of Knighthood, or elſe to make fine: the Aſſeſſment of which fines was appointed to Thomas Cromwell Maſter of the Jewel-houſe, and of the Kings Council; a man newly come into the Kings Favour, by whoſe induſtry great ſummes of money were by ſuch fines gathered. In the beginning of May, the King, cauſed Proclamation to be made, that all men who claimed to do any ſervice at the Coronation, by way of tenure, grant, or preſcription, ſhould put in their claim three weeks after Eaſter in the Star-Chamber, before Charles Duke of Suffolk, for that time high Steward of England, the Lord Chancellour and other Commiſſioners. Two days before the Coronation were made Knights of the Bath, the Earl of Dorſet, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Haſtings, the Lord Monteagle, the Lord Vaux, Sir John Mordant, Sir Henry Parker, Sir William Windſor, Sir Francis Weſton, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir John Hurlſon, Sir Thomas Poynings, Sir Henry Savil, Sir George Fitzwilliams, Sir John Tindall, and Sir Thomas Jeremy. On Whitſunday the Coronation was kept in as great ſtate and pomp for all circumſtances as ever any was, and the day after a ſolemn Juſts was holden.

In May this year Pope Clement ſent a Meſſenger to King Henry, requiring him perſonally to appear at the general Council, which he had appointed to be kept the year following; but when his Commiſſion was ſhewed, there was neither time nor place ſpecified for keeping of this ſaid Council; and ſo with an uncertain anſwer to an uncertain demand, the Meſſenger departed.

1534.

It was now the five and twentieth year of the Kings Reign, when on Midſummer day, Mary the French Queen, and then Wife to Charles Duke of Suffolk died, and was buried at St. Edmundsbury; and on the ſeventh of September following, between three and four a clock in the afternoon, the Queen was delivered of a Daughter that was named Elizabeth; the Godfather at the Chriſtning was the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the Godmother the old Dutcheſs of Norfolk, and the old Marchioneſs Dorſet widow; and at the Confirmation the Lady Marchioneſs of Exeter: the Chriſtning was was performed with exceeding great ſtate, and great giſts were given by the Goſſips.

The Queen is delivered of a Daughter named Elizabeth.

The Judgment of God upon an unhallowed Oath.

This year one Pavier the Town-clerk of London hanged himſelf, whom Hollinſhead ſaith he heard once ſwear a great oath, that if he thought the King would ſet forth the Scripture in Engliſh, rather than he would live to ſee that day, he would cut his own throat: which I therefore relate, that the judgment of God may be ſeen upon ſuch unhallowed Oaths.

A little before this time one Elizabeth Barton, named the Holy Maid of Kent, came to be diſcovered; whoſe abettors were Richard Maſter a Prieſt Parſon of Aldington in Kent, Ed. Bocking Dr. of Divinity a Monk of Canterbury, Rich. Deering a Monk, Edw. Thwyats Gent. Henry Gold Parſon of Aldermary, Hugh Rich a Fryer Obſervant, Richard Risby and Thomas Gold, Gentlemen, This Maid had learned to counterfeit falling into Trances; in which ſhe would deliver many ſtrange things, and amongſt others, ſaid, that by Revelation from God and his Saints, ſhe was informed, that if King Henry proceeded to the Divorce, and married another, he ſhould not be King of England one month after. And here we may ſee how credulous oftentimes great Scholars are in believing Impoſtures, when Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter were thought to give credit to this Counterfeit; that we need not wonder at St. Auſtin, who though he gave credit to many lying miracles, yet they were ſuch as had more probability in them than this, which conſiſted in nothing but making of faces, as upon Examination of the Maid and her Abetters was confeſſed; and thereupon ſhe and moſt of them were condemned, drawn to Tiburn and there hanged.

The Holy Maid of Kent her Impoſture diſcovered, and ſhe hanged.

In this mean time the Scots had been troubleſome, and made inroads upon the Borders; till at laſt, Commiſſioners being ſent to treat of agreement, a Peace was concluded, to continue both the Kings lives; which on the twentieth of May this year, was openly Proclaimed.

About this time at the ſuit of the Lady Katharine Dowager, a Bull was ſent from the Pope, which curſed both the King and the Realm; which Bull was ſet up in the Town of Dunkirk in Flanders, the Meſſenger not daring to come nearer: and becauſe it was known that the Lady Dowager had procured this Curſe to be ſent, the Duke of Suffolk was ſent to her, lying then at Bugden beſides Huntington, to diſcharge a great part of her houſhold ſervants; yet leaving her a convenient number like a Princeſs.

It was now the ſix and twentieth year of King Henry's reign, when in a Parliament holden, an Act was made for eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion in the Crown, upon the Lady Elizabeth; to which, firſt all the Lords, Knights, and Burgeſſes were ſworn; and after Commiſſioners were ſent into all parts of the Realm, to take the oath of all men and women to the ſaid Act. Another Act was alſo made, which authorized the King to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Popes Authority to be utterly aboliſhed. But Doctor John Fiſher, Biſhop of Rocheſter, Sir Thomas More Knight, and Doctor Wilſon Parſon of Saint Thomas Apoſtles in London, expreſly denied at Lambeth, before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to take the Oaths; of whom Doctor Wilſon recanted, but the other two, perſiſting in their opinion, were both of them beheaded. Of theſe two Biſhop Fiſher was much lamented, as reputed a man both of great learning and good life. The Pope had elected him Cardinal, and his Hat was come as far as Calice, but before it could come into England his head was off. Sir Thomas More was both learned and very wiſe, but ſo given to a vein of merry jeſting and merry ſcoffing, that he could not refrain it at the very time of his death; as when he was carried to the the Tower, being demanded his upper Garment (meaning his Gown) you ſhall have it, ſaid he, and gave them his Cap; ſaying, it was the uppermoſt Garment he had: alſo, when being upon the Scaffold, the Hangman kneeled down and asked him forgiveneſs; I forgive thee (ſaid he) but I promiſe thee, thou wilt never have credit by cutting off my head, my neck is ſo ſhort: and when he was to lay his head down upon the Block, having a great gray beard, he ſtroked it out, and ſaid to the Hangman, I pray you let me lay my beard over the block, leſt you ſhould cut it; for though you have Warrant to cut off my head, you have none to cut my beard. But his Devotion was no jeſting matter. for he uſed to wear a ſhirt of hair next his skin for a perpetual penance; and oftentimes in the Church he would put on a Surplice, and help the Prieſt to ſay Maſs; which he forbore not to do, even when he was Lord Chancellor of England, as one time the Duke of Norfolk coming to the Church found him doing it. Two memorable things are recorded of him; one, which ſhews his great integrity, and the ſmall reckoning he made of riches; that having paſſed through ſo many great employments, and born ſo many great Offices; yet in all his time he never purchaſed above one hundred pounds land a year, nor left any great ſtock of mony behind him, when he died. The other, which ſhews his filial piety, that being Lord Chancellor of England, at the ſame time that his Father was a Judge of the Kings Bench, he would always at his going to Weſtminſter, go firſt to the Kings Bench and ask his Father bleſſing before he went to ſit in the Chancery,

The ninth of July this year the Lord Dacres of the North was arraigned at Weſtminſter of high Treaſon, before the Duke of Norfolk, as high Steward of England; his Indictment being read, he ſo anſwered every part and matter therein contained, that by his Peers he was found not guilty; a rare thing to ſtop a current that ran with ſuch violence. The one and twentieth of September Doctor Taylour Maſter of the Rolls was diſcharged of that Office: and the nineteenth of October following Thomas Cromwell was ſworn in his place.

This year the King of the Scots was inſtalled Knight of the Garter, by his Deputy the Lord Erskin; and Stephen Gardiner, who after the Cardinals death, was made Biſhop of Wincheſter, was ſent Ambaſſadour Legier into France, where he remained three years. Alſo in January of this year, Katharine Princeſs Dowager, fell into her laſt Sickneſs; to whom the King ſent the Emperours Ambaſſadour Legier, deſiring her to be of good comfort; but ſhe finding her death to approach, cauſed only one of her Gentlewomen to write a Letter to the King; commending to him her Daughter and his, and beſeeching him to be a good Father to her: and then deſiring him further, to have ſome conſideration of her Servants, on the eighth of January, at Kimbolton, ſhe departed this life. and was buried at Peterborough. A Woman of ſo vertuous a life, and of ſo great obſequiouſneſs to her Husband, that from her only merit, is grown a reputation to all Spaniſh wives.

Alſo the nine and twentieth of January this year, Queen Anne was delivered of a child before her time, which was born dead.

Queen Anne is delivered of a Child before her time: and born dead.

And now King Henry began to fall into thoſe great diſorders, which have been the blemiſh of his life, and have made him to be blotted out of the Catalogue of our beſt Princes; for firſt in October this year, he ſent Doctor Lee and others to viſit the Abbeys, Priories, and Nunneries in England, who ſet at Liberty all thoſe Religious perſons that would forſake their habit, and all that were under the age of four and twenty years; and in December following a ſurvey was taken of all Chantries, and the names of ſuch as had the gift of them. After which, in a Parliament holden the fourth of February, an Act was made, which gave the King all Religious houſes, with all their Lands and Goods, that were of the value of three hundred marks a year and under: the number of which houſes was three hundred ſeventy and ſix: the value of their Lands yearly, above two and thirty thouſand pounds, their moveable Goods one hundred thouſand, the Religious perſons put out of the ſame houſes above ten thouſand. This year William Tindall was burnt at a Town in Flanders, between Bruſſels and Mechlyn, called Villefort, for tranſlating into Engliſh the New Teſtament, and divers parts of the Old; who having been long impriſoned, was upon the Lord Cromwell's writing for his Deliverance, in all haſte brought to the fire, and burnt.

It was now the eight and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Monday there were ſolemn Juſts holden at Greenwich, from whence the King ſuddenly departed and came to Weſtminſter, whoſe ſudden departure ſtrook great amazement into many, but to the Queen eſpecially, and not without cauſe; for the next day the Lord Rochford her Brother, and Henry Norris were brought to the Tower of London, priſoners, whither alſo the ſame day at five a clock in the afternoon, was brought Queen Anne her ſelf, by Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, and Sir William Kingſton Lieutenant of the Tower, who at the Towergate fell on her knees before the ſaid Lords, beſeeching God to help her, as ſhe was innocent of that whereof ſhe was accuſed: On the fifteenth of May ſhe was arraigned in the Tower before the Duke of Norfolk, ſitting as High Steward of England. When her Indictment was read, ſhe made unto it ſo wiſe and diſcreet anſwers, that ſhe ſeemed fully to clear her ſelf of all matters laid to her charge: but being tried by her Peers, whereof the Duke of Suffolk was chief, ſhe was by them found guilty, and had Judgment pronounced by the Duke of Norfolk: immediately the Lord Rochford her Brother, was likewiſe arraigned and condemned: who on the ſeventeenth of May, together with Henry Norris, Mark Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weſton, all of the Kings Privy Chamber, about matters touching the Queen, were beheaded on the Tower Hill. Queen Anne her ſelf on the nineteenth of May, on a Scaffold upon the Green within the Tower, was beheaded with the Sword of Callice by the Hangman of that Town; her body with the head was buried in the Quire of the Chappel there. This Queen Anne was the Daughter of Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk; the Earls Father was the Son of Sir William Bullen, whose Wife was Margaret the second Daughter and Co-heir of Thomas Butler Earl of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the Son of Sir Godfrey Bullen, Lord Mayor of London, who lieth buried in Saint Leonards Church in the Jewry, whose Wife was Anne eldest Daughter and Co-heir to Thomas Lord Hoo and Hastings: and his descent was out of the House of the Bullens in the County of Norfolk: Thus much for her Parentage. For her Religion, she was an earnest Professor, and one of the first Countenancers of the Gospel: in Alms-deeds so liberal, that in nine months space, it is said she distributed among the poor, to the value of fifteen thousand pounds: Now for the Crimes for which she died, (Adultery and Incest;) proofs of her guiltiness there are none recorded; of her innocency many: first, her own clearing of all objections, at the time of her Arraignment, then Cromwell's Writing to the King, after full examination of the matter; that many things have been objected, but none confessed, only some Circumstances had been acknowledged by Mark Smeton: (and what was Mark Smeton, but a mean fellow, one that upon promise of life, would say any thing! and having said something, which they took hold of, was soon after executed lest he should retract it:) lastly, they that were accused with her, they all denied it to the death: even Henry Norris; whom the King specially favoured, and promised him pardon if he would but confess it. It was a poor proof of Incest with her Brother, that coming one morning into her Chamber before she was up, he leaned down upon her Bed, to say something in her ear; yet this was taken hold for a proof: and it need be no marvel, if we consider the many adversaries she had, as being a Protestant, and perhaps in that respect, the King himself not greatly her friend: (for though he had excluded the Pope, yet he continued a Papist still) and then who knows not, that Nature is not more able of an Acorn to make an Oak, than Authority is able of the least surmise to make a certainty. But howsoever it was, that her death was contrived; certain it is, that it cast upon King Henry a dishonourable Imputation; insomuch that where the Protestant Princes of Germany had resolved to choose him for head of their League; after they heard of this Queens death, in such a manner, they utterly refused him as unworthy of the honour, and it is memorable what conceit Queen Anne her self had of her Death; for at the time when she was led to be beheaded in the Tower, she called one of the Kings Privy Chamber to her, and said unto him, Commend me to the King, and tell him, he is constant in his course of advancing me; for from a private Gentlewoman, he made me Marquess, from a Marquess a Queen; and now that he had left no higher degree of worldly honour for me, he hath made me a Martyr.

Her Parentage.

Her Religion and Alms-deeds.

Her Innocency.

Immediately after her death, in the week before Whitsuntide, the King Married Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, who at Whitsuntide was openly shewed as Queen: and on Tuesday in Whitsun-week her Brother Sir Edmund Seymour was created Vicount Beauchamp, and Sir Walter Hangerford was made Lord Hangerford.

The King Marries the Lady Jane Seymour.

The eighth of June the Parliament began; during the which, the Lord Thomas Howard, without the Kings assent, had affianced the Lady Margaret Dowglas, Daughter to the Queen of Scots, and Niece to the King: for which he was attainted of Treason, and an Act was made for like offenders hereafter; and so he died in the Tower, and she long time remained there a Prisoner; yet afterward was set at liberty, and married Matthew Earl of Lenox, who by him had Henry, Father of James the first King of Great Britain.

In the time of this Parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy had a solemn Convocation at Pauls Church in London; where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a Book of Religion; intituled, Articles devised by the Kings Highness: in which Book are specially mentioned but three Sacraments; namely, Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance; also certain Injunctions were set forth, whereby many of the old Holidays were abrogated, specially those that fell in Harvest time.

Articles devised by the Kings Highness.

The two and twentieth of July, Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerset, base Son of King Henry by Elizabeth Blunt, died at St James, and was buried at Thetstone in Norfolk.

The nine and twentieth of June the King held a great Justs and Triumph at Westminster, but a disastrous Sea-fight was on the water, where one Gates a Gentleman was drowned in his Harness, and by the breaking of a Gun two Mariners were sore maimed: in July following Thomas Cromwel, Secretary to the King, and Master of the Rolls, was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal: and the nineteenth of July the Lord Fitz-Warren was created Earl of Bath, and the day after, the said Cromwell was made Lord Cromwell; and on the eighteenth of July, Vicar General under the King over the Spirituality; who sate divers times in the Convocation House, amongst the Bishops as head over them: and now was the state of Religion in England come to a strange pass: because always in passing, and had no consistence; for at first, the Authority of the Pope was excluded in some cases only, a while after in all; but yet his Doctrine was wholly retained. Afterward his Doctrine came to be impugned, but in some few points only: a while after, in many more; that the Fable of Proteus might no longer be a Fable, when the Religion in England might be his true Moral; and indeed, it could be no otherwise; the distance between the two Religions being not possible to be passed per saltum, but must be done by degrees, which degrees may be observed in the progress of the story; for where at first it was permitted only to read the Bible in English, now it came to be permitted to pray in English; for now in September the Lord Cromwell set forth Injunctions, to have the Lords Prayer, the Ave, the Creed, the the ten Commandments, and all Articles of the Christian Faith translated into English, and to be taught by all Parsons and Curates to their Parishioners; which Innovation so stirred up the People, that in Lincolnshire they assembled to the number of twenty thousand, against whom the King himself went in person, who winning by perswasion their chief Leaders, brought the rest upon pardon to submit themselves: but when he had himself done the work of Mercy, he afterward sent the Duke of Suffolk, with Sir Francis Brian, and Sir John Russel, to do the Work of Justice, who caused Nicholas Melton, and a Monk naming himself Captain Cobler, and thirteen other (Ringleaders of the Sedition) to be apprehended, and most of them to be executed. But this Commotion was scarce appeased, when presently there arose another in the North-parts, where forty thousand were assembled, giving themselves out for an Holy Pilgrimage, where on one side of their Ensigns, they had Christ hanging on the Cross, on the other side the Cup and Bread of the Sacrament, as taking Arms only for maintenance of the Faith of Christ, and deliverance of the Holy Church now oppressed: but these were opposed by George Earl of Shrewsbury, who having rais'd an Army without Commission, though to resist the Rebels, yet began to be much troubled, whether in so doing he had not committed Treason, and was never quiet till he had sent to the King for Pardon and Commission to proceed: at which time a rumour being raised amongst his Souldiers, that the Earl so well liked the Rebels Cause, that what shew soever he made, yet when it should come to the tryal, he would not stick to joyn with them, and take their Parts: to remove which opinion out of their minds, he caused all his Souldiers to come before him, and made his Chaplain give him an Oath; by which he swore in their hearing, to be true to the Crown, and never to be assisting to any Rebels: to his aid were sent the Duke of Norfolk, with the Marques of Exeter, the Earls of Huntington and Rutland; who with a mighty Army approaching the Rebels, beyond Doncaster, in the way towards York, attempted first to have pacified them without blood-shed; but when no perswasions would serve, it was resolved of both sides to come to Battel: but see here the great goodness of God; for the night before the day appointed for Battel, it happened that a little Brook called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon a small rain grew to such a height, that it was not passible by either Foot or Horse; so as the Armies having time to consider, and considering perhaps this miracle as sent of God, they came to agreement, and upon pardon disbanded and returned to their houses; but in the mean time they had besieged the Castle of Scarborough, where the resolute carriage of Sir Ralph Evers is memorable, who held the Castle by only his own Servants and Tenants, and that, when for twenty days together, he had no other sustenance but Bread and Water. But all Commotions were not yet appeased; for at this very time, there was another great Army assembled out of Cumberland, Westmerland, and the North-parts of Lancashire, marching Southwards; but by the diligence of the Earl of Darby, to whom also the Earl of Sussex was sent, they were suppressed, and their chief Leaders, as the Abbots of Wally, Sauley, and others, apprehended and hanged. But neither is there yet an end of Commotions; for now in February, Nicholas Musgrave, Tho. Tilby, with others to the number of twelve thousand, began a Rebellion, and besieged Carlile, but by the power of the City were first beaten back, and then were encountred by the Duke of Norfolk, who caused seventy four of them by Martial Law to be hanged on the Walls of Carlile. But neither was there yet an end of Commotions; for now in Setrington, Pickering, Leigh, and Scarborough, began a new Rebellion, by procurement of Francis Bigot; who had a great Power, and meant to have taken Hull, but by the industry of Sir Ralph Ellarker, and the Mayor of the Town, threescore of the Rebels were taken and hanged, and the rest put to flight, and glad to be quiet. But neither yet was there an end of Commotions; for in the latter end of this eight and twentieth year, the Lord Darcy, the Lord Hussey, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Bulmer, and his Wife, Sir Thomas Piercy Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest Esquire, and others began to conspire, although each of them before had been pardoned by the King: but this as being but the fag end of the Commotion, was soon suppressed, the Lord Darcy was beheaded on the Tower-hill, the Lord Hussey at Lincoln, Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains at Hull, Sir John Bulmers Paramour was burnt in Smithfield, and most of the other were executed at Tyburn: Tantæ molis erat, so great a matter it was, to make the Realm be quiet, in so great innovations of Religion.

And yet another.

And yet another.

This year on Saint Georges Feast, the Lord Cromwell was made Knight of the Garter, and on the twelfth of October, which is Saint Edwards even, at Hampton-Court, the Queen was delivered of a Son; (but with so hard a labour that she was fain to be rip'd) the Child was named Edward, whose Godfathers at the Christning were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolk, his Godmother was his Sister the Lady Mary: At his Bishoping, his Godfather was the Duke of Suffolk: on the eighteenth of October, he was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal and Earl of Chester: but the Birth of his Son brought not so much joy to the King, as the Death of his Queen brought him sorrow; for within two days after she died, and was buried at Windsor, and so much was the Kings grief for her death, that he continued a Widower two years after.

Queen Jane is delivered of a child named Edward, but dieth.

It is not unworthy the relating, what a miserable dissolution befel the Family of the Geraldines, or Fitz-Garrets (Earl of Kildare in Ireland) about this time; for Gerald Fitz-Garret, who had been ten years Deputy in Ireland, upon the complaint of some fault, was sent for over into England, where not making a satisfying answer, he was committed to the Tower; but before his coming over, had with the Kings leave, left Deputy there his own Son, a young man of not above twenty years of age, but yet ripe of underunderſtanding, and fit for the place: This young Lord hearing that his Father was committed Priſoner to the Tower, and ſoon after, as the rumour increaſed, that he was put to death; in rage to be revenged, roſe up in Arms: and having five Uncles in the Country (men of great eſtimation) drew them (though ſome of them unwillingly) to take his part: Amongſt other outrages he committed, the Archbiſhop of Dublin was ſlain in his preſence: the Father in the Tower hearing hereof, with very grief died; the Son and his Uncles, upon the Kings ſending an Army, were all either taken or ſubmitted; and being ſent for over into England, thoſe of his Uncles, that againſt their wills had been drawn into the action had good hopes of their lives, till entring the Ship of paſſage, which was called the Cow, they then preſently deſpaired, becauſe of a Propheſie, that five Sons of a certain Earl ſhould be carried into England in the belly of a Cow, and never after return: and indeed it fell out true, for through the malice of their adverſaries, (exaſperating the King againſt them, and ſaying, there would never be quietneſs in Ireland, as long as any of the Geraldines were left alive) they were all put to death: one only Son of the Family remained, a youth of thirteen years of age, who though at that time ſick of the Small pox, yet made ſhift to ſave himſelf by flight, fled firſt into France, and frighted from thence, afterward into Flanders, and driven from thence, at laſt into Italy, where protected by Reginald Pool, at that time made Cardinal by Pope Julie the third, he was afterward, by his means, reſtored to his Dignity and his Patrimony.

Edw. Seymour Vicount Beauchamp is made Earl of Hartford. Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Admiral is created Earl of Southampton.

This year Edward Seymour, Vicount Beauchamp, the Queens Brother was created Earl of Hartford; and Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Admiral, was created Earl of Southampton, Maſter Paulet was made Vice Treaſurer, Sir John Ruſſell was made Controller of the Kings Houſe, and divers Gentlemen were made Knights.

In February divers Roods were taken down by the Kings commandment, as the Rood of Boxeley, called the Rood of Grace, which was made with vices to move the eyes and lips; alſo the Rood called St. Saviour at Bermondſey Abbey in Southwark, and divers others. In May a Frier Obſervant, called Frier Forreſt, who had taken the Oath of Supremacy himſelf, yet privately perſwaded others, that the King was not Supreme head of the Church; was thereupon examined, and for his defence ſaid, that he took the Oath with his outward man, but his inward man never conſented to it: but this anſwer ſerved not his turn from being condemned; and on a pair of Gallows prepared for him, in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle, & arm-holes, all quick, and under the Gallows was made a fire wherewith he was conſumed: A little before his execution, a huge great Image was brought to the Gallows, fetched out of Wales, which the Welch men had in great reverence, called Darvel Gatheran, of which went a Propheſie, that this Image ſhould ſet a whole Foreſt on fire, which was thought to take effect, in ſetting this Frier Forreſt on fire, and conſuming him to nothing.

Frier Forreſt hang'd by the middle and withal burnt; by which a propheſie fulfilled.

In September, by the ſpecial motion of the L. Cromwell, all the notable Images, unto which were made any ſpecial Pilgrimages & offerings, were taken down and burnt; as the Images of Walſingham, Ipſwich, Worceſter, the Lady of Wilſdon, with many other; and forthwith by means of the ſaid Cromwell, all the orders of the Friers and Nuns, with their Cloyſters and Houſes, were ſuppreſſed and put down: alſo the Shrines of counterfeit Saints; amongſt others, the Shrine of Tho. Becket in the Priory of Chriſt-Church was taken to the Kings uſe, and his Bones, Scull, and all which was there found, with a piece broken out by the wound of his head, were all burnt in the ſame Church by command of the Lord Cromwell: and the one and twentieth of October, the Church of Tho. Becket in London, called the Hoſpital of St. Thomas of Acres was ſuppreſſed: the ſixteenth of Novem. the Black-fryers in London were ſuppreſſed; the next day the White-fryers, the Gray-fryers, and the Monks of the Charterhouſe, and ſo all the other immediately after: only three Abbots reſiſted, the Abbot of Colcheſter, the Abbot of Reading, and the Abbot of Glaſtenbury, who therefore were all taken & executed. The four and twentieth of November the Biſhop of Rocheſter preached at Pauls-Croſs, and there ſhewed the blood of Hales, affirming it to be no blood, but Honey clarified and coloured with Saffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Council. The number of Monaſteries ſuppreſſed, were ſix hundred forty five, beſides fourſcore and ten Colledges, one hundred and ten Hoſpitals, and of Chantries and free Chappels two thouſand three hundred ſeventy four. But now to make amends for the ſuppreſſing of ſo many Monaſteries, the King inſtituted certain new Biſhopricks, as at Weſtminſter, Oxford, Peterborough, Briſtow, Cheſter, and Gloceſter; and aſſigned certain Canons and Prebends to each of them.

The third of Novem. Henry Courtney Marqueſs of Exeter, and Earl of Devonſhire, Henry Pool Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington, Knight of the Garter, and Maſter of the Kings Horſe, and Sir Edward Nevill brother to the L. Aburgeiney, were ſent to the Tower, being accuſed by Sir Geoffry Pool the Lord Montacutes Brother of high Treaſon; they were indicted for deviſing to promote and advance one Reinold Pool to the Crown, and put down King Henry. This Pool was a near Kinſman of the Kings (being the Son of the Lady Margaret Counteſs of Salisbury, Daughter and Heir to George Duke of Clarence) he had been brought up by the King in learning, and made Dean of Exeter; but being ſent after to learn experience by travel, he grew ſo great a friend of the Popes, that he became an enemy to King Henry, and for his enmity to the King, was by Pope Julius the third made Cardinal; for this mans cauſe the Lords aforeſaid being condemned, were all executed; the Lord Marqueſs, the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill, beheaded on the Tower-Hill, the ninth of January. Sir Nicholas Carew, the third of March; two Prieſts condemned with them were hanged at Tiburn; Sir Geoffry Pool though condemned alſo, yet had his pardon.

lace at Weſtminſter, for the King to ſit: and when the Biſhops had urged their Arguments & could not prevail, then the King took him in hand, hoping perhaps to have the honour of converting an Heretick, when the Biſhops could not do it, and withal promiſed him pardon if he would recant; but all would not do: Nicholſon remained obſtinate, the King miſt his Honour, the Delinquent miſt his pardon, and ſhortly after was drawn to Smithfield, and there burnt.

About this time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by inſtigation of Cardinal Pool, had earneſtly moved divers great Princes to invade England; he as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earneſtly to provide for defence; and to that end rode himſelf to the Sea-coaſts to ſee them fortified, and in needful places Bulwarks to be erected: He cauſed his Navy to be rigged, and to be in readineſs at any ſhort warning: He cauſed Muſters to be taken in all Shires; and liſts of all able men in every County, in London ſpecially; where Sir William Forman the then Major, certified the number of fifteen thouſand, not that there were no more, but that ſo many were ready prepared; and theſe on the eighth of May, the King himſelf ſaw Muſtered in St. James Park; where the Citizens ſtrove in ſuch ſort to exceed each other in bravery of arms, and forwardneſs of ſervice, as if the City had been a Camp, and they not men of the Gown, but all profeſt Souldiers; which they performed to their great coſt, but greater commendation.

An. Reg. 31 1540. It was now the one and thirtieth year of King Henries reign, and the nine and fortieth of his age; when having continued a widower two years, he began to think of marrying again; and he needed not to be a ſuitor for a Wife, for he was ſued unto to take one. The Emperour ſolicited him to marry the Dutcheſs of Milan; but to marry her he muſt firſt obtain a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was reſolved rather to have no Wife, than to have any more to do with the Pope. Then the Duke of Cleve made ſuit unto him, to marry the Lady Anne his Siſter, and he was a Proteſtant Prince; and ſo, though differing in points of Doctrine, yet in the main point of excluding the Pope, both of one mind. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell ſpecially; and indeed it concerned him more than any other, that the King ſhould take a Proteſtant Wife, ſeeing his actions had been ſuch, as none but a Proteſtant Queen would ever like; and if the Queen ſhould not like them, the King, though done by his leave would not like them long. Hereupon ſuch means was uſed, that Ambaſſadours came from the Duke of Cleve to conclude the Match; and then the 11 of December the Lady her ſelf in great ſtate was brought to Callice, and then over to Dover; and being come to Rocheſter, the King ſecretly came to ſee her, afterward ſhe was conducted to London, met by the way in ſeveral places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdom. The third of January ſhe was received into London by Sir William Hollys Knight, then Lord Mayor, with Orations, Pageants, and all complements of State, the greateſt that ever had been ſeen. On Twelfth-day the Marriage was ſolemnized: the Archbiſhop of Canterbury did the Office, the Earl of Overſtein a German Lord gave her. In April following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the Kings heart for ever by making this match, was made Earl of Eſſex; for in March before, Henry Bourchier Earl of Eſſex, and the antienteſt Earl of England, had broke his neck, by ſeeking to break a young Horſe, leaving only one Daughter, and ſhe dying without iſſue, the Earldom came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the honour, till afterward in Queen Elizabeths time, and then made, but not reſtored.

The Lord Cromwell is made Earl of Eſſex.

How the Earldom of Eſſex came to the Family of Devereux.

The ninth of March, the King created Sir William Paulet Treaſurer of his Houſe, Lord Saint-John; Sir John Ruſſel Comptroller, Lord Ruſſel; and ſhortly after Sir William Par was created Lord Par. The eight and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Weſtminſter, in the which Margaret Counteſs of Salisbury, Gertrude Wife to the Marqueſs of Exeter, Reynold Pool Cardinal, Brother to the Lord Montacute, Sir Adrian Foskew, Thomas Dingley Knight of Saint Johns, and divers others were attainted of high Treaſon; of whom Foskew and Dingley the tenth of July were beheaded, the Counteſs of Salisbury two years after; and in this Parliament the Act of the ſix Articles was eſtabliſhed, and Sir Nicholas Hare was reſtored to his place of Speaker in the Parliament.

Earls created.

It was now five months after the Kings Marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve; and though the King, at the firſt ſight of the Lady, did not like her Perſon; yet, whether as reſpecting the honour of Ladies, he would not diſgrace her at the firſt meeting; or whether he meant to try how time might work him to a better liking; or indeed, that he would not give diſtaſte to the German Princes at that time, for ſome ends he had a working, he diſſembled the matter, and all things went on in a ſhew of contentment on all hands. But for all theſe ſhews, the crafty Biſhop of London; Stephen Gardiner, finding how the world went with the Kings affection towards his Queen; and for her ſake with Cromwell; to neither of whom he was greatly affected (not to the Queen, as miſliking her Religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his greatneſs;) he ſo wrought upon the Kings inclination, what by ſuggeſting, and what by aggravating, that the Lord Cromwell, the ninth of July, ſitting in the Council Chamber, was ſuddenly apprehended and committed to the Tower; and the nineteenth of the ſame month was attainted by Parliament, and never came to his Anſwer; by a Law, (which as ſome reported) he himſelf had cauſed to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-hill; for crimes (as appears in Record) of Hereſie and Treaſon. This Lord Cromwell was born at Putney, a Village in Surrey near the Thames ſide, Son to a Smith, after whoſe deceaſe his Mother was married to a Sheerman; for the pregnancy of his Wit he was firſt entertained by Cardinal Woolſey, and by him imployed in many great Affairs: The Cardinal falling, the King took him into his ſervice; and finding his great abilities, firſt advanced him for his worth, and then for his pleaſure overthrew him. But the greateſt part of Stephen Gardiners practice had been done before;

fore; for at Midſummer before, the King cauſed the Queen to remove to Richmond, as for her health and pleaſure; and in the time of her abſence, on the ſixth of July, ſent certain Lords to the Lower Houſe of Parliament, who there declared certain cauſes, for which the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve, was not to be counted lawful; and ſo carried the matter, that the Convocation clearly determined, the King might marry any other; and ſo might ſhe. Being thus Divorced, it was further Enacted, ſhe ſhould no more be called Queen, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expreſly delivered; ſome ſay a precontract of the ſaid Lady with a Lord of Germany was pretended: but it ſeems to have been for ſome womaniſh defect in her body; as ſhe ſpared not to affirm, that ſhe had never been carnally known by the King in all the time of their lying together: and as it is ſaid, when her Ladies one time ſaid unto her, that they looked now every day to hear of her great belly; ſhe ſhould anſwer, they might look long enough, unleſs ſaying, How doeſt thou ſweet heart? Good morrow ſweet heart, and ſuch like words, could make a great belly; for (ſaid ſhe) more than this there never paſſed between the King and me. However it was, ſhe willingly ſubmitted to the Decree, whether out of fear, or perhaps as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private life here in England, well reſpected of the King, and dying ſixteen years after, in the fourth year of Queen Mary, was buried at Weſtminſter.

About this time Leonard Gray Deputy of Ireland, was on the Tower-hill beheaded, for ſuffering his nephew Gerald Fitz-Garret to eſcape, who had been declared an enemy unto the State; and then alſo was Thomas Fines Lord Dacres, a young man of four and twenty years of age, hanged at Tiburn, for killing a mean perſon upon a ſudden affray; alſo the fourth of Auguſt, Thomas Epſon a Monk of Weſtminſter, for denying to take his Oath, to be true to the King, had his Monks Garment plucked from his back, the laſt that was ſeen in ſuch habit in England till Queen Maries days.

The ſixth of July in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Henry had been divorced from the Lady Anne of Cleve, and now the eighth of Auguſt following, the Lady Katharine Howard, Niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and Daughter to the Lord Edward Howard, was ſhewed openly as Queen at Hampton-Court.

King Henry marries the Lady Katharine Howard.

On the tenth of June the year following, Sir Edmund Knevet of Norfolk, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-cloth, for ſtriking one Maſter Cleer of Norfolk, within the Tennis-court of the Kings Houſe; being found guilty, he had judgment to loſe his right hand, and to forfeit all his Lands and Goods; whereupon there was called to do execution, firſt the Serjeant Surgeon, with his Inſtruments pertaining to his Office, then the Serjeant of the Woodyard, with a mallet and a block to lay the hand upon, then the Kings Maſter Cook with a knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the Larder to ſet the knife right on the joynt, then the Serjeant Ferrier with ſearing Irons to ſear the veins, then the Serjeant of the Poultrey with a Cock, which Cock ſhould have his head ſmitten off upon the ſame block, and with the ſame knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandry with Sear-cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heat the Irons, a chafer of water to cool the ends of the Irons, and two forms for all Officers to ſet their ſtuff on, then the Serjeant of the Cellar with Wine, Ale, and Beer; then the Serjeant of the Ewry, with Baſon, Ewre, and Towels: all things being thus prepared, Sir William Pickering Knight Marſhal was commanded to bring in his priſoner, Sir Edmund Knevet, to whom the Chief Juſtice declared his offence, which the ſaid Knevet confeſſed, and humbly ſubmitted himſelf to the Kings mercy; only he deſired, that the King would ſpare his right hand and take his left, becauſe (ſaid he) if my right hand be ſpared, I may live to do the King good ſervice: of whoſe ſubmiſſion, and reaſon of his ſuit, when the King was informed, he granted him to loſe neither of his hands, and pardoned him alſo of his Lands and Goods.

Sir Edmund Knevet is adjudged to loſe his right hand, and the ſolemn manner of doing it.

The Summer of his three and thirtieth year, King Henry, with his Queen Katharine, made a progreſs into the North parts, and returning at Alhollantide to Hampton-Court, he was there informed of the Queens diſſolute life, firſt before her marriage with one Francis Deerham, a Gentleman of Norfolk, whom imployed afterward in Ireland, ſhe had lately again at Pomfret received into her Service; and now ſince her marriage with one Thomas Colepepper, of the Kings Privy-chamber; whereupon the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothe ſley Knight, Secretary to the King, was ſent to the Queen at Hampton-Court, to charge her with theſe Crimes, and diſcharging her houſhold, to cauſe her to be conveyed to Sion, there to remain, till the Kings pleaſure ſhould be further known: The Delinquents being examined, Deerham confeſſed, that before the Kings marriage with the Lady Katharine, there had been a pre-contract between himſelf and her; but when he once underſtood of the Kings liking towards her, he then waved and concealed it for her preferment: ſo the firſt of December theſe Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guildhall, they confeſſed the Indictment, and had Judgment to die, as in caſes of Treaſon: the tenth of December, they were drawn from the Tower to Tiburn, where Colepepper was beheaded, and Deerham was hanged and diſmembred: Colepeppers body was buried in Sepulchres Church in London, but both their heads were ſet on London-bridge: the two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the Kings-Bench, the Lord William Howard and the Lady Margaret his Wife, Katharine Tilney, and Alice Wreſtwold Gentlewoman, Joan Bulmer, Wife to Anthony Bulmer Gentleman, Anne Howard Wife to Henry Howard Eſquire, and Brother to the Queen, with divers others, who were all condemned for miſpriſion of Treaſon, for concealing the Queens miſdemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their lands and goods during life, and to remain in perpetual priſon. The ſixteenth of Jan. the Parliament began at Weſtminſter, where the Lords and Commons Petitioned the King, that he would not vex himſelf with the Queens offence, and that both ſhe and the Lady Rochford might be attainted by Parliament; and and that to avoid protracting of time, he would give his Royal assent unto it, under the great Seal, without staying for the end of the Parliament. Also that Deerham and Colepepper having been attainted before by the Common Law, might be attainted likewise by Parliament: all which was assented to by the King; and after, on the thirtieth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochford were beheaded on the Green within the Tower, where they confessed their offences, and died penitently: yet something to take off the offences of this Queen; it is certainly said, that after her condemnation, she protested to Doctor White, Bishop of Wincheſter, her last Confessor, that as for the act for which she was condemned, she took God and his Holy Angels to witness, upon her souls salvation, that she died guiltless.

King Henry is proclaimed King of Ireland.

Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland, whereas before this time, the Kings of England were only entituled Lords of Ireland: and this title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland, before Sir Anthony Sentleger Knight, the Kings Deputy there.

Arthur Plantagenet Vicount Liſle dieth of Joy.

About this time Arthur Plantagenet Vicount Liſle, base Son to King Edward the fourth, having been imprison'd upon suspicion of a practice, for betraying of Callice to the French, whilest he was the Kings Lieutenant there, was now found to be innocent of the Fact: and thereupon the King to make him some reparation for his disgrace, sent him a Ring, and a very gracious message, by Sir Thomas Wriothsley his Secretary; whereat the said Vicount took so great joy, that the night following, of that very joy he died: so deadly a thing is any passion, even joy it self, if it be extreme. After his death Sir John Dudley, his wives son, was created Vicount Liſle. This Sir John Dudley was Son to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the first year of this Kings Reign, and was made Vicount Liſle in right of his Mother.

Sir John Dudley, Son to Edmund Dudley beheaded, is made Vicount Liſle.

Burgesses of the Parliament and their servants free from arrest.

During this Parliament, one George Ferrers Gentleman, servant to the King and Burgess for the Town of Plymouth in Devonshire, in going to the Parliament House, was arrested in London by a Process out of the Kings Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as surety for one Welden, at the suit of one White, which arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Moyl Knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgesses there; order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint-John, should be sent to the Counter in Bredstreet (whither the said Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered: but the Officers of the Counter not only refused to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant such language, that they fell at last to an affray; at which time the Sheriffs coming, they also took their Officers part; so as the Serjeant was fain to return without the Prisoner; which being signified to the Speaker and the Burgesses; they took the matter in so ill part, that they would sit no more without their Burgess: and thereupon rising up, repaired to the upper House, where the whole Case was declared by the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellour, and the Lords and Judges there assembled; who judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the House of Commons it self: whereupon returning to their places again, upon new debate of the Case, they took order that their Serjeant should once more repair to the Sheriffs of London, and demand the prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellour offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it; being of a clear opinion, that all commandements from the neather House were to be executed by their Serjeant without Writ, only by shewing his Mace, which is his Warrant: but before the Serjeants return into London, the Sheriffs better advised became more mild, and upon the second demand, delivered the prisoner without any denial; but then the Serjeant had further in charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerks of the Counter, to appear personally the next morning before the House of Commons: where appearing, they were charged by the Speaker with their contempt, and compelled to make immediate answer, without being admitted to any counsel: Sir Roger Chomley Recorder of London offered to speak in the cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the parties themselves: in conclusion, the Sheriffs and White who had caused the Arrest, were committed to the Tower; the Officer that did the Arrest, with four other Officers, to Newgate; but after two or three dayes, upon the humble suit of the Mayor, were set at liberty; and becaus the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by priviledge of Parliament, was not by Law to be brought again into execution; and so the Creditor without remedy for his Debt, against him as his principal debtor, therefore after long debate, by the space of nine or ten dayes together, they at last resolved to make an Act of purpose, to revive the execution of the said debt, against Welden who was principal debtor, and to discharge Ferrers that was but surety: wherein notwithstanding, the House was divided, and the Act passed but by fourteen voices: the King being advertised of this proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancellour and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the Lower House, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect: first commending their wisdom, in maintaining the priviledges of their House (which he would not have to be infringed in any point) he alledged, that he being the head of the Parliament, and attending in his own person upon the business thereof, ought in reason, to have priviledge for himself and all his Servants attending upon him; so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burgess, but only his servant; yet in that respect, he was to have the priviledge as well any other: for I ununderstand (saith he) that you, not only for your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your Cooks and Horse-keepers, enjoy the same priviledge; insomuch, as my Lord Chancellour here present hath informed us, that whilest he was Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a Statute of the Staple, and for so much, as the said Cook during all the Parliament ſerved the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by Priviledge of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court, (as our learned Council informeth us) is ſo great, that all Acts and Proceſſes coming out of any other Court, muſt for a time ceaſe and give place to it: and touching the party himſelf, though for his preſumption he was worthy to have loſt his debt, yet I commend your equity, that have reſtored him to his debt againſt him that was the principal: When the King had ſaid this, Sir Edward Montacute Lord Chief Juſtice, roſe up and confirmed by many reaſons, all that the King had ſaid, as likewiſe did all the other Lords, none ſpeaking any thing to the contrary.

1543. It was now the four and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when in May he took a loan of money of all ſuch as were valued at fifty pounds and upwards in the Subſidy Book; the Lord Privy-Seal, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Sir Thomas Baker, and Sir Thomas Wriothſley were Commiſſioners for the loan in London, who ſo handled the matter, that of ſome chief Citizens they obtained a thouſand marks impreſt to the Kings uſe: for which Privy-Seals were delivered to repay it again within two years.

At this time were many complaints made by the Engliſh againſt the Scots, partly for receiving and maintaining divers Engliſh Rebels, fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the Engliſh Borders: but ſtill when the King of England was preparing to oppoſe them, the Scottiſh King would ſend Ambaſſadours to treat of reconcilement; till at laſt, after many deluſory pranks of the Scots, the King of England, no longer enduring ſuch abuſes, ſent the Duke of Norfolk his Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earl of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hartford, Angus, Rutland, the Lords of the North parts, Sir Anthony Brown Maſter of the Kings Horſe, and Sir John Gage, Comptroller of the Kings Houſe, with others to the number of twenty thouſand men; who on the one and twentieth of October entred Scotland, where ſtaying but eight days only, he burnt above eighteen Towns, Abbeys, and Caſtles, and then, without having Battel offered, for want of victuals returned to Barwick; as ſoon as he returned, comes abroad the King of Scots, raiſeth a power of fifteen thouſand men, and uſing great threatnings what he would do, invaded the Weſt Borders: but the edge of his threatning was ſoon taken off; for the Baſtard Dacres, with Jack of Muſgrave, ſetting upon them with only an hundred Light-Horſe, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to flight; upon a conceit, that the Duke of Norfolk with all his Army had been come into thoſe parts; where were taken priſoners of the Scots, the Earl of Caſſil and Glencarn, the Lord Maxwel Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwel, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sinclere, the Kings Minion, John Roſs Lord of Gray, Roger Erskin Son to the Lord Erſkin, Car Lord of Gredon, the Lord Maxwels two Brothers, John Leſley Baſtard Son to the Earl of Rothus, George Hame Lord of Hemetton, with divers other men of account, to the number of above two hundred, and more than eight hundred of meaner calling; ſo as ſome one Engliſh man, and ſome women alſo had three or four priſoners in their hands: at which overthrow, the King of Scots took ſuch grief, that he fell into a burning Ague, and thereof died, leaviug behinde him one only Daughter: and here King Henry began to apprehend a greater matter than the Victory; for he and his Council conceived, that his Daughter would be a fit match for his Son Prince Edward, thereby to make a perpetual union of the two Kingdoms; and to this purpoſe they conferred with the Lords whom they had taken priſoners, who exceeding glad of the propoſition, and promiſing to further it by all the poſſible means they could, were thereupon ſet at liberty, and ſuffered to return home. Coming into Scotland, and acquainting the Earl of Arrain with the motion, who was choſen Governour of the young Queen, and of the Realm; the matter with great liking was entertained, and in Parliament of the three Eſtates in Scotland, the Marriage was confirmed, and a Peace between the two Realms for ten years was Proclaimed, and Ambaſſadours ſent into England, for ſealing the conditions. But Beton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrews being Cardinal, and at the Popes devotion, and therefore an utter enemy to King Henry, ſo croſſed the buſineſs, that it came to nothing, but ended in a War between the two Kingdoms; ſo as in March the year following, the Lord Seymour Earl of Hartford, with an Army by Land, and Sir John Dudley Lord Liſle, with a Fleet by Sea, met at New-Caſtle, and there joyned together, for invading of Scotland; with the Earl of Hartford, were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cobham, Clinton, Conyers, Stinton, the Lord William Howard, with Knights and others, to the number of ten thouſand; with Sir John Dudley the Admiral, were two hundred ſail of Ships: on the fourth of May, the whole Army was landed two miles from the Town of Leith, at a place called Granther Garg, and there the Lord Lieutenant putting his men in order, marched towards the Town of Lieth, the Lord Admiral led the forward, the Lieutenant the Battel, and the Earl of Shrewsbury the Rereward. Before they came to the Town of Lieth, the Cardinal with ſix hundred Horſe, beſides Foot, lay in the way to impeach the paſſage; but they were ſo aſſailed by the Harquebuſars, that they were glad to flie, and the firſt man that fled was the Cardinal himſelf, and then the Earls of Huntley, Murrey, and Bothwel; hereupon the Engliſh made forward to Lieth, and entred it without any great reſiſtance. The ſixth of May they marched towards Edenburgh, and as they approached the Town, the Provoſt with ſome of the Burgers, came and offered the Keyes of the Town to the Lord Lieutenant, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage, and the Town to be preſerved from fire; but the Lord Lieutenant told them, their falſhood had been ſuch, as deſerved no favour, and therefore unleſs they would deliver the Town abſolutely without any condition, he would proceed in his enterpriſe and burn the Town. Here we may ſee what it is to make men deſperate; for to this the Provoſt anſwered, They were better then to ſtand upon defence, and ſo indeed they did, and made the Engliſh glad to retire, for the Caſtle Caſtle ſhot ſo fiercely upon them, that having burnt only a part of the Town, they returned to Leith; but whileſt they lay there, they ſo waſted the Countrey, that within ſeven miles every way of Edenburgh, there was not a Town, nor Village, nor houſe that was left unburnt; at Leith the eleventh day of May, the Lord General made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Conyers, Sir William Wroughton, Sir Thomas Holecraft, Sir Edward Dorrel, Sir Francis Hotham, and others, to the number of at leaſt threeſcore: in Leith Haven, they ſeiſed upon all the Scottiſh Ships, whereof two were of notable fairneſs, the one called the Salamander, given by the French King at the marriage of his Daughter into Scotland; the other called the Unicorn, made by the late Scottiſh King: the ballaſt of which two Ships was Canon-ſhot, whereof they found in the Town, to the number of fourſcore thouſand. On the fifteenth of May, their Army and their Fleet departed from Leith, both in one hour, having firſt ſet the Town on fire, and burned it to the ground: from Leith the Engliſh Army marched to Seaton, from thence to Haddington, from thence to Dunbar, from thence to Ranton, all which Towns and Caſtles, with divers others, they burnt and utterly defaced; and on the eighteenth of May came to Barwick, not having loſt in all the journey above fourteen men.

1544. In the mean time, in King Henry's five and thirtieth year, on Trinity Sunday a new League was entred into and ſworn, between the King and the Emperour at Hampton-Court, to be both offenſive and defenſive.

Lords impriſoned for eating fleſh in Lent. In this year Proclamation was made, whereby the people were licenſed to eat white meats in Lent; but ſtraightly forbidden the eating of fleſh; whereupon ſhortly after, the Earl of Surrey with divers other Lords and Knights were impriſoned fot eating of fleſh contrary to the Proclamation.

Obrine is created Earl of Thowmond: whoſe poſterity enjoyeth the Honour to this day. The third of June this year, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Obrine was here created Earl of Thowmond, (which honour his poſterity enjoyeth to this day) Mack William a Bary, was created Earl of Clanrick-ford, and Mack Gilparick, was made Baron of Ebrankie.

King Henry had already had five Wives, all of them Maids, and no good luck with any of them, he will now therefore try his fortune with a Widow, and thereupon the twelfth of June, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign he took to Wife the Lady Katharine Par, Widow of the Lord Latimer late deceaſed, who was then proclaimed Queen; but how lucky would this match have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knows, ſeeing in a ſhort time of three years they lived together, it was no ſmall danger ſhe eſcaped: which though it happened not till a year or two after this time, yet will not unfitly be ſpoken of in this place, that ſo her ſtory may come together; this Queen as being an earneſt Proteſtant had many great adverſaries, by whom ſhe was accuſed to the King, to have Heretical Books found in her cloſet; and this was ſo much aggravated againſt her, that they prevailed with the King, to ſign a Warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a purpoſe to have her burnt for Hereſie; this Warrant was delivered to Wriothſley Lord Chancellour, and he by chance, or rather indeed by Gods Providence, letting it fall from him, it was taken up and carried to the Queen; who having read it, went ſoon after to viſit the King, at that time keeping his Chamher, by reaſon of a ſore Leg; being come to the King, he preſently fell into talk with her, about ſome points of Religion, demanding her reſolution therein; but ſhe knowing that his nature was not to be croſt, ſpecially conſidering the caſe ſhe was in, made him anſwer, that ſhe was a woman accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majeſty was wiſe and judicious, of whom ſhe muſt learn as of her Lord and Head: Not ſo by Saint Mary (ſaid the King) for you are a Doctor Kate to inſtruct us, and not to be inſtructed by us, as often we have ſeen heretofore: Indeed Sir (ſaid ſhe) if your Majeſty have ſo conceived, I have been miſtaken; for if heretofore I have held talk with you touching Religion, it hath been to learn of your Majeſty ſome point, whereof I ſtood in doubt, and ſometimes that with my talk I might make you forget your preſent infirmity: And is it even ſo ſweet heart? (quoth the King) why then we are friends, and ſo kiſſing her, gave her leave to depart. But ſoon after, was the day appointed by the Kings Warrant for apprehending her; on which day, the King diſpoſed to walk in the Garden, had the Queen with him, when ſuddenly the Lord Chancellour with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden with a purpoſe to apprehend her: whom as ſoon as the King ſaw, he ſtept to him, and calling him knave and fool, bid him avant out of his preſence: the Queen ſeeing him ſo angry with him, began to intreat for him, to whom the King ſaid: Ah poor ſoul, thou little knoweſt what it is he came about; of my word ſweet-heart he hath been to thee a very knave. And thus by Gods Providence was this Queen preſerved, who elſe had taſted of as bitter a cup, as any of his former Wives had done.

And by what means ſhe avoids the danger.

About this time King Henry and the Emperour ſent Garter and Toyſon d'or, Kings at Arms, to demand performance of certain Articles of the French King: which if he denyed, they were then commanded to defie him: but the French King would not ſuffer them to come within his land, and ſo they returned: whereupon King Henry cauſed the ſaid demands to be declared to the French Ambaſſadour at Weſtminſter; and in July ſent over ſix thouſand men, under the leading of Sir John Walloppe accompanied with divers Knights and Gentlemen; Sir Thomas Seymour was Marſhal of the Army, Sir Robert Bowes Treaſurer, Sir Richard Cornwal Captain of the Horſe, and Sir George Carew his Lieutenant. There were likewiſe Sir Tho. Palmer, Sir John Rainsford, Sir John Saint-John, and Sir John Gaſcoigne Knights, that were Captains of the Foot. Their Commiſſion was to joyn with the Emperour, and together to make War upon France. The third of Auguſt open War was proclaimed in London, between the Emperour and the King of England on the one part, and the French King on the other, as mortal enemy to them both; and to all other Chriſtian Princes beſides, as he that had confederated himself with the Turk. Sir John Walloppe marching forth of Callice with his Army, joyned with the Emperours Forces, who together went and besieged Landersey, a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the Borders of the Emperours Dominions: to raise this siege the French King had raised a mighty Army; with which he came on as if he meant to give the Emperour Battel; and thereupon the Emperour raising his siege, with a purpose to encounter him, the French King took the opportunity to put men and victuals into the Town, which was the thing he intended; and having done this, the night following departed with his Army; and then the Emperour seeing him gone, and finding the Winter coming on, and no hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplyed, he also broke up his Army, and returned home.

Lords made. This year the Sunday before Christmas, the Lord William Parre, Brother to the Queen, who had married the Daughter and Heir of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, was at Hampton-Court created Earl of Essex; and Sir William Parre Knight, Uncle to them both, was made Lord Parre of Horton, and Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and on New-years day Sir Thomas Wriothsley, the Kings Secretary, was made Lord Wriothsley of Tichfield.

King James his Parentage. In June this year, Matthew Earl of Lenox fled out of Scotland, and came into England, whom King Henry received kindly, and gave him in marriage the Lady Margaret his Sisters Daughter, by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed memory.

Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellour, being lately dead, Thomas Lord Wriothsley succeeded him in the place; and now was an Army levied to go for France: the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Privy Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey the Dukes Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and his Son Sir Robert Devereux, Sir Thomas Cheiney Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Montjoy, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Thomas Poynings Captain of Guysnes, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitsuntide passed over to Callice, and marched toward Muttrel, joyned with the Emperours Forces, under the leading of the Count de Baron; which two Armies laid siege to Muttrel, whereof Mounsieur de Bies, one of the Marshals of France was Captain, but being then at Bulloigne, and hearing of the siege of Muttrel, he left Bulloigne, and with his Forces came thither, which was the thing that was desired, to draw him from Bulloigne; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolk appointed to pass over with the Kings Army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundel Marshal of the Field, the Lord Saint-John, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Gage Comptroller of the Kings House, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, with divers others, who the nineteenth of July came and encamped before Bulloigne; the four and twentieth of July the King in person, accompanied with divers of the Nobility, came to Callice; and the six and twentieth encamped before Bulloigne on the North-side, many batteries and assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town upon composition yielded, and the Duke of Suffolk entred and took possession, suffered six thousand French, as was agreed, with bag and baggage to depart. The eighth of September King Henry entred the Town himself, and then leaving the Lord Lisle Lord Admiral his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many enterprises after this were made by the Dauphin of France and by Mounsieur de Bies for recovery of Bulloigne, but they were still repulsed, and the English kept the Town in spight of all they could do; although at one time there came an Army of eighteen thousand foot, at another time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelve thousand Launce Knights, twelve thousand French Footmen, six thousand Italians, four thousand of Legionary Souldiers of France, a thousand men of Arms, besides eight thousand light Horse; great Forces certainly to come and do nothing.

King Henry layes siege to Bulloigne.

He takes the Town and returns.

Whilest these things were doing about Bulloigne, the Ships of the West Countrey and other places wafted abroad on the Seas, and took above three hundred French Ships; so that the Gray-fryers Church in London was laid full of Wine, the Austin-fryers, and Black-fryers full of Herrings and other Fish, which should have been conveyed into France.

Three hundred French Ships taken, laden with Wine and Herrings.

About this time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjects, towards his Wars in France and Scotland; to which purpose, the Lord Chancellour, the Duke of Suffolk, and other of the Kings Council sate at Baynards-Castle, where they first called before them the Mayor and Aldermen: and because Richard Read Alderman, would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded to serve the King in his Wars in Scotland, which the obstinate man rather chose to do, than he would pay the rate he was required; but being there, he was taken prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater damage, than if he had agreed to the Benevolence required: for at this time Sir Ralph Evers Lord Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roads into Scotland, assembled four thousand men, and entring Scotland now again, was encountred by the Earl of Arraine, by whom he and the Lord Oagle, and many other Gentlemen were slain, and divers were taken prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

King Henry demands a Benevolence towards his Wars in France.

Richard Read Alderman, refusing to pay his Assessment, is sent a Souldier into Scotland, and there taken prisoner.

1546.

It was now the seven and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Saint Georges day Sir Thomas Wriothsley Lord Chancellour was made Knight of the Garter: also Trinity Term was adjourned by reason of the Wars, but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tenths were open.

Sir Thomas Wriothsley Lord Chancellour is made Knight of the Garter.

At this time the English Fleet went before New-haven, but being there encountred by a far greater Fleet of French, they returned; with whose retreat, the French Admiral, emboldened, came upon the Coast of Sussex, where he landed Souldiers; but upon firing of the Beacons was driven back, after which he landed two thousand men in the Isle of Wight, but was there repelled, though reported to have in his Ships threescore thousand men.

died at Guilford, the noble Duke of Suffolk, Charles Brandon, Lord great Maſter of the Kings Houſe, whoſe body was honourably buried at Windſor, at the Kings coſt.

About this time the Scots, having received aid out of France, approached the Engliſh Borders, but durſt attempt nothing; whereupon the Earl of Hartford, Lieutenant of the North parts, raiſing an Army of twelve thouſand men, Engliſh and Strangers, entred Scotland, and burnt a great part of Mers and Tividale, as Kelſey Abbey, and the Town, the Abbeys of Medroſs, Driborne, and Tedworth, with a hundred Towns and Villages more; when on the ſixteenth of September, an Army of Scots and French attempted to enter into England on the Eaſt Borders, but in a ſtraight were ſet upon by the Engliſh, who ſlew and took of them to the number of ſevenſcore, amongſt whom was the Lord Humes Son, and a principal French Captain; in another Road, which they made into the Weſt Borders, the Lord Maxwels Son, and divers other were taken: but then at another time (ſuch is the chance of War) five hundred Engliſh entring the Weſt Borders of Scotland were diſcomfited, and the greateſt part of them either taken or ſlain.

And now to revenge the preſumptuous attempts of the French upon the Iſle of Wight, the Lord Admiral with his Fleet approached the Coaſts of Normandy, landed ſix thouſand men at Treport, burnt the Suburbs of that Town with the Abbey, deſtroyed thirty Ships there in the Haven, and then returned, not having loſt above fourteen perſons in the whole Voyage.

A Peace is concluded between the two Kings of England and France.

At this time the Earl of Hartford lying at Bullogne, had in his Army above fourſcore thouſand men, and many skirmiſhes paſſed between him and the French; till at laſt, by mediation of the Emperour and divers other Princes, a meeting was appointed to treat of a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; hereupon there came to Guyſnes for the King of England, the Earl of Hartford, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Sir John Dudley, Vicount Liſle Baron of Mawpas and high Admiral of England, Sir William Paget the Kings Secretary, and Doctor Nicholas Wotton Dean of Canterbury: For the French King there came to Ard, Claude Daneboit Admiral of France, the Biſhop of Eureux, Mounſieur Raymond chief Preſident of Roan, and the Secretary Bouchetel. Divers times they met betwixt Ard and Guiſnes, and after long debating of matters, and divers breakings off; at length, the ſeventh of June, a Peace was concluded, and proclaimed in the City of London, on Whitſunday the thirtieth of June, by ſound of Trumpet; and the ſame day in like manner at Paris and Roan; the chief Article of which Peace was this, that the French King paying to the King of England eight hundred thouſand Crowns, within the term of eight years, ſhould have Bullogne again reſtored to him, which in the mean time ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the King of England, as a pledge for aſſurance of the ſaid money; and now for a full eſtabliſhment of this Peace, the Vicount Liſle Lord Admiral, with the Biſhop of Dureſme, and divers other Lords were ſent into France, to take Oath of the French King, and of the Dauphin; as likewiſe at the ſame time divers Lords came from the French King to take Oath of King Henry; who by the way were met by the young Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton-Court:

Bullogne is reſtored to the French upon payment of eight hundred thouſand Crowns.

In his ſeven and thirtieth year, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Weſtminſter, wherein was granted to the King a Subſidy both of Spiritualty and Temporalty, and all Colledges, Chantries, and Hoſpitals were given to him to diſpoſe of: the four and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued, on which day the King coming to the Parliament Houſe, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellour was uſed to anſwer, but at this time the King would anſwer himſelf: the effect whereof was that where Maſter Speaker had commended him for many excellent qualities that were in him; he thanked him for it, not that he had them, but for putting him in mind how neceſſary it was he ſhould have them; then he thanked the whole Houſe for their Subſidy, and for giuing him the Colledges and Chantries, which he promiſed to be beſtowed to the glory of God and good of the Realm: laſtly, he acknowledged their love to himſelf, but found fault with want of love to one another; for what love, where there is not concord? and what concord when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptiſt; and he again calleth him Papiſt and Hypocrite? and this not only amongſt thoſe of the Temporalty, but even the Clergy-men themſelves preach one againſt another, inveigh one againſt another, without Charity or Diſcretion; ſome to be ſtiffe in their old Mumpſimus, and others ſo curious in their new Sumpſimus, that few or none Preacheth truly and ſincerely the word of God: now therefore let this be amended, fear and ſerve God, be in charity amongſt your ſelves, to the which I, as your Supreme Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you: and this ſaid, the Acts were openly read, to ſome he gave his Royal aſſent, and to divers aſſented not.

All Colledges and Chantries are given to the King by Parliament.

The King anſwers the Speakers ſpeech himſelf, and the effect of his Speech.

Whilſt the Oath for the Peace was thus taken by both Kings, Bulloigne remaining ſtill in King Henry's poſſeſſion, Mounſieur de Chatillon Captain of Mont-pleaſier began to make a new Baſtillion at the very mouth of the Haven of Bulloigne, naming it Chatillons Garden: hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton as then Deputy of Bulloigne advertiſed the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his pleaſure whether he ſhould raze it, as a thing very incommodious to the Town, or let it ſtand; the King asked advice of his Council, who all agree, that the Conditions of the Peace ought in no wiſe to be infringed, and therefore to let the Baſtilion ſtand; whereupon the King cauſed his Secretary the Lord Paget, to write a Letter to the Lord Gray, to that purpoſe, but then called Sir Thomas Palmour ſecretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatſoever he had written in his Letter, yet with all ſpeed poſſible, he ſhould raze the Fortification to the ground; Sir Thomas Palmour replying, that a meſſage by word of mouth being contrary to his Letter, would never be believed; Well (ſaid the King) do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his choice; upon the coming back of

Sir

Sir Tho. Palmour, the Lord Gray called a Council, ſhewing them the Kings Letter, and withal Sir Thomas Palmour's Meſſage, and then asked their advice, what in this caſe he ſhould do? who all agreed without any queſtion that the Letter was to be followed, and not the Meſſage: to which the Lord Gray himſelf ſaid nothing, but cauſed the Maſſage to be written Verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmour's mouth, and thoſe of the Council to ſet their hands to it: this done; the night following he iſſued forth with a company of armed men and Pioneers, and overthrew the Fortification to the ground, and then ſent Sir Thomas Palmour with Letters to the King, who as ſoon as he ſaw him, asked aloud, What, will he do it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his Letter, ſaid, Your Majeſty ſhall know by theſe; but then the King half angry, Nay tell me (ſaith he) will he do it or no? being then told it was done, and the Fortifications clean razed, he turned to his Lords and ſaid, What ſay you my Lords to this, Chatillons Garden is razed to the floor? Whereto one preſently anſwered, he that had done it was worthy to loſe his head; to which the King ſtraightly replyed, That he would rather loſe a dozen ſuch heads as his was that ſo judged, than one ſuch ſervant as had done it: and therewith commanded the Lord Gray's Pardon ſhould preſently be drawn; the which he ſent with Letters of great thanks, and promiſe of reward; the cauſe why the King took this courſe was this, leſt if he had written the razing of the Fortification in his Letter, it might have come to the French mens knowledge, before it could have been done, and ſo have been prevented; and this may be taken as a ſcantling of King Henry's great capacity.

The Lord Gray obeyeth a meſſage from the King before the King's Letter.

1547. It is now the eight and thirtieth year of his Reign, when about Michaelmas, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Earl of Surrey his Son and Heir, upon certain ſurmiſes of Treaſon, were committed to the Tower of London: and the thirteenth of January, the King then lying at the point of death, the ſaid Earl was arraigned in the Guild-hall, before the Lord Mayor, the Lord Chancellour, and other Lords there in Commiſſion; the ſpecial matter wherewith he was charged, was the bearing of certain Arms that were ſaid to belong to the King and to the Prince; though the Earl juſtified the bearing of them as belonging to divers of his Anceſtours; affirming withal, that he had the opinion of Heraulds therein: But this notwithſtanding, being no Lord of the Parliament, he was tryed by a common Jury, by them was found guilty, and thereupon had judgment of death; and the nineteenth of January was beheaded on the Tower-hill. The Duke was attainted by Parliament, and kept in priſon, till in the firſt year of Queen Mary the Attainder was reverſed. The death of this Earl might lay an imputation of cruelty upon King Henry, if a juſt jealouſie growing from the many circumſtances of the Earls greatneſs, in the tender age of his own Son, did not excuſe him.

1547. The Duke of Norfolk and his Son the Earl of Surrey committed to the Tower, and why.

The Earl is beheaded.

Soon after the death of this Earl, the King himſelf died; having made his laſt Will, in which he took order, that his Son Edward ſhould ſucceed him in the Crown, and he dying without iſſue, his Daughter Mary, and ſhe dying without iſſue, his Daughter Elizabeth; although another order of ſucceſſion had paſſed before by Act of Parliament. The Executors of his laſt Will were theſe ſixteen; Thomas Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Wriothſley Lord Chancellour, Sir William Pawlet Lord Saint-John and great Maſter of the Houſhold, Sir Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford and high Chamberlain of England, Sir John Ruſſel Lord Privy Seal, Sir John Dudley Vicount Liſley Lord Admiral, Cutbert Tunſtal Biſhop of Durham, Sir Anthony Brown Maſter of the Horſe, Sir Edmund Montacute Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, Sir Thomas Bromley one of the Juſtices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward North Chancellour of the Augmentation, Sir William Paget Knight of the Order, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir William Herbert, Sir Edward Wootton Treaſurer of Callice, and Nicholas Wootton Dean of Canterbury and York. To whom were adjoyned as aſſiſtants theſe twelve, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, William Par Earl of Eſſex, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treaſurer of the Houſhold, Sir John Gage Comptrollor, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vice-Chamberlain, Sir William Peter Principal Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of Siſſingherſt in Kent, Chancellour of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwel, and Sir Edward Peckham. And it was not without need to leave a full Council Table, conſidering in what terms he left the Kingdom when he died. Abroad, in league with the Emperour, at Peace with the King of France; but whether theſe were not perſonal only, and no longer binding than King Henry lived, might be doubted; with the Scots at deadly feud; with the Pope at utter defiance; from both which Coaſts there could be expected but little fair weather: at home the frame of Religion extremely disjoynted; and the Clergy that ſhould ſet it in frame, out of frame themſelves; the mindes of the people extremely diſtracted; and the Nobility that ſhould cement them, ſcarce holding themſelves together: And in this ſtate was the Kingdom when King Henry the eighth died, in the year 1547. the fifty ſixth of his life, and of his Reign the eight and thirtieth.
